The Secretary of State made the point that we now have a Government who have unique insight into, and unique sympathy with, the needs and aspirations of women. As so often the case with the Government, not only is there a gap between rhetoric and reality, but the truth, as expressed in policy, is the dead opposite of the rhetoric. To illustrate that, I shall deal with issues that are not regarded as traditional women's issues: tax and benefits, which are of importance economically to women as well as men. These are issues that old-fashioned male chauvinists would say women should not discuss, but they are women's issues.

Let us look at the Government's attitude to tax and benefits, and start with the lone-parent premium fiasco. We all know that, when the Secretary of State was in opposition, she said:

Perhaps he"—

the then Secretary of State for Social Security—

"does not realise that, when people move from being in a couple to being a lone mother, they become worse, not better, off."—[Official Report, 28 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 501.]

I am sure that the right hon. Lady remembers that quote; it has been quoted back at her a lot over the past few months. She said that she would not introduce a cut in the lone parent premium, but in government she did so. I hope that some hon. Members on the Government Benches voted against the Government on this issue. We thought that the policy was worth implementing for reasons of fairness. Labour opposed it in opposition, but implemented it in government.

The story continues, because the right hon. Lady, or one of her hon. Friends, leaked the decision that compensation would be available for lone parents, and that the cut would in some way be reversed. It was a double U-turn. Having U-turned once, she did so again. Then, last Wednesday, the Prime Minister specifically denied in the House that the second U-turn would take place. Now we read in The Guardian some more details that suggest it will.

That leaves many of us in a great dilemma: do we believe the Prime Minister, or do we believe The Guardian? Many of us were brought up to regard neither as a normally reliable source of information. We are in a genuine quandary as to which contradictory story we are supposed to believe. I hope that the Minister who will reply to the debate can put me out of that quandary. Should I, in this instance, believe the Prime Minister, or The Guardian?

The underlying important message to women in this country from the Government's charade and fiasco on the lone parent premium is that women's and lone parents' priorities are the Government's least important priority. The Secretary of State's priority is to keep her job; the Chancellor's priority is to keep public spending down; and the Prime Minister's priority is to ensure that the presentation is done well, and in this instance he has manifestly failed.

Whatever happens, the discussion about what lone parents need has been entirely lost. That sends a much more powerful signal to women of this country than any of the Government's rhetoric about their concerns.

Another issue of current debate, which was dealt with eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), is the proposal for the working families tax credit. It is a shame that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is not here, because she is involved in some of the detailed and difficult work on the subject.

However the Government try to wrap it up, that will mean an attack on the independent taxation and the separation of benefits allowed to women. I have read all the leaks in the papers—not all of them in The Guardian—suggesting that the Treasury has found a magic solution that will allow it to introduce the tax credit without suffering the "purse or wallet" dilemma that was discussed in great detail when the previous Government were considering social security reform.

The previous Government found that that dilemma was not soluble, so they moved towards the system of family credit, which has been successful in many ways, not least because most family credit is paid direct to the mother, and thus directly benefits women in a practical way.

The problem with any kind of earned income tax credit, as the Americans call it, and thus with the working families tax credit, is that, however we wrap it up, if the main earner in the household is a man—statistically, that is the most likely—he will have to give permission for the tax credit to be passed to the woman. There will be no automatic right. There will have to be a family discussion.

Lorna Fitzsimons: I am interested in the thesis that the hon. Gentleman is advancing. As he is so interested in family credit and the change proposed, or floated, in the working families tax credit, is he aware that family credit is currently assessed on joint income, so there would be no difference and no threat to independent taxation? Secondly, is he aware that, of the 750,000 recipients of family credit, in only about 300,000 cases does the woman receive the benefit, because the man is in low-paid work? Would he therefore support the working families tax credit if the money went to the woman unless the man and the woman jointly elected—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. My earlier remarks about the length of speeches apply to interventions, too.

Mr. Green: My attempt to deal with the intervention will be briefer than the intervention itself, Mr. Lord. Where the man is the main earner, it is practically impossible for the woman to be paid the money without a previous family discussion. I therefore assure the hon. Lady that what she suggests would not achieve the effect she desires, and preserve independent payments to women.

I know how many other people wish to speak in the debate, so I shall draw my individual examples to a conclusion. Both examples I have given provide powerful reasons for rejecting the Secretary of State's opening thesis that the Government have a unique sympathy with the priorities of women. Their actions belie their rhetoric; actually, they are treating the women of this country worse than the previous Government did.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to participate in this important debate. If I heard the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) correctly, it is the first such debate since 1988. Perhaps I misheard; I hope I did, because if that is true, it is a great shame.

We have heard a lot about tax and benefits this morning, and of course economic issues are important to women, as they are to everyone. However, other things should also be a priority for women; I know that they will feature among the Government's priorities for women.

One of those is the fact that a whole generation of young women have grown up under a Tory Government. My daughter, who is 21, does not remember the previous Labour Government, because she was a small child at the time. She and all women of her age have grown up under Tory Governments who treated whole groups in society with contempt, effectively excluding them, and saying, "Jobs, opportunities and prosperity are not for you; they are only for the few."

We now live with the consequences of that attitude, and we must ensure that women have high expectations of themselves.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): Does the hon. Lady not consider that the position of women in society today is better than it ever has been, and is improving? It has certainly improved over the past 20 years, especially under Conservative Governments.

Jane Griffiths: If the hon. Gentleman believes that there is reason for complacency about the position of women, I do not agree with him. We have a great deal to do. Many women do well and are prosperous—the number of women in the House is evidence of that—but many others are not, because of economic, child care and housing problems.

Health must be a priority for women. At times, I have agreed with Conservative Members that there is no such thing as women's issues, as health issues are issues for all of us. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) has left. I was flattered by her commenting on me. The Reading Chronicle is an excellent newspaper, and the editor will be delighted that she reads it so carefully.

Health is an issue for everyone, but certain matters—not just pregnancy and childbirth—are particular to women. The Tory manifesto at the last general election said nothing about osteoporosis, which affects many more women than men, especially older women who make up an increasingly large proportion of the population. It would be relatively inexpensive to make the problem of chlamydia and ectopic pregnancy a Government priority, and the good consequences would far exceed the necessary resources.

Ten women a year die from ectopic pregnancy—that number has not changed—and its incidence is increasing: there are about 10,000 cases a year. Those women are admitted to hospital for emergency surgery without which they would die. Ectopic pregnancy could be much reduced, if not eliminated, if screening for chlamydia was routine. Chlamydia has no symptoms, so young women may not know they have it, and infertility, ectopic pregnancy or both can result. Those issues have been ignored in the past, but I believe that the Government will give them the attention they deserve.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): The hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) made some interesting remarks. Perhaps it is a symptom of the debate that, although I could not disagree more with her remark about the way in which women live their lives, I agree 100 per cent. with what she said about health issues. I share her hope that the Government will pay attention to what she said.

The hon. Lady will perhaps disagree with some of my remarks. We have dealt with many issues, but the basic fact that has emerged from the debate is that women need freedom—economic freedom, the freedom that comes from good health, and the freedom to choose their own life style. Women generally have more life style choices than men. We are always asking ourselves why there are not more women at the top of the professions or in power in areas of public life. The answer often is that, because women have more choices, they do not choose the same career pattern as men. [Interruption.] Hon. Ladies on the Labour Benches seem to disagree, but that is exactly what they have argued this morning.

Often, a man will start his career in his early twenties and plod up the promotion ladder until, 30 years later, he reaches the top. Women often take a different course, perhaps taking time out to have children or to travel with their husband, which is why they often take longer than men to reach the top. We all know that they can achieve the same as men.

I mentioned freedom, and economic freedom comes from earning power, which often does not depend merely on child care or women's difficulties in having to look after other family members. We have already discussed those problems to a great extent, so let us not get the balance completely wrong. Child care is important, but it is not the only factor affecting a woman's earning power or her ability to continue with a career. Education is every bit as important—indeed, I would argue that it is more important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) mentioned the obvious and unarguable statistic that, when the previous Conservative Government came to power, which was just after I went to university, approximately one in eight 18-year-olds went on to higher education, whereas now one in three do so. That has nothing to do with the policies of the present Government. It is entirely to do with the policies of the previous Conservative Government, who, over 18 years, steadily increased the numbers going into higher education, and therefore increased opportunities for women in particular, as they were the ones who were often left out of higher education in the 1960s and early 1970s.

The first thing that this new Government did, after saying that they wanted to create opportunities especially for women, was introduce tuition fees for universities. If one policy is designed to give women fewer opportunities than men, it is that. There are still families who will decide, when considering the opportunities for their teenage children, that they can afford to help one child through university but not more than one. Who is likely to get the opportunity? The boy.

That happened for decades, even centuries, and, because the previous Conservative Government gave women the chance to go to university on their own merit and funded them through it, more women have come out with higher qualifications. It is sheer hypocrisy on the part of this Government to say that they care about women and talk about all they want to do to help them, when, with that one policy, they have taken away opportunity from women. We will not see the effects for quite a few years, but I will not forget what I have said this morning, and I will ask questions about it in years to come.

Mrs. McKenna: Does the hon. Lady agree that, in future, that option will not be available, because all students will be able to apply for properly funded loans, which they will be able to pay back once they are in proper employment? Therefore, they will not have to depend on their families. Only the families of the very well off have that choice at the moment—poor families do not have that choice.

Mrs. Laing: No, I do not agree. I do not want to get off the subject, and I must be brief, but the hon. Lady must recognise the difference between loans for maintenance, which help individual students and which we have supported for many years, and loans for tuition fees. There is no doubt that people will be deterred from going to university if they have to bear the cost of their tuition fees. Also, the policy demonstrates a lack of responsibility on behalf of the Government. Providing university education is good for the whole country, and the country should bear the cost of university tuition.

Mr. Syms: Will my hon. Friend consider the fact that university education is an investment in the future and in people? Through their policies, the Government have diminished opportunities for young people and the future investment in human capital.

Mrs. Laing: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. His remarks are in direct contrast to those of the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mrs. McKenna).

This morning, we have heard much about child care and young women's issues, and I am not saying that those are not important—they are very important—but let us not forget our duty also to look after older women. We must give them good pensions. That is especially important in view of the fact that there are more widows than widowers—men tend not to live as long as women. We must make provision for women in their older years. Women who are now of pensionable age had fewer opportunities than our generation has to work, save and build up their own pensions.

We have heard much talk in this debate about what the Government might do about pensions, but they have done nothing. The Conservative Government proposed the excellent basic pension-plus scheme, which was designed precisely to take care of this matter. All that the new Government do, however, is talk and have reviews. People deserve better.

Mrs. Gillan: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government have done at least one thing about pensions—they have taken a large amount of money from pension funds, making Robert Maxwell look like an amateur?

Mrs. Laing: I entirely agree. That also affects women more than men, as women retire earlier—their capacity to earn ends earlier. The policy is retrospective and cruel—I use the word advisedly—as it affects people who no longer have the chance to change their economic position.

I am surprised that health matters have not been mentioned more in this long debate. Women need to be free of the fear of health problems. They need the important freedom not to have children, and the freedom to choose when to have children.

I have been disturbed by rumours in the media—although it is now hard to tell whether a rumour in the media has arisen because of a journalist or because the Government are flying another kite to decide whether to do a U-turn before or after they have published their proposals—that, because the Government think that they have to make cuts in the national health service budget, they are considering making women pay for the contraceptive pill on prescription. I am sure that Labour Back Benchers will be just as concerned as Conservative Members about such an extremely dangerous policy.

There is no doubt that the best way to deal with unwanted pregnancies is to prevent them. Along with the automatic washing machine, the free availability of the contraceptive pill is one of the most important factors in gaining freedom for recent generations of women—although I am not suggesting for a moment that the Government should pay for automatic washing machines.

Mrs. Lait: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the rumours are true that people will not need receipts to claim the child care allowance, they could indeed spend the money on washing machines?

Mrs. Laing: Yes: my hon. Friend makes an excellent point.

I hope that the Minister will assure us that, whatever changes are made in the NHS budget, the contraceptive pill will continue to be free to everyone to whom it is prescribed—I believe that that should include those aged under 16, although that is a complicated matter, which I do not have time to explore now.

Many hon. Members have noted that there are fewer women Conservative Members than women Labour Members. I must point out that most of the Conservatives' female Members have been present this morning, because we care about this issue. Although female Labour Members have managed a reasonable representation, they have not matched the proportion of female Conservative Members who have been present.

I must also point out that the number of women who sit as Conservative Members does not reflect the proportion of women who are active in the Conservative party. [Interruption.] Labour Members have no idea just how many women hold important positions in the Conservative party.

Ms Sandra Osborne (Ayr): Making the tea.

Mrs. Laing: I am happy to give way to the hon. Lady if she wishes to make her point, but it seems she does not. It is only a matter of time before many more of those active Conservative women join us in the House.

It has been interesting to hear Labour Members talk about the past 18 years and how Conservative policies affected women. They seem to have forgotten that Baroness Thatcher was Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for 11 years. One would think from listening to Labour Members that she had never existed.

Ms Shipley: Wishful thinking.

Mrs. Laing: Not on my part.

Labour Members like to claim that Baroness Thatcher did nothing for the cause of women, but they completely ignore the fact that, by being Prime Minister, and achieving all that she did in her 11 years in that post, she made it impossible for anyone to say that a woman cannot rise to the top of her profession—and that includes our profession.

Various hon. Members have mentioned positive discrimination and quotas. I am very concerned by the proposals that the Scottish Parliament should be gender-balanced. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Chisholm) addressed that point earlier. If that policy becomes part of the operation of the new Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly, the women who are elected under it will be damaged in their future political reputations. Women who are selected because men have not been allowed to stand against them are for ever open to the criticism that they would not have succeeded had they been competing against men.

I stress that I intend no personal insult to any hon. Lady opposite who was selected from a woman-only shortlist. My point is that it is the system itself that is insulting—especially to female Labour Members who are of high quality and would have succeeded in any case. However, they will have to go through the rest of their lives—

Ms Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Laing: I shall give way to the hon. Lady, although I must be brief.

Ms Morgan: Does the hon. Lady not agree that we must overcome centuries of discrimination before women can take their rightful place here and in the new Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly? It is therefore appropriate that efforts are made to ensure that women take their place so that the policies of all those bodies are properly informed and address the needs of the whole community.

Mrs. Laing: I do not agree with the hon. Lady. She suggests that men ignore matters of interest to women. That is nonsense, and is far too great a generalisation. Quotas are dangerous. It is like saying that a man can swim on his own but that a woman always needs to wear water-wings. We know that it is not true, so why have a policy that suggests it is?

We will not improve freedom of choice and opportunity for women by talking about them patronisingly. Women's issues are society's issues. All we have discussed today is important not only to women but to everyone. I hope that, in a few years' time, as we make further progress, there will be no need and no demand for debates such as this.

Mrs. Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate on the Government's proposals for women. I join other hon. Members in welcoming the Secretary of State's announcements on helping women.

Contrary to what the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) said, there is no doubt that the arrival of so many women in Parliament on 1 May last year will have a long-term impact on the life of everyone in the United Kingdom. There is no truth in the rumour that we were elected solely to upset our male colleagues, either in the House or in the media. Far from it; we find some of them quite agreeable, especially those who have been house-trained. Some of us are even married to men and have sons as well as daughters. That may surprise Conservative Members. A colleague compared us to the Sedgemore—sorry the Stepford—wives. I recall that the Stepford wives were pretty, young and slim. Our colleague obviously agrees with me that size is not everything.

After 70 years of votes for women, some tremendous advances have been made, and the Government are making more significant advances, but there is still much to be done. The Government take the problems seriously and this debate is welcome. We should be moving towards the day when women are equally represented in all decision making so that decisions truly reflect the concerns of all. There will be no need for debates such as this when women are at the heart of the decision-making process.

Mrs. Laing: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. McKenna: No.

Local authorities have done some good work since the mid-1980s in setting up women's or equal opportunities committees. I welcome the Secretary of State's recognition of the good work of local authorities and the voluntary sector on child care over the past 18 years, when it was difficult for them to get support for it. Other hon. Members have spoken about those problems, but I want to speak about the process.

One of the great lessons that we have learnt is that to tackle equality issues effectively, we need to regard them not separately but as a key element of policy development. That is why I welcome the Government's recognition that mainstreaming is crucial: putting equality at the heart of policy making with equality issues regarded as integral to every Department and aspect of policy, not kept in a separate little box to be brought out every so often and looked at. Only then will we begin to address inequality in all its aspects.

I hope that the Secretary of State and the Minister for women will examine the excellent research being undertaken in Britain under the auspices of the fourth action programme of the European Union. We have learnt from that experience that the most significant impact comes when women are involved in the decision-making process. Women's concerns are the same as those of men: the economy, jobs, health and education. We are not from another planet, but we have not been involved in decisions about our lives, about the life of our country or the lives of our families. We do not want all the power, as the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) suggested. We will settle for half—our fair share. We ask only to be equal partners.

The comment made by the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) about men-free zones clearly demonstrates that Conservative Members do not understand the issues. The real issue is democracy. The House prides itself on being the seat of democracy, yet any elected chamber must reflect the society that it represents. When half the population is excluded from the decision-making process, we get different decisions—some would say bad decisions. I refer to decisions made by Government-appointed bodies. When we exclude half of the population from the business world, we lose the tremendous talents, energy and innovation that we need to succeed in the global economy.

History shows that, unless positive steps are taken, there is no improvement in the representation of women. The fact that there are 101 Labour women in the parliamentary Labour party is entirely due to positive action taken by the Labour party. All the political parties must face that reality.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest, who suggested that women elected to the Scottish Parliament would be damaged, is quite wrong. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already referred to the fact that we shall have a Scottish Parliament and a Welsh assembly. We have in Scotland and Wales an opportunity and the prospect of the first gender-balanced Parliaments in the world. What a start to the millennium if we can produce an equal number of men and women Members.

Labour Members are committed to a process by which we will ensure a list of candidates with equal numbers of men and women of equal ability. Any other party that does not recognise that will suffer the wrath of the electorate. We shall never be forgiven if we wake up on the morning of 7 May 1999 and face the prospect of a small group of women in the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh assembly.

I do not want to speak any longer, because I know that some of my colleagues want to contribute. In any case, the microchip implanted in my brain is telling me that it is time to sit down.

1.26 pm

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I have listened carefully to the debate. I have come to the conclusion that the Government are as stuck in their attitudes to women as they have been slow in their actions to improve the position of women. I hope that, as a result of the positive attitudes and approach of the Opposition today, the Government may think again about their whole policy.

We have seen a lack of vision from the Government and a refusal to acknowledge the many powerful and positive outside forces that have shaped the development and greater role of women in our society. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) for mentioning the role of the dishwasher.

Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale): He means the washing machine.

Mrs. Laing: And dishwashers.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Indeed, I could carry on. I am bound to say that, compared to the unimpressive efforts of the Government, washing machines, dishwashers, microwaves and, above all, disposable nappies have had a profound effect on the role of women in society, not to mention that of the men who live with them. I have had five children.

Mrs. McKenna: Do the men who live with the wives who have these children not contribute at all to bringing them up?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I was about to go on to explain how the changes that technology has made in family duties and jobs have played an important part in encouraging men in families to take a bigger role, and have made it much easier for them to cross that threshold.

Rather than focus on the rivalries and differences between men and women, we should focus on the dependency between men and women. There has been too little said in the debate about the fact that we are very much dependent on each other. I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) speak about children in care and, having once worked in a children's home, I do not think that we should ignore the important role played by the many excellent men who work in children's homes, including homes for girls. They provide a positive role model for children who have been subjected to abuse and, by doing so, help those children to take an important first step in making their way back to mainstream society.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons) attempted to quantify the input of women who do unpaid work. It is important that we should focus on those who do unpaid work, but the hon. Lady was in danger of falling into the same trap as the Government have. They feel that, if they quantify a problem, they somehow solve it, but the truth is that the contribution of women who stay at home is priceless—it cannot be quantified. Oscar Wilde has already been quoted in the debate and I am reminded of his warning against those who know

"the price of everything and the value of nothing."

We have to recognise that women's domestic role is vital. By doing so, we immediately understand why there will be a natural limit to the participation of women in the work force. There will be those women, however well qualified they are, who decide that they are best qualified in the role of a mother; and, through that role, they will make a tremendous contribution to the development of their children and perhaps as powerful a contribution to society as anyone in a high-powered job.

I went to the House of Commons Library to check my figures and discovered a striking fact about the period of the Conservative Government: as far as I could tell, going back over nearly all of those 18 years, in every year the level of unemployment among women was lower than that among men. I am grateful to the labour force survey for that finding, although I see hon. Members shaking their heads; I shall be happy to share the figures with them after the debate.

Those statistics bring us back to the issue of price over value: many of those jobs may be relatively low paid, but the value of having a job goes beyond pay. It contributes to one's sense of independence and pride, and sometimes to the ability to escape an unfortunate family situation.

Having a job is far more important than the precise level of pay for that job. None of us wants to see women or men exploited by being underpaid, but we should be wary of introducing policies that put the principle of price before the value of having a job at all.

The fact that we have debates about women has been remarked on and there has been discussion about when we last had one; but there can be no doubt that we have never had a debate on men. There is clearly a disparity between our attitudes to men and to women. That disparity was displayed in the Select Committee on Education, on which I am glad to serve. A few months ago, we decided to carry out a study into disaffected boys, but, between formulating the study and the start of our hearings, it became a study into disaffected children.

None of us would deny that there are problems with disaffected girls, but disaffection is predominantly a problem among teenage boys. That, too, goes back to the role of the mother and the fact that boys, even more than girls, find that her support plays a vital role in their development. From evidence given to us, our Committee has found that families with disaffected children are often those where parental support is noticeably lacking. In such families, the detrimental effect on boys of the lack of parental support is even more marked than the effect on girls.

Not only should we perhaps pay more tribute to the vital role of mothers—unpaid, unquantified, but invaluable—but perhaps we should pay tribute, and give our good wishes, to the most famous unpaid worker of all: the Minister for women.

We have been told many times that those who are underpaid find that it undermines their motivation. We are told that they tend to lose their self-respect and that some even withdraw from society. In the six months since the Minister for women was put into her post without being paid for it, she has had found it difficult to answer more than a smattering of questions in the House, and to find time to make more than a smattering of contributions.

I believe, as one of those who argued strongly in the House, when the Minister was appointed, that she should be dignified by being paid a decent wage for the job that she was undertaking, that that lack of pay is all the more to be objected to when one contrasts it with the extravagance of the men in the Government. The Lord Chancellor is spending hundreds of thousands of pounds on his furnishings and carpets, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer just throws his carpets away. Given the threadbare treatment of the Minister, Labour men should be hanging their heads in shame.

Today is the Minister's chance. It is her chance to stand at the Dispatch Box—something that we see as often as a male Member of the House standing at an ironing board—

Mr. Syms: Does my hon. Friend consider that, as the excellent results that women are now achieving are a good thing, we should bring men up to their standard?

Mr. St. Aubyn: That is a good point, but I shall finish with my suggestion to the Minister. When she stands at the Dispatch Box, she has a chance to strike a blow for women by resigning her post, explaining why she is doing so and suggesting that no one else should take it until they are paid a decent wage.

Ms Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North): I am pleased to have the chance to speak in the first women's debate since the Labour Government came to power in May 1997. I believe that I am the only woman Member of Parliament from Wales who could stay up in London today, although I was pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) was present earlier.

There are only four woman Members of Parliament from Wales—four out of 40. The fact that there have been only seven woman Members of Parliament for Wales since women gained the vote 80 years ago tells us that there is something wrong with the system. That record stands despite a long history of radical women from Wales. Some hon. Members may have heard of Jemima Nicholas, who, 200 years ago, stopped the French invading Fishguard. More recently, there have been the women in the miners' support groups in the South Wales valleys. I am proud that the Minister for women is from Wales; she is another radical woman from Wales.

I pay tribute to all the women from Wales who work tirelessly, often behind the scenes, keeping everything going and keeping the wheels turning as women have always done—keeping playgroups going, looking after elderly people, rushing to get the kids from school. It is really important that we make certain that those women also have the opportunity to come to the House, or to the Scottish Parliament, or to the National Assembly of Wales, and make their voices heard.

Many more women in Wales work than they did 20 years ago. Then, they made up a third of the work force; now, they make up nearly a half. The increase in women's employment has coincided with a decrease in male employment. That has resulted from savage changes in the patterns of male working in Wales because of the rundown of heavy industry.

Although more women are working in Wales, that increase has come largely from part-time jobs in the service sector. During the 1980s, the number of women in Wales employed full time fell, while part-time employment grew.

Chwarae Teg—which means "fair play" in English—is an organisation which promotes equal opportunities in the work force. Its surveys show that women are more likely to have short-term contracts or no contracts, to be employed part time or to work at home, whereas men are more likely to have full-time jobs with proper contracts, holidays, sick pay, occupational pensions and—importantly—more training opportunities.

Mrs. Gillan: I am pleased that the hon. Lady praises the work of Chwarae Teg, on which the fair play for women exercise was built by the previous Conservative Government. Does she share my hope that the Government will continue to support fair play for women in Wales and the rest of the country? We want a firm commitment from the Minister to back that.

Ms Morgan: The Government have already shown their commitment to Chwarae Teg and increased the range of its work enormously since coming to power last May.

Women in Wales earn three quarters of what men earn—even though men in Wales are among the lowest paid in Britain. Women in Wales are concentrated in certain sectors of employment, such as clerical, secretarial, sales, personal and protective services. There is a lack of women in top jobs. Unlike the Conservatives, I think that that is a great shame. The situation is worse in Wales than in the rest of the United Kingdom. Local government reorganisation made matters worse. There are no women leaders, and fewer women in chief positions. Only 24 per cent. of those on public bodies in Wales are women, compared with 33 per cent. in Britain as a whole. There are very few role models for women and girls in such jobs in Wales.

There is a huge untapped potential of women's skills and abilities in Wales, which the Government will release. The two most important ways to help do so are education and training and child care. There are already more women than men involved in further education in Wales. The same is happening in higher education. Many of those going into higher and further education are mature women with children. At the moment, relatives and friends care and provide for many of those children, but more women would be able to follow courses if there were child care facilities. The national trend for girls to achieve better results than boys at GCSE and A-level also applies in Wales, but the picture is different at NVQ level 3, which 32 per cent. of women are achieving, compared with 43 per cent. of men.

There has been an increase in child care facilities through Government initiatives such as the training and enterprise councils' out-of-school initiative. Such opportunities must be affordable for women to be able to take proper advantage of them. All the research shows that the majority of women who use the facilities—which have increased recently—have qualifications. The opportunities have not reached lower-paid women or lone parents. The funding has been used to pump-prime initiatives, which has meant that they have often not been sustainable. In areas of low income, longer-term funding is essential, going beyond the initial pump priming. I hope that the Government's money for child care will keep some such initiatives going, rather than just concentrating on new places.

Provision of pre-school child care is also important. The lone parents initiative, for which Cardiff is a pilot area, has shown that one of the barriers for women trying to gain work is the lack of child care facilities for pre-school children.

I have to wind up now because there is not much time left. Now is the time to recognise that child care is an integral and essential part of economic activity. We have one of the worst child care records in Europe. It is significant that no country with low child care costs has a low level of lone parent employment. Lone parents want to take advantage of any opportunities that present themselves. I think that we shall tackle these issues in Wales and in Britain as a whole. This is an historic moment, as child care, the family and women form an essential part of the new Government's policies.

1.45 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), who is no longer in the Chamber, that it is important to conduct this debate in broad terms and not turn women's issues into a cul de sac. We can exclude no topic—not defence, foreign affairs or anything else—from a discussion of women's issues. All issues affect women, and it is important that we tackle those issues across Government. The previous Government recognised that fact by ensuring that a range of Ministers understood the needs of women, and I believe that this Government are doing the same. I think that that is a positive step forward.

Women have come a long way this century. As I said in my intervention during the speech of the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), the general material well-being of this nation—and of women within it—has improved considerably in the past 20 years. At the beginning of the century, we debated whether women should have the vote, which was, rightly, conceded. We are now considering what role women should play in terms of combat and the armed services. Mention was made of the fact that women are playing a successful role in the United States armed forces. They have moved up the ranks and enjoy a high level of importance and responsibility within American society. I look forward to seeing more women playing an active role in our armed services in future.

The Conservative party has a good reputation in terms of female representation in this place: the first female Member of Parliament was Lady Astor, and Margaret Thatcher did an excellent job while serving for 11 years as our first woman Prime Minister. When I take tours around this splendid building, I am disappointed that most of the statues are of men.

Mrs. Gorman: All of them.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend may be correct, although there are some portraits of royal women. I look forward to the day when there will be statues of women as well and when the plinth in the Members' Lobby has a statue of Margaret Thatcher so that we may polish her foot before entering the Chamber.

Mr. Fabricant: Kiss her foot.

Mr. Syms: That is a good point.

Mrs. Gorman: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is time that we erected some memorial in this place to the suffragette movement? It is a disgrace that the only statue honouring that movement is parked in the gardens next door.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend makes a good point: I know that she is a doughty fighter for the rights of women. Women have had the vote for many years and I believe that the suffragettes should be honoured with a statue in this building—perhaps it could be erected next to the statue of Baroness Thatcher.

As to economic opportunities, women comprise 30 per cent. of the work force, and 12.3 million women are in work. Those figures are likely to increase substantially in future. In the early years of the next century, it is estimated that more than 50 per cent. of the work force will be women. Some 40 per cent. of corporate managers are likely to be women, as women are moving up the structures of many organisations and bodies. I recently visited Barclays International in Poole, which is a major centre. Although only one of the six managers there is a woman, most of those who will assume future top management posts within that organisation are women.

I believe that the previous Government's policies assisted the general position of women in this nation. However, I shall not provoke Labour Members by pursuing that point any further, as time is restricted.

I turn to several key subjects. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) mentioned independent taxation for married women, which was introduced by the previous Government. I hope that the Budget and the benefits review will not alter that important provision. We shall look carefully at the benefits review on 26 March and at the Budget on 17 March to see what changes have been made. It is important that the Government do not interfere with independent taxation for married women.

The Conservative party and many of us as Members with postbags are concerned about child benefit. It should not be means-tested or taxed. I receive many letters from constituents who are worried about what the Government have in mind. I hope that their fears are largely unfounded. The Government would be ill advised to change policy on child benefit.

On pensions, it has always been my view, even when my own Government were in office, that the state's contribution to widows' pensions is paltry. I hope that, in the benefit review, the Government consider a better standard of living to women who are left, sometimes at an early age, to be supported by the state because of inadequate provision.

On the broader issue of pensions, the Government's policies in the last Budget have not been helpful. The change in advance corporation tax regulations that will take £5 billion a year out of pension funds will make a considerable difference.

A matter of great current debate for women is the splitting of pensions on divorce which, as we all know, is all too prevalent. It is inevitable that, if the pool of pensions is diminished by changes to ACT policy, the sum will be smaller, however it is split. The Government's policy will make a substantial difference to people if they are unfortunate enough to get divorced, and pensions can be disaggregated.

University fees are another important aspect which has been mentioned. Many women have found opportunities through education, which has enabled them to find jobs and get on, sometimes better than men. The Government's policy on student fees is ill advised and will reduce the future investment of human capital. In deference to other hon. Members who wish to speak, I shall conclude with that.

1.50 pm

Mrs. Eileen Gordon (Romford): I am pleased to speak in the debate and to be the first woman Member of Parliament for Romford.

I congratulate the Government on the initiatives that they have already taken to put women at the heart of the Government's agenda. I particularly welcome the child care initiatives.

I went back to part-time teaching when my children went to school, and it was difficult to find facilities for the gap between the time that they finished school and the time that I finished work and could get home. Luckily, I had a good neighbour who helped me out, but the national child care strategy with its £300 million out-of-school initiative should make it much easier to find support of an excellent standard.

One of my other interests is the health service. I welcome the £50 million increase in staff training budgets. Many of the shortages of staff in the health service could be addressed by higher-quality training for nurses, who are quite capable of taking on much more responsibility, but have suffered from the attitude of some doctors and consultants and the "them and us" syndrome: "We are the doctors; you are only the nurses."

I welcome the boost of £2.15 million to nurse and midwife recruitment, and the reform of breast and cervical cancer screening to build and restore confidence in those services.

We are doing so much, and we have achieved a great deal, but there is still a long way to go, not only for the Government, but for society. For example, the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) mentioned the fact that Marylebone cricket club still excludes women from membership. I have been in the Long Room at Lord's. Of course it was a concession and it was on a ladies' cricket day, but one day, women will be there as a right, not as a concession. As one MCC member—not the hon. Gentleman—put it:

> "I can't stand the thought of women putting up curtains in the pavilion and worrying about things like the wallpaper and colour schemes."

I am sure that, when women members get there, they will have much more important things on their mind, but I must say that it could do with a lick of paint.

This week, I spoke at a Rotary club meeting in Romford. I agreed to speak there only because the club has recently accepted its first woman member and has assured me that it is actively seeking more women members. Rotary has realised what the MCC has not—that, unless it adapts, it will die.

The constant drip over the centuries of being treated as second-class citizens has knocked women's confidence. In their minds, many women feel unequal and accept the limitations placed on them by men. Their work status has suffered because of the need to fit their activities around their children's lives. They have tended to take part-time, poorly paid, insecure work, and have been penalised for putting their children first. That must change, and it will change under this Government.

My sisters used to take the most awful jobs towards the end of the year because they wanted to buy their children something special for Christmas. One year—quite a while ago—they took a job in a bubble gum factory. The white coating on the bubble gum also coated them. The workers at the factory looked like demented snow women. They worked at a conveyor belt, which moved rather quickly. Their job—especially my sister Vera's—was to sellotape the tops of the boxes as they came down the conveyor belt.

As I have said, the conveyor belt moved rather quickly. One of the workers fainted. She was dragged outside on to the grass and left there. The boxes were falling all around her and, as an act of protest, she taped herself to her machine, yelling for freedom. She soon got it, by mutual consent, I believe. For too long, women have had to put up with such conditions. Many of them had no choice and no voice.

[Mrs. Eileen Gordon]

I believe that women took a giant step forward on 1 May 1997. That is because so many were elected to the House and because the vast majority were Labour. To me, a shared philosophy is even stronger than shared gender. I have not joined cross-party women's groups because, with due respect to women Conservative Members, I have never been interested in seeing more Tory or Liberal Democrat women elected to this place. That is something for their own parties to sort out.

We have our beliefs, and I believe that we can be good role models for women throughout the country. That is a great responsibility. Historically, women have had to fight to achieve equality. However, it is so annoying to most of us to have to make a point that is self-evident.

Mention has been made of the suffragette movement, and I hope that all women Members have made a pilgrimage to the store cupboard in the Chapel, where in 1911 Emily Davison hid away to try to get her name on the electoral register at this place. She later died under the hooves of the King's horse at the Derby, giving her life for her beliefs. We should remember those who went before us, who fought for rights that we now take for granted.

One of the biggest influences on my life was my father, who never patronised his three daughters. He always taught us to think that we were never better than anyone else, or worse. I have always tried to live by that and not make judgments about others because of gender, race or religion. I am saddened when people pass judgments about my views or appearance simply because I am a woman. Those who criticise or patronise because of gender should reflect on their own motivation and insecurity. If they would not make the same remarks about a man, their behaviour is unacceptable.

There is a great deal of hope in the young girls of today. My daughter and her female friends are confident, strong, and leading their own lives and making decisions for themselves. They are not dependent on men in their lives. Partnership, yes, but not patronage. Education, example and support are the ways forward.

The Government are determined to make women feel that they and their views are important. At the same time, the Government want to give women a support network that will enable them to make genuine choices about their lives. I am convinced that, as a result of the debate and the Government's future actions, women will feel that their interests are at the heart of the Government's concerns.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): In the three minutes allowed to me, I shall make a couple of brief points. Some of the male commentators are prone to make head counts of female Members, as did, sadly, the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing). That being so, I declare a job share. My colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), is addressing a conference that I was to address, organised by the Doncaster domestic violence working party. Our mutual priorities are the same; we have divided our presence so that we may share the two opportunities to talk about domestic violence.

The Doncaster domestic violence working party plays a vital and largely unseen role, as do many agencies at local level, in supporting and protecting women and children who experience domestic violence. No reasons can excuse the hidden brutality of domestic violence. We know that insecurity at work, debt at home, poverty, alcohol and drug abuse and family histories of abuse all contribute to the risk of abusive behaviour developing and ruining the lives of too many women and their children.

In the past two years, the number of calls to the Doncaster Women's Aid advice line has risen fourfold, to 598 calls last year. The number of women and children who went to the Doncaster refuge is small compared to the number of families who do not manage to reach out and seek help.

It is easy to forget that the impact of violence and abuse on the woman is not just physical and psychological, but damages the children, who may carry the pattern of that abuse into other relationships in adulthood.

I commend the Minister on her bravery in giving priority to this area and on recognising that a cross-departmental approach at national level reflects the multi-agency approach which is required on the ground.

The Family Law Act 1996, which enables the removal of perpetrators of violence in the home, will, I hope, be complemented by greater powers to ensure that the police and the criminal justice system show greater sensitivity in their treatment of victims and vulnerable witnesses. Likewise, opportunities must be seized to identify and provide support to families where parents are experiencing stress.

Domestic violence has not been ignored, but there is much to be done. Too many women suffer in silence. I think that in this respect this Government will achieve what other Governments have not.

2 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I congratulate all the hon. Members who have spoken today. We have, I believe, managed to squeeze in 21 speeches from Back Benchers. The House will be interested to know that, by my reckoning, we have heard from a nurse, an educationist and lecturer, a radio station owner, two social workers, a lobbyist, two lawyers, a public relations consultant, two bankers, three teachers, a university lecturer and two journalists—

Mrs. Gorman: And an entrepreneur!

Mrs. Gillan: I am sorry; would my hon. Friend like to intervene?

We heard from a wide range of experience. I was surprised that, despite the wide-ranging debate, subjects that I thought would be raised were not. I was surprised not to hear comments from Labour Members about personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts. I am surprised that nobody mentioned the fact that, when the Mental Health (Amendment) Bill was brought before the House the other day—a Bill of particular interest to women—Government Whips had it talked out.

I am surprised that we did not talk about the plight of women in other countries, particularly "Platform for Action"; that there was little, if any, mention of pornography and, indeed, the high rate of teenage pregnancies. However, I am delighted that the Government found time for this debate, even though it has been relegated to a Friday, when some Labour Members were not able to attend. I am truly sorry that we did not hear from them.

Today may be a parliamentary first. While this debate is taking place, Lord Archer of Weston-Super-Mare is promoting his Bill on succession to the Crown, which seeks to remove any distinction between the sexes in determining succession. This could be the first time that women have been the focus of simultaneous debates in both Houses. I hope that the Government will support my noble Friend's Bill.

I echo the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) when she welcomed hon. Ladies to the House. I, too, am pleased to see the greater participation of women from all walks of life, and all trades and professions, not least in the House. I hope that, despite the political divide that is obvious between the Front Benches, hon. Ladies on the Government Benches will take my welcome in the spirit in which it is meant.

There was a contrast between the Secretary of State's opening speech for the Government—which I thought was trivial, containing only one announcement of yet another talking shop—and the excellent speeches that we heard from the Back Benches.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons) is a great campaigner in her own right, but she started badly by completely misunderstanding a point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk. I hope that she is now more enlightened about disaggregated statistics.

One of the hon. Lady's own points was totally wrong, too. I should have thought that she would at least acknowledge the fact that my right hon. Friend and I started mainstreaming and had it cleared at Cabinet level. Mainstreaming passed into every Government Department, so that every piece of legislation was scrutinised for gender impact. I am sorry that the hon. Lady did not acknowledge the work that was done, especially by my right hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) made a statesmanlike speech, skilfully outlining the variety of opportunities open to women today. She reminded us of the arrogance that working women sometimes have, and the way in which they sometimes look down on women who just stay at home. I believe, as she does, that women who stay at home provide a valuable service both to their children and families and to life in this country.

My hon. Friend echoed my view—a view held by many of my hon. Friends and also, I believe, by many Labour Members—that flexible working arrangements are essential if women are to get on. Term-time mums, home working, teleworking and part-time work were all part of the theme of her contribution.

The hon. Member for Stourbridge (Ms Shipley) sought to criticise the Conservative party for its record of female participation in Europe. As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne rightly said in an intervention, she has played a role herself, on the Council of Europe—and the hon. Member for Stourbridge had better not repeat her accusation in the hearing of Dame Jill Knight or Dame Peggy Fenner, lately of this House, both of whom have provided the House and the country with great service.

The hon. Lady also spoke about the problems involved in rape cases, and I am sure that many of her words on that subject would be echoed by my hon. Friends.

The hon. Member for Taunton (Mrs. Ballard) spoke about mainstreaming. Sadly, I felt that she was another hon. Member who was not entirely familiar with the previous Government's provisions in that area. I hope that, after my speech, people will at least know that mainstreaming was indeed a main theme of the Conservative Government's policies towards women.

The hon. Lady struck a chord with me when she spoke of the plight of women who work from 7 in the morning to 11 at night. She reminded me that we should all take our hats off to those of the women who serve in this place who have young families. I do not have a family myself, but there is no doubt that those people make a valuable contribution, and have an awful lot of work on their hands.

The hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) said that she was jet-lagged, so I am glad to see her still in her place, although we would have understood if she had gone home. She reminded us that being a night nurse, a mother and a councillor is a bit like feeling jet-lagged, and there was great sympathy with what she said.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant), who was the first Conservative male to make a contribution, made a valiant attempt to strike the gender balance. He drew our attention to the worrying statistics on the performance of boys at school, especially in GCSE and A-level results. Those should concern the Government, as they concerned my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk and me when we were both at the Department for Education and Employment.

My hon. Friend also spoke about teleworking, something on which I am keen, especially since a delegation came to see me. I believe that that form of working will grow dramatically and benefit men and women.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Chisholm) spoke about child care and lone parent benefits. He resigned from the Government over the issue of lone parent benefit, and I take my hat off to him for sticking to his principles. It is a pity that his colleagues do not follow his lead.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) always talks a great deal of common sense. Not a sound was heard when she gave us her views on education and working women, and there was not a dry eye in the House when she reminded us of the plight of older women. I hope that she will not mind my saying that she is for ever young in this House. When my hon. Friend urged us to consider older women, she was derided by Labour Members. I hope that that was just fun and games, because older women deserve sincere consideration from both sides of the House.

The hon. Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) made an excellent contribution on the problems of her Asian women constituents. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) spoke fluently about independent taxation. The doubts over Government policies that she raised should be carefully examined by the Ministers for women.

When the hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes) said that work was perhaps the only way in which a woman could prove herself, I began to listen to her speech more carefully. I advise her to talk to Full Time Mothers, an organisation that believes that the Government are putting tremendous pressure on women to go out to work. It has made valid points that merit examination. However, I am grateful for her support on adoption measures, and I should be happy for them to be pursued.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) made an excellent speech that put the gender balance fairly and squarely back in the middle. He expressed great regret about the MCC decision not to admit women members, but the Royal Automobile Club, of which I am a family member, has just voted to allow women members.

My hon. Friends the Members for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) and for Poole (Mr. Syms) made sterling contributions. We also heard from the hon. Members for Romford (Mrs. Gordon), for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan), for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mrs. McKenna) and for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths). I hope that they will forgive me for not commenting on their speeches in detail. I am sure that the Minister for women will refer to them.

I feel rather sorry for the Minister for women. Like many other hopefuls, on 2 May last year she would have been waiting for the famous call from Downing street asking her to be a junior Minister. But that call did not come until six weeks later, on 11 June, because women were certainly not the Government's priority. The call was an afterthought, made when the Prime Minister remembered, or was reminded, that the Labour party had made so many promises to women that it had better find someone to do the job.

The hon. Lady is doing a ministerial job without ministerial pay. What on earth does that say about the Government's priorities for women? It sends out the wrong signal: a woman can be appointed at a rate below that of her male colleagues. The Government appear willing to spend more on the Lord Chancellor's wallpaper than on a minister for women.

The hon. Lady has said that her pay is a technical matter. I invite her to take her case to the employment appeals tribunal. If her pay is a technical matter, what signal is going out to women who go to the tribunal over pay discrimination in the workplace? Will they be told that the Prime Minister thinks that pay is a technical matter and that even the Minister for women is paid less than male Ministers?

To say the least, the Government's arrangements for ministerial responsibility got off to a rocky start. For years, the Labour party told us that there would be not only a Minister for women in the Cabinet, but a Ministry for women. That proposal was watered down so much that today we have a Secretary of State with full responsibility and a Minister for women without pay.

The Secretary of State has made much of the fresh approach to women. That is totally inaccurate and I must put the record right. The right hon. Lady says that she has announced a new Cabinet Sub-Committee and a new women's unit and that she is producing a new child care strategy. There is nothing new about child care strategy. I have here the paper, "Work and Family: Ideas and Options for Child Care", which the Conservative Government issued nearly two years ago.

In her reply, will the Minister for women confirm that this Government's child care strategy paper has been delayed from October to November to February and, now, until after the Budget and that it is merely a consultation paper, which will look similar to that produced by the previous Government? Will she also confirm that tax breaks for employers will continue and will not be attacked by the Chancellor in the next Budget? Will she confirm that she has looked into the Kids Club Network and the Child Care Voucher Ltd.'s scheme—the out-of-school voucher? Will she confirm that the Inland Revenue will be taxing that under this Government?

This has been a good debate, but it raises serious doubts over the Government's priorities for women, which they so loudly espouse. Women are not pleased with this Government's performance. Like many hon. Members, in recent months I have been flooded with letters from women concerned about taxes on private pensions, personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts, mortgage rises, student fees and the rises in hospital waiting lists. Indeed, I have even received a letter from the Women's National Commission, which represents 50 non-governmental organisations. It is deeply disappointed in the Government's performance and says:

"We looked to this Government to deliver a great deal for women. Our expectations have not yet been fulfilled."

That is an indictment of this Government and I hope that, when the Minister stands at the Dispatch Box, she will feel ashamed that the Women's National Commission has already condemned the Government's performance.

2.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Ms Joan Ruddock): This has been an excellent debate—I am tempted to add, without the speech we have just heard, but there we are—which has clearly shown that the interests of women are being brought to the heart of Government. We have heard passionate arguments, not least from my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons), who made a case for testing all policies against the gender impact and the centrality of women's contributions to our economy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Ms Shipley) mentioned the treatment of rape victims. The House should be aware of the work being done in the Home Office on vulnerable and intimidated witnesses, and the concern about the falling conviction rate for those charged with rape.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) mentioned the important question of the difficulties experienced by Asian women, and the need for special awareness. We acknowledge the double disadvantage that comes of both gender and race, and I meet many ethnic minority groups to hear their case.

We have heard strong arguments in support of women's advancement and opportunity. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) mentioned women in the armed forces, particularly in the United States. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has already decided to widen the opportunities for women in our armed forces.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), who is always great value in this House, talked of many things, including the serious matter of unwanted teenage pregnancies. My hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health has set up a task group and is studying that issue seriously, as it is of great concern to this Government, and we intend to tackle it.

From many women Members we heard the woman's perspective on key areas of Government policy, including a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes) on the important contribution of family friendly employment strategies to the needs of women. My hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) gave an example of good practice in her constituency. The Government are taking forward all those concerns about balancing work and parenting in our dialogue with women and, indeed, with employers.

Our male colleagues expressed their concern about continuing inequalities, although the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) seemed to have great difficulty understanding how inequality should be addressed. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Chisholm) paid fulsome tribute to the work of the Ministers for women, clearly understanding the way in which we work across Government and, indeed, often behind the scenes. He spoke about violence against women, which we shall tackle in the national strategy that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced. I can assure him that, in putting together that strategy, we shall consult organisations such as the Zero Tolerance Trust.

The fact has clearly come across that, although women and men may share the same values and objectives, women's lives have a different pattern from men's. That was graphically illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan), whom I join in seeking improvements for women in Wales.

In her opening remarks, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for women demonstrated the breadth of Government policy where women's interests are clearly to the fore. From education to health, and from employment to child care, she outlined our strategy for fulfilling the promises that we made to the women of this country. Questions have been raised on a number of those issues, to which I shall respond in due course.

First, I shall give a brief account of how the priorities for women that we have established in our domestic agenda relate to our international obligations. Under Britain's presidency of the European Union, the Government have a unique opportunity to bring women's perspectives to the heart of Europe. Our various initiatives are designed not as one-off meetings, but as a means of driving forward the women's agenda throughout the European Union.

In Glasgow in April, our conference theme will be the organisation of work. Employers, trade unions and Governments will be able to share best practice and consider how they can facilitate and foster a better balance between work and family life. In Belfast in May, the theme will be employability and the importance of child care. Ministers for women across member states will be able to examine progress on this most fundamental issue for women.

Not only are we putting women's priorities on the European agenda, but, for the first time, we will be able to say with pride in Europe that we have a Green Paper on a national child care strategy.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Ruddock: No. The hon. Lady took some of my time—she cannot have more.

Although the United Kingdom has lagged behind in the child care league tables, the Government are taking the lead in developing the employment action plans that were discussed in the Luxembourg summit. Here, too, we are ensuring that equal opportunities feature strongly, and we are making up for lost time.

Mrs. Gillan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask your advice. I believe that I heard the Minister say that, for the first time, there would be a Green Paper on child care. The previous Conservative Government produced a Green Paper—a consultation paper. Is it in order for the hon. Lady to mislead the House in this fashion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Ms Ruddock: It is clearly the first time for us. The Government have a Green Paper, and the difference between the Government and the previous Conservative Government is that we intend to have a national strategy.

By incorporating the social chapter, we are making up for lost time. As many hon. Members have noted, the long-hours culture is endemic in Britain: a quarter of all fathers work more than 50 hours a week. That is why the working time directive will be important to British families and why we are consulting on its implementation.

The part-time work and parental leave directive will also benefit women, by raising the standard of part-time work and encouraging the development of good part-time opportunities. The directive will also give women and their partners the right to three months' unpaid leave when their child is born or adopted. For the first time, women and men will be able to take time off for urgent family reasons without the threat of losing their jobs.

In these and other ways, the Government are ensuring that Europe delivers for the women of Britain. In seeking to improve our lives in this country and throughout the rest of Europe, we must not lose sight of the condition of the majority of the women in the world.

International Women's Day on 8 March has always been a time both to celebrate women's achievements and to mark women's oppression in those countries where women's human rights continue to be violated. This year, the European Parliament has called on the international community to make an appeal on behalf of the women of Afghanistan. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has signed that appeal on behalf of our Government.

Next week, I shall lead, with pride, the United Kingdom delegation to the annual meeting of the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women, and I will speak for the European Union. We will follow up the global platform for action to which the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) referred, and will try to give momentum to the painstaking process of advancing women's rights throughout the world.

One topic to be followed up is violence against women. I shall say that the European Union believes that violence against women is an obstacle to equality and development, and that it should be recognised for the crime it is. Today's debate makes it clear that, in taking that message to New York, I shall have the support of the House. I shall also be able to tell participants that we are using our presidency of the European Union to begin planning for a Europewide consciousness-raising programme on violence against women for the latter part of next year.

I turn now to some of the questions raised in the debate. The hon. Members for Taunton (Mrs. Ballard) and for Billericay, among others, asked about tax reliefs for child care. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has already indicated the direction of his thinking, and, through the working family tax credit, he will provide help for all working families on low incomes. The hon. Member for Taunton also asked whether the working family tax credit would be payable to the person who pays for child care rather than the highest wage earner. When the working family tax credit is introduced, families will be able to elect to whom the credit is paid.

The hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), in a serious contribution, raised many taxation issues. I can tell her that there will be no return to the world in which women were treated as men's chattels in tax law. However, she will be aware that most of the other matters she raised are all speculation and she will not seriously expect me to respond to them today. The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) raised the question of payment for the contraceptive pill. No such proposal is currently under consideration.

The right hon. Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) and the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) raised questions about accountability and representation. I wish to make it clear that I have answered more questions on women's issues in the nine months that I have been Minister for women than she and her colleagues answered in the whole of the time that they were in government. I note also that the right hon. Member for South–West Norfolk, who made so much of the point, has never tabled a question on women to myself or to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

As for representation, although we acknowledge the previous Government's attempts to improve the representation of women, only one third of public appointments go to women. Therefore, we know that there is much to be done. We intend to do it, and our women's unit is working with the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments to devise a joint strategy. I endorse everything said by my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mrs. McKenna) about the representation of women in the Scottish Parliament.

Many of my hon. Friends here today will be disappointed that they have been unable to contribute to the debate. It is a testament to the fact that we consider the issues of such great importance that so many of my hon. Friends have made the time to be here on a Friday and to seek to contribute.

Mrs. Gillan: The Minister has been passed a note to say that she is running out of time.

Ms Ruddock: It says, "Keep going," and I intend to do so.

The richness and variety of this debate are testimony of the importance that the Government and the House give to women.

In the past 10 months, we have come a long way in addressing our priorities. The Green Paper on child care, the national strategy on violence against women and the proposals for women's juries show how much can be done by taking a cross-Government approach to issues of concern to women in a new and innovative way. We plan to do much more, as we continue to tackle women's inequality and develop policies that will improve all our lives.

The shadow Leader of the House said that we should be judged by what we achieve, not what we intend. We are happy to be so judged. That is why we are reaching out to all policy makers through mainstreaming to ensure that they take account of the needs and views of women. Only in that way can we move away from the idea that women's concerns are secondary or separate, as some hon. Members have suggested. As the debate showed, women's concerns are wide-ranging and a part of the mainstream debate and of the policies of this Government. In celebrating international women's day—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the Motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 5th March, notwithstanding Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community documents), the Speaker shall put the Question on the Motion in the name of Mr. Secretary Straw relating to the Prevention and Suppression of Terrorism not later than three hours after the start of proceedings thereon; and the said Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, after Ten o'clock.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Housing Subsidy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): This is an exciting moment for the really important debate. I am grateful that it has such a peak-time slot.

I begin with an apology. I do not regard myself as an expert on housing matters or council housing. I stand in awe of the Minister for London and Construction, who has made a formidable contribution on those matters, both in opposition and now in government. It is always better to begin by buttering up Ministers as a path to power: new Labour, new unctuousness.

I feel inadequate to deal with the issue but it is right to raise it, because I know a real injustice when I see one and this is one. The system was introduced by the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. Once a council housing account is in surplus—and more and more of them are as rents go up and the debt burden is paid off—housing benefit, or rent rebate as it is known to council tenants, is paid out of the housing revenue pool. That is monstrous,because it does not apply to private or housing association tenants. Their housing benefit, known to them as rent allowance, is paid by the Treasury.

How is it right to maintain a distinction between council tenants, who carry each other's burdens, and other tenants? It is an iniquitous principle because it means that council house tenants are taxed twice. They are taxed once for national revenue to make their contribution to the housing benefit of private tenants, and taxed again through the rates to contribute to the housing benefit of council house tenants under the same local authority. That is double taxation, and it is not a small amount.

The following calculations are from the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy's housing revenue statistics for 1997. In North-East Lincolnshire, every tenant pays £2.91 a week on their rent to pay the housing benefit of other council tenants. That is the smallest contribution in Humberside. In North Lincolnshire, our neighbouring authority, the weekly amount paid for housing benefit for other tenants is £6.58. In the East Riding of Yorkshire, double taxation of council tenants is £13.89 a week.

We cannot fairly maintain such an iniquitous burden. It encourages hatred and antagonism between tenants; it is divisive. Why should tenants pay it? Whatever Conservatives have claimed in the past, when they portrayed council tenants as rolling in money, council tenants' wages are about half the average wage. They are the poor of this society, and the gap is widening. We are effectively asking the poor to subsidise the poorest—council tenants in receipt of housing benefit. How can the Minister justify that? How can I? How can the Labour party? The simple answer which I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give us today is that none of us can.

The measure was introduced in 1989 by that beneficent force for social advance and promotion of council housing and local government known as the Conservative Government. We opposed it then. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), then the shadow spokesman for the environment, now the Minister of Agriculture, said when the Bill was introduced:

> "I have made the point once, but I make it again, that we fundamentally oppose the new housing finance proposals which will require council house tenants effectively to pay an additional tax to subsidise the poll tax and housing benefit. That is a major departure from the policy followed by all previous Governments."—[Official Report, 14 February 1989; Vol. 147, c. 186.]

An abuse then is an abuse now. I realise that we opposed many abuses in our time when the Conservative Government were in power, but they have to be put right. I accept that it is a staged process and one cannot do it all at once, but we have to commit ourselves to the principle of putting right those abuses. It is necessary, especially as the abuse has grown since 1990.

Since 1990, council tenants have been bilked of £6 billion to pay the housing benefit of other council tenants. This year, it amounts to £1,000 a year on the rent of each working council house tenant. It applies to more and more authorities. My hon. Friend the Minister gave me some statistics in a parliamentary answer. It now applies to 80 per cent. of authorities and is more and more a cross-subsidy. I calculate it at £1.3 billion. In an answer to me, my hon. Friend the Minister put it at £1.22 billion, but that is still a huge figure.

In North Lincolnshire, my local authority, the cross-subsidy is £1.5 million this year, and it estimates that it will be £2.4 million next year. Rents have been pushed up since the measure was introduced in 1990. The cross-subsidy is the major reason why council rents have been pushed up. They have gone up 50 per cent. in real terms in the past 10 years. In London they have gone up by 70 per cent. The main reason for that is the need to subsidise the housing benefit of the poorest tenants.

I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to comment on a problem area. Council housing is surely social housing allocated according to need, yet there seems to be constant pressure in the Department—it was certainly strong when the Conservatives were in power—to gear it to the market. There is an argument in the Department as to whether affordability is a relevant concept in setting rents in the social housing sector, or whether rent setting is about providing price signals to encourage the efficient allocation of resources.

I hope that the Minister will tell us about that argument in his Department, because I think that it is a real one. It looks as though senior people in the Department want to price council housing at economic rents so that market forces will operate, and so that old ladies who occupy too much space will be forced out into smaller accommodation.

Mrs. Jackie Ballard (Taunton): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the policy was introduced by a Government who were antagonistic to local authority housing and that their intention was deliberately to push up rents to persuade council tenants that they would be better off agreeing to large-scale voluntary transfer of the housing stock or moving into housing association or other housing? One of the Conservative Government's weapons in their effort to destroy local authorities was getting rid of housing stock. That is what drove the policy. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the new Government have a different attitude to local authorities—I hope—and will take the first opportunity to reverse the policy?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady is absolutely right—I agree with her 100 per cent. That was done by a Government who wanted to make council housing odious and unpopular and to force people out.

That is not the attitude of the current Government, which is why we should try to reverse the policies resulting from that attitude. In particular, we should get rid of the notion that there should an economic pricing mechanism for council housing and that it is legitimate to keep pushing council rents to the market level. My hon. Friend the Minister hinted that he was thinking along those lines in his letter to me on 4 February and I hope that he will disavow any such intention today, because it is absolutely wrong. Council housing is about social need, and we cannot continue to push up rents.

Council housing is efficiently allocated in the light of the responsibility to meet needs, and it is efficiently used. The nature of the private housing market is boom or bust: there can be huge backlogs of empty properties and of people who want to move. Council housing allocation is extremely efficient by comparison. We cannot keep pushing council rents up to market levels, as the guidelines imposed by the Department have so consistently done. In my view, it costs to do so, because each time prices are raised, it costs more in subsidies and support.

If that burden of rent rebates to council house tenants were to be taken on by the Government and paid for out of public finance—as it should be—it would serve as a deterrent to the Department's activities in raising rents. That is another reason why we should do it. In answer to a written question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead (Mr. Austin), the Minister wrote that reducing the guideline rents by 10 per cent. would cost about £5.8 billion, but save £4.4 billion in rebates and £1.3 billion in retail prices index-related public expenditure. In other words, the net public expenditure cost of reducing council rents by 10 per cent. would be £100 million. If that is all it would cost, why on earth does the Minister not do it?

That would tie in beautifully with the Government's welfare-to-work proposals by removing a poverty trap at one fell swoop. It would encourage people to go out to work and make them less dependent on benefit. The briefing report by the London Housing Unit makes the point succinctly:

"A gearing effect means that a given level of rent reduction has a disproportionate impact on the amount of gross income needed for people to get out of benefit. For example, a tenant household paying a rent of £41 a week (the average rent for council tenants in England in 1997/8) would need to earn about £30 gross less per week in order to avoid the poverty trap if their rent was reduced by just £4 per week."

Those are compelling statistics. I hope that the Minister can confirm them and tell us why we do not go down that road and remove the disincentive to work. If the Minister listens to me as assiduously as he attends to his departmental work—he is a most assiduous and hard-working Minister—I could boost his career prospects at one fell swoop by this major contribution to the new deal and welfare to work.

What should we do about the system? We should scrap it and pay the £1.3 billion or the £1.22 billion from the Exchequer. At present, the Government are actually making a profit on council housing. As the stock deteriorates, the Government are milking the assets, but they are making a profit of about £700 million, and that is iniquitous.

Benefits would flow from scrapping the system, paying to reduce council house rents out of national revenues, and giving the councils extra money in their housing accounts to spend on reducing the huge—£19 billion—backlog of repairs. That figure comes from a housing conditions survey some years ago. Councils cannot do those repairs because they lack the money—and we are taking money to pay benefits.

We are creating council house ghettos. People from North East Lincolnshire write to me and say, "Our estate is a ghetto." That letter came from Yarborough. I have had similar accusations from The Grange—yet North East Lincolnshire is a very good authority. All over the country there are ghettos—which the social exclusion unit should pay prime attention to—which need the money that could be made available.

Enormous economic benefits would result from an expansion of house building and improvements to council house stock—things which must be done. Increased economic activity would result.

The Minister is a very sensible man—I am pursuing the Hartlepool path to progress—and I hope that he will take up my idea. Sadly, it is not in the nature of Adjournment debates that he will say, "My God—you are right. Why didn't I think of this? We shall do it as soon as I get back across the road to my Department." However, I hope that he will say that this is a temporary situation, which is imposed on us by the commitment to the Clarke spending totals for two years, but that, after that, something will be done about it.

The answers that the Minister gave me in the letter of 4 February were the kind of stock holding replies that are sent out by any Department on any question. If there was a proposal to raze all council housing to the ground, departmental officials could put up a good case for it. They might say that it would remove at a stroke all unfairness of allocation because there would be no council houses to allocate, and that there would be many other side benefits. The arguments in that letter were of that ilk. It was a "Yes, Minister" type of letter.

The Minister is an honest Minister, and I hope that he takes note of my arguments. I hope that he will answer a central question, which I want to ask him in conclusion—I apologise to him for having gone on slightly too long. My question is: is this fair?

Mr. Kerry Pollard (St. Albans): I shall be very brief. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) painted a national picture. I agree with everything that he said. I promise that I shall take only two minutes to draw attention to the fact that even in my constituency, St. Albans—a shire city, one of the wealthiest cities in the land—we have a housing benefit problem.

This morning, I received some figures from the housing office. I calculate that in St. Albans we have lost £40 million in rent subsidy since the present policy started, in 1990-91. Even in wealthy St. Albans, where house building and land are expensive, we could have used that money to build 1,000 new homes, which would have reduced our waiting list by half.

We have 6,000 tenancies, and 3,571 of those tenants are currently on housing benefit, which means that 45 per cent. are subsidising 55 per cent. A smaller number is subsidising a larger number—this year, to the tune of more than £7 million.

Dignity is an important aspect of this. People should not have to go begging by application form. There is a need for dignity and fairness. The poorest should not be subsidising the very poor.

2.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing the debate and using it to raise a matter of real importance, which I know is of concern to many hon. Members and to local authorities and tenants throughout the country. I know that my hon. Friend is concerned about this issue. He has been diligent in ensuring that it receives the attention that it deserves, and his early-day motion on the issue has attracted significant support. I thank him for his kind comments about me. I also noted the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard), who made an important and short contribution to the debate.

We have received a large volume of correspondence on this issue from hon. Members and individual council tenants. In replying to the debate, I want to shine some light on the Government's policy in this area. I intend to show that the Government's policy and our approach are entirely correct and proper. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby will accept that.

It may help if I explain briefly the system for subsidising council housing in England. The present system was established in 1990, by the previous Government. It pays subsidy to housing authorities to help them meet the costs of repairing and maintaining their housing stock, and it helps them meet the costs of their tenants' rebates. The calculation of that subsidy takes into account the costs of financing capital investment in the housing revenue account and notional rental income.

Under the present system, an authority's entitlement to subsidy is based on the housing element and the rebate element added together. Under the previous system, rent rebate subsidy was almost entirely funded by the Exchequer and was paid solely to meet the cost of housing benefit for council tenants. It may help if I briefly explain the system of housing subsidy before 1990, when the current system was introduced.

In the 1980s, the housing subsidy system involved assumptions about the level of rent income and the costs of managing, maintaining and servicing debt. The aim of the system was to estimate the subsidy that each council required if rent income fell short of reasonable costs. The system introduced the notional subsidy calculation for each authority. It used assumptions about rent levels and costs rather than using the real figures from the authorities' accounts.

It became apparent that many authorities no longer required the subsidy, because notional rents covered all the eligible costs. At the end of the 1980s, only around 100 councils were still in subsidy, with their housing costs, net of notional rent income, met by the Exchequer. The rest, who were in surplus, were able to keep their surpluses and could transfer them out of the housing revenue account to spend on other services, which was not fair to tenants.

It has always been difficult for the Government to control surpluses in housing subsidy and ensure that they are channelled to meet pressing housing needs. In pursuit of that aim—although they also had other motives—the previous Government introduced measures in the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 to bring rent rebates into the HRA and the subsidy calculation. Under the Act, any surplus from the basic notional calculation of rents, minus landlord costs, could be set against the Exchequer cost of rent rebates. The previous Government argued that the saving to the Exchequer could be diverted to other housing uses. However, that was not reflected in increased investment. In 1993-94, total public expenditure on housing in England was around £5 billion. In the current financial year, it is only £3.3 billion. The capital receipts initiative had started to redress that decline in planned spending.

The policy of netting off landlord surpluses against rent rebates has, not surprisingly, been unpopular with authorities, which regard it as depriving them of a valuable source of funds. The policy is often considered to result in those tenants not on rebates having to pay part of the rents of poorer tenants who are granted rebates.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby and the hon. Member for Taunton (Mrs. Ballard) said, it was unquestionably an objective of the previous Tory Government to force council rents up towards market levels. That policy was abandoned in 1995, because even the Conservatives recognised the consequences of the huge increase in the cost of housing benefit that flowed from it. My hon. Friend quoted the figures showing the small cost difference between what is produced by an increase or reduction in rent and the net effect to the Exchequer, because so much is offset by housing benefit. That clearly shows the mess that the previous Government got into with their policy of trying to force council tenants to pay market rents.

We have a different approach. We have no intention of forcing council rents up to market levels. That would be wrong and inconsistent with our policy of work incentives, because it would create problems of increased dependence on benefit and increased poverty traps. We are considering rent structures and the different subsidy systems that operate in different sectors.

We should not forget that average rents for local authority housing are £41 a week. That is lower than the figure for any other housing sector. While there is no similar subsidy arrangement for housing association or private tenants to that which takes back some of the cost of rent rebate subsidy for council tenants, the average rent levels paid by housing association and private tenants are significantly higher than those paid by council tenants.

Mr. Mitchell: This is the old silly argument. Council tenants are poorer: they receive half the average wage. There is more need, and the housing is allocated for social purposes.

Mr. Raynsford: At present, the average person who is allocated housing by a housing association or registered social landlord has economic and social characteristics similar to those who are allocated council housing. That is not surprising, because the vast majority of nominations must come from the council waiting list, so we are talking about people in similar circumstances.

In my hon. Friend's local authority area of North East Lincolnshire, council tenants pay an average weekly rent of £33.73 this year. People with new housing association assured tenancies pay an average of £48.70 a week. So there is a considerable difference between housing association rents and council rents. Private tenants in my hon. Friend's area do even worse: they pay an average of £55.51 each week. The pattern of rents nationally is much the same.

The level of Government subsidy that council tenants benefit from is understated. Although rent income within an authority's housing revenue account is shown at current value, a large element of expenditure—including interest charges on housing debt—reflects only the historic value of the debt. The interest charges, and consequently tenants' rents, do not fully reflect the current replacement value of the housing stock, let alone a market level of return on capital. In this respect, council tenants have a significant advantage compared with housing association or private tenants whose rents must reflect the market levels.

It is very difficult to draw simple comparisons between the different subsidy regimes that apply to council tenants as against housing association and private tenants receiving rent allowances. The common factor between rent rebates and rent allowances is that both are designed to protect those least able to pay. The tenant's entitlement to benefit is the same whether that tenant lives in a council house or a housing association property. Therefore, council tenants do not get a raw deal compared with housing association tenants. They receive substantial help with their housing costs from central Government, totalling some £3.8 billion in 1997-98.

Another argument often advanced—my hon. Friend alluded to it—by local authorities that are unhappy about the present regime is that it limits their ability to invest some of the surpluses from housing on maintaining or improving their housing stock. We recognise that there has been under-investment in housing stock in the past. That is why one of the first moves the new Government made was to make available through the capital receipts initiative nearly £750 million pounds of additional resources for investment in housing and housing-related regeneration in England this year and next.

From this total, North East Lincolnshire—covering my hon. Friend's constituency—will receive £324,000 this year and just over £1 million next year. Those sums are in addition to other allocations in respect of the authority's housing investment programme. I am sure that my hon. Friend, like many other Members whose authorities benefit from the capital receipts initiative, welcomes this initiative, which will help us to fulfil our manifesto commitment to reverse the serious problem of under-investment.

The argument that a change to the current arrangements for housing revenue account subsidy will release additional funds for investment has one fundamental flaw: the cost. It would have a price tag of about £1.3 billion. The Government's ability to target resources for housing investment would be reduced because that £1.3 billion would have to be compensated by savings elsewhere, given our commitment—which my hon. Friend recognised—to living within the inherited financial framework. That is the position we have adopted, and that is why we cannot reverse this decision in the immediate future.

However, I put it to my hon. Friend that we are aware of the many anomalies that exist within the framework for housing subsidies and that affect rent levels, and, in the context of our comprehensive spending review, we are making a careful study of all the implications of those different subsidy arrangements. We hope to draw some conclusions by the summer, and we shall publish proposals at that stage. We shall aim to ensure that there is a more coherent pattern of rents for those renting from landlords in the public and social housing sectors, and that those rents relate to people's ability to pay.

The Government are very concerned to avoid the problems of poverty traps and work disincentives that impact adversely on many low-income householders who rent their homes from local authorities, housing associations and private landlords. It is important that we have a rent and subsidy system that addresses the problems of benefit dependency and disincentives to work, as well as creating a framework for genuine fairness between tenants.

I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that these issues are not easily addressed. We shall consider them carefully before we reach firm conclusions about taking forward the arrangements. As I have said, we shall make our proposals clear in the context of conclusions from the comprehensive spending review later this year.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Victim Support Week

1. Mr. Miller: What contribution his Department has made to Victim Support week. [30337]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): The main event of last week was the launch of the new national telephone helpline called Victim Supportline. It was made possible by the Government's decision to increase Victim Support's annual grant by £1 million a year. Extra money has also gone towards improving front-line services for victims and witnesses. Those were also promoted during Victim Support week.

Mr. Miller: I am sure that the House will congratulate those involved in Victim Support on their tremendous work. Will my hon. Friend take into account the views of victims and ensure that they are fully informed during the progress of cases? Will he also look at the needs of the families of victims of road deaths and examine what is happening in other countries, especially Switzerland, in relation to such families' needs?

Mr. Michael: I support my hon. Friend's comments about the volunteers who do such excellent work. We certainly want the system to keep people much better informed about the progress of cases that involve them and we want to keep victims better informed. My hon. Friend gave a specific example and I should be interested to look at the case that he cites. Perhaps he could supply me with information. With colleagues at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, we want to do all that we can to recognise the damage to the families of victims of road incidents.

Sir Sydney Chapman: In commending the work of the Victim Support scheme and paying tribute to those who operate my local scheme in Barnet, may I ask the Minister whether he agrees that the best commitment that the Government could show to this worthwhile charity would be to continue to increase its funding, which I think has gone up from a derisory £5,000 in 1979 to £11.5 million last year?

Mr. Michael: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's endorsement for the action of my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Prime Minister in increasing Victim Support's grant during the current financial year.

Crime

2. Mr. Rammell: If he will make a statement on the proposed statutory role for local councils in tackling crime. [30338]

Mr. Michael: The Crime and Disorder Bill will create radical change by requiring local authorities and the police jointly to conduct an audit of local crime and disorder, to draw up a local strategy and to agree targets for cutting crime. This process will involve local people and a wide range of other key partners. Other changes will help cut youth crime and strengthen the powers of the courts.

Mr. Rammell: In my constituency, much good community safety work has been undertaken by the local council and the police working in partnership on issues such as closed circuit television and on developing policies to deal with racial harassment and domestic violence. The most recent development is a one-stop drop-in centre to provide advice and information for young people. All that has been achieved by good will. Does the Minister agree, however, that much more could be achieved if the principle of joint working were underpinned by statutory force?

Mr. Michael: Yes, and that is what we shall provide in the Crime and Disorder Bill, which the House will shortly have the opportunity to debate. A partnership between the police and each local authority and local community has been welcomed by all parties.

Mr. Clappison: The Minister will recall that, when shadow Home Secretary, his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister promised to provide more places in local authority secure accommodation. How many new places have been provided? Have any been provided?

Mr. Michael: I think that the hon. Gentleman is getting confused. What happened was that in February 1991 the Conservative Government promised to provide 171 additional places. That was later revised to 170, but they failed to provide them, and the places have still not been provided. We will keep our promises.

Prison Population

3. Mr. Gordon Prentice: What steps he is taking to reduce the prison population. [30340]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): Within the sentencing framework set by Parliament, who is sent to prison and for how long is a matter for the courts. Prison is the only appropriate punishment for many offenders. The Government are also committed to providing more effective and tougher community punishments.

Mr. Prentice: I hear what the Home Secretary says, but is there not a danger of the prison population spiralling out of control? The official Home Office mid-range projections take the prison population from 65,000 this year to 83,000 in seven years' time—which is double the 1992 level—and the top-range projection is for 93,000 prisoners. Sending all those people to prison costs the rest of us an arm and a leg, as a top-security prisoner costs us £35,000 a year, and a category B or category C local prisoner costs us £17,000 a year. May I urge my right hon. Friend to do all that he can to bring down the prison population, as quickly as humanly possible, and to levels that are commonplace in the rest of the European Union?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend must bear in mind the inheritance that we suffered from the Conservatives. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, no."] Our levels of burglary, vehicle crime, robbery and assault are the highest in western Europe—higher, even, than those in the United States. Against that background, it is hardly surprising that our prison population is rising. However, there is no danger of the prison population getting out of control—per head of population, it has only recently reached the level in Scotland.

Mr. Quentin Davies: If the Government seriously want to reduce the prison population, would it not be a good idea to stop introducing an endless raft of unnecessary, bossy, nannying and tyrannical rules and regulations—progressively criminalising perfectly honest and honourable activities, from pistol shooting competitions to eating beef on the bone? In the light of yesterday's countryside rally, does the Home Secretary realise that, if he—not to mention his dreadful Government—goes much further along that road, and reduces the drink-driving limit and bans fox hunting, he will progressively bring the law into disrepute? Is it not about time that the Government thought before they regulated?

Mr. Straw: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the fox hunting Bill—the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill—is a private Member's measure. He knows also that there is overwhelming public support for the crime and disorder agenda that the Government are vigorously pursuing.

Mr. Grocott: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that, whenever he mentions the previous Government's legacy, he is met with jeers from the Conservative Benches? Does he recall, as I do, that for 11 years—from 1979, until she was thrown out in 1990—Mrs. Thatcher repeatedly blamed the previous Labour Government? Will he therefore continue blaming the previous Tory Government until at least 2008, when we can perhaps review the policy?

Mr. Straw: I concur with that. As I am a fair-minded Home Secretary—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad that that has approbation from both sides of the House. As I am a fair-minded Home Secretary, we shall continue blaming the previous Government as long as it is justified for us to do so. The facts are that crime doubled under the previous Government, whereas the number of people convicted of those crimes fell by one third.

Mr. Alan Clark: Is not the most effective way of reducing the prison population not to prosecute wrongdoing? Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied with the application of discretionary powers by the Metropolitan police in that respect? What input does his Department have on that application?

Mr. Straw: The previous Government's policy was not to prosecute wrongdoing—as the right hon. Gentleman says—which is why crime rose. Far too many criminals felt that they could get away with committing crimes. I have no knowledge of what the right hon. Gentleman was referring to in particular, although I should be happy to receive a letter from him. He should nevertheless have caught up with the fact that decisions on prosecution are now made not by police but by the independent Crown Prosecution Service.

Voluntary Sector

4. Mrs. Brinton: What measures he will bring forward to improve the relationship between the Government and the voluntary sector. [30341]

Mr. Michael: The Government will strengthen partnership between government and the voluntary sector. We are working towards a compact that will set out the principles that should govern the relationship. I am delighted to have the support of Ministers across the Government for that initiative.

Mrs. Brinton: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply, which will certainly be welcomed not just in my constituency of Peterborough but in many constituencies where voluntary organisations are working very hard to combat social exclusion. Can he assure me that the compact will set out exactly what needs to be done in practical terms to make the partnership work and that it will be available to all organisations and not just those that shout the loudest?

Mr. Michael: The compact will establish the relationship and the consideration that the Government should give voluntary organisations—and vice versa—nationally and locally. My hon. Friend refers to social exclusion. The priority that the Government are giving the issue touches on the charitable object of many voluntary organisations and there has been a general welcome for the way in which the policy has developed.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Does the Minister not understand that his expressions of support, and those of his right hon. Friend, for voluntary organisations and charities ring hollow? Does he not remember that, in last year's Budget, which was only a matter of months ago, the Government hit charities hard by undermining their pension funds so that volunteers' contributions had to be moved from the doing of good works to bolster pension schemes? If the Minister is serious about supporting voluntary organisations and charities, will he undertake to ensure that, in this year's Budget in a couple of weeks' time, they are reimbursed for that raid on their pension funds?

Mr. Michael: The right hon. Gentleman's intervention strikes me as a rather desperate attempt to drive a wedge between the Government and the voluntary sector. He will not succeed because many voluntary organisations find that, after years of trying to pursue their charitable objects under a Government who were not interested in most of their priorities, the present Government share their concern to improve society, so they are working in a totally different atmosphere.

Prison and Probation Services

5. Mr. Cranston: What plans he has to ensure integration between the prison and probation services. [30342]

12. Siobhain McDonagh: What plans he has to integrate the prison and probation services. [30350]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Ms Joyce Quin): As my right hon. Friend announced last July, I am leading a prisons and probation review into the efficiency and effectiveness of the ways in which the two services work together. We shall be examining options for improving their performance as a basis on which to consult widely about the future of both services.

Mr. Cranston: Does my hon. Friend not agree that one of the advantages of the two services working together relates to public perception, since community sentences under the supervision of the probation service are too often perceived as a soft option? Does she agree that, by working together, the two services can change that perception and make community sentences a tough option?

Ms Quin: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Both services are very much concerned with public protection and reducing offending. By working more closely together, they will be able to find out better what works and provide a better service to the public.

Siobhain McDonagh: Given the separateness of the prison and probation services, and the antipathy within those organisations to working together, how can we ensure that the public's desire to see them working together will be met?

Ms Quin: So far during the review, both services have shown a great willingness to work together and address some of their differences in approach. I should also like to pay tribute to the work that they do jointly in delivering courses in prisons, where prison officers and probation officers work together.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Will the Minister commend activities in Surrey, where an extremely enlightened and hard-working probation service, working with the police, is making extremely good progress on punishment in the community? However, the vindictiveness of the financial settlement makes collaborative working in Surrey all the more difficult. Will the Minister look at the way in which the funding formulae hit Surrey, which is facing difficult decisions that had not been anticipated?

Ms Quin: I am happy to join the right hon. Lady in paying tribute to the Surrey probation service, which I visited recently to look at the Springboard project. However, I am astonished by her comments on funding. The settlement was drawn up by the Conservative Government of which she was a part. We are examining the future options in our comprehensive spending review.

Mr. Soley: Will my hon. Friend give a high priority to training in the prison and probation services? A higher priority for training is needed in the Prison Service. Probation officers must always be able to recognise signs of child abuse, mental breakdown and possible violence, particularly when they are visiting homes. If we lose that, people will be put at risk.

Ms Quin: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Prison officers want their jobs to be more varied and challenging. Training is an important part of that. We are also addressing the vacuum left by the previous Government in relation to probation training. We have said that there should continue to be a professional qualification, which can offer a great deal to the criminal justice system.

Disorder and Antisocial Behaviour

6. Mr. Coaker: What measures he is proposing to tackle disorder and antisocial behaviour. [30343]

Mr. Straw: There are tough new measures in the Crime and Disorder Bill to tackle such unacceptable conduct, which causes misery to so many communities. They include antisocial behaviour orders, child safety orders, local child curfews and statutory crime prevention partnerships between local authorities and the police.

Mr. Coaker: Will my right hon. Friend reassure constituents such as mine in Gedling that the measures in the Crime and Disorder Bill will become law as soon as possible? Antisocial behaviour and disorder on estates are making many people prisoners in their homes. Will my right hon. Friend reassure them that action will be taken to deal with the repeat offending that seems to be so common?

Mr. Straw: I give my hon. Friend that reassurance. Sadly, the previous Administration failed comprehensively to deal with such disorder. We pushed repeatedly for all-party agreement on such orders. I shall be interested to see whether, after 18 years of refusing to act, the Opposition back our proposals.

Miss Kirkbride: Does the Secretary of State have any advice for my constituent who is subject to visits to his farm by animal rights protesters because of his export of turkeys? Some of them are reasonable people who want to exercise their legitimate right to protest, but there are others who behave irresponsibly and abuse his grandchildren and his farm workers. He is at the mercy of such protesters, who come almost every week to abuse his staff. He has found that they cannot be dealt with under current law.

Mr. Straw: I have every sympathy with the hon. Lady's constituent. I should be happy to meet her to discuss the issue in further detail. I am aware of a similar situation just outside Witney. Some of the actions of the so-called animal rights protesters are outrageous. She will know that some of them have been convicted of offences that amount to terrorism. They call themselves animal rights terrorists and that is how they behave. The attitude of police forces varies. As the Thames Valley police has shown in response to the incidents near Witney, there is no reason why effective action cannot be taken to ensure that people can go about their lawful duties, as they have every right to.

Mr. Mullin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a good deal of antisocial behaviour is caused by out-of-control youths with air weapons? Does he have any plans to review the ownership of air weapons?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend will recall that in our evidence to the Cullen inquiry, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I talked not about the banning of air weapons, for which we have no proposals, but about the need for better control over their use. I hope that Conservative Members share that concern. Like my hon. Friend, I personally see no possible purpose in people who live in high-density urban areas shooting air weapons out of back-bedroom windows at human, rather than animal, targets. We shall certainly address that. But we need to take one step at a time; we must get the firearms legislation fully implemented first.

Mr. Greenway: Why should anyone take seriously the Government's claim to support rural communities when they have cut funding for closed circuit television cameras to a paltry £1 million this year, just when market towns and large villages believe that it is their turn to receive support to install cameras to fight disorder and vandalism in their areas?

Mr. Straw: There is the widest possible support for this new Government's crime and disorder agenda, which is one of the many reasons why we did so well in many rural areas. As for the hon. Gentleman's main point, I simply congratulate him on his chutzpah and cheek in daring to complain about the levels of cash allocated for closed circuit television for next year, since those are the exact allocations that were agreed by his Government.

Jacqui Smith: I commend to my right hon. Friend the actions of a group of parents in Redditch, who have voluntarily organised a curfew for their children following some disorder last summer. Will he tell my constituents how the Government's plans will support such responsible community action?

Mr. Straw: I know a little of my hon. Friend's constituency, and visited it last year. I very warmly congratulate those parents. It is clear that almost every parent is backing our proposals for child curfew and child protection orders, recognising that parents, first, have to accept responsibility for their children.

Private Prisons

7. Mr. Bob Russell: If he will make a statement on his plans for the future use of private prisons. [30345]

Ms Quin: On 19 June, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced that the Prison Service was to examine whether prisons managed by the private sector could be returned to direct management on value-for-money grounds, as well as exploring methods of using private finance to achieve value for money, with the public sector providing custodial services.

Mr. Russell: Will the Minister advise the House on whether she anticipates that, at the end of the Parliament, more of the Prison Service will be privatised? Does she agree with me and with the Home Secretary's words that it is morally repugnant for people imprisoned by the state to be treated as little more than commodities for profit by private firms?

Ms Quin: Very similar questions were answered by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary at our first Home Affairs Question Time. Obviously, I cannot anticipate the outcome of the investigation which I have just announced, although a great deal depends on the value-for-money aspect to which I referred.

Mr. Bercow: In view of Ministers' earlier dogmatic and ideological opposition to private prisons, will the Minister tell the House when she first made a speech, wrote an article or issued a press release suggesting that there could be some merit in private prisons? Is there such an occasion? Can she name it? When was it?

Ms Quin: The process that I have announced, whereby the Prison Service, prison unions and people who have an interest are examining the issues, is the valuable one. We shall draw conclusions from it when the study is complete.

Electoral Systems

8. Mr. Walter: How many different electoral systems will be in operation in the United Kingdom by May 2002. [30346]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): Taking into account all existing proposals, five.

Mr. Walter: I have been involved in a number of discussions with constituents over recent weeks about proposals for the European Parliament elections. My constituents are mesmerised when I go on to tell them about all the other proposed electoral systems. Will the Minister reassure the House that, if the Government bring forward proposals for this House, the essential link between a Member and an individual constituency will be preserved? Perhaps he could do the decent thing and reassure my constituents that there will be no change in the electoral arrangements for the House.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman must have missed the fact that Lord Jenkins's commission is currently looking at what might be an alternative system for electing the House of Commons. Once he has deliberated and come up with a proposal, we are committed to a referendum. The hon. Gentleman's constituents will then have the opportunity to look at what systems are on offer and, instead of listening to him, make up their own minds, which in my opinion would be wise.

Mr. Linton: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a disaster if the Government tried to impose the same voting system on every tier of government? The different systems have not been introduced for any reason of self-interest—quite the reverse. It is the Conservative party which might otherwise be seriously under-represented in the European Parliament and, indeed, not represented at all in the Scottish Parliament or the Welsh assembly.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is right. There are several proposals to change the constitution of this country in line with public opinion and, in respect of electoral systems, we are committed to an appropriate electoral system for each layer of government. At the end of the day, people appreciate that that is the best way of achieving these things.

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister remind the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) that three of those five systems were introduced by the Conservatives, including both the single transferable vote and the regional list system in Northern Ireland? Will he recognise that, in the next few days, his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has the opportunity to ensure that, in the European elections, there is a combination of fairness to voters in terms of the outcome of the election and the retention of a role for the voter in deciding which individual is elected by going for an open list system?

Mr. Howarth: The right hon. Gentleman is right to remind the House that the Conservative party introduced a number of different systems, most recently the d'Hondt system for the Northern Ireland peace forum. He will also remember that, until 1923, his own party was in favour of the first-past-the-post system. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made it clear that we are still listening to the debate on to the most appropriate divisor for the European Parliamentary Elections Bill and, in due course, he will make an announcement.

Ms Abbott: Does the Minister accept that the closed list system of proportional representation proposed for the forthcoming European elections is possibly the worst conceivable system of PR, combining as it does breaking the link between Members and their constituencies and taking away powers from local parties? Will he give the House an assurance that this is the first and last time that system will be used in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady has to understand—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hon. Friend."] My hon. Friend has to understand that parliamentary constituencies do not apply to the European Parliament in same way as, for example, she represents a parliamentary constituency. Increasingly, Europe is a Europe of the regions and the new proposed system will respond to that. As for the specific system, I have already pointed out that we are listening to representations—not least to those made in the House—and an announcement on the result of that will be made in due course.

Electronic Tagging

9. Miss McIntosh: What savings in the prisons budget he estimates will accrue from the extension of electronic tagging. [30347]

Ms Quin: It is estimated that home detention curfew may avoid the need for expenditure on about 3,000 new prison places, which would have cost £90 million per year. Other uses of electronic monitoring, if applied nationally, could also impact on demand for prison places.

Miss McIntosh: Although we welcome the zeal of converts to electronic tagging, do the Government appreciate that it is better for the courts to decide who should be electronically tagged and which prisoners are eligible for early release? Will the Minister agree to extend electronic tagging to child curfew orders, which the Home Secretary mentioned earlier, and to persistent sex offenders?

Ms Quin: Given that it is people who are coming to the end of their sentence who are eligible for home detention curfew, we believe that it is quite right for the decision to be taken by prison authorities, together with experts who can make the appropriate risk assessment.

Mr. Bermingham: I welcome tagging and anything else that reduces the number of people who are incarcerated in prison—sometimes for long periods, despite the fact that the punitive impact of a short sentence would be equally effective—but will my hon. Friend consider other methods, such as the reintroduction of suspended sentences, which were extremely effective in the past?

Ms Quin: We are considering such methods, but we believe that electronic monitoring can provide a structured transition from custody to release during which, we hope, it will help to stop people reoffending in future.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Can the Minister assure the House that no prisoners serving sentences for rape, serious sexual offences or child abuse will be allowed out early under any tagging programme?

Ms Quin: As I have told the right hon. Gentleman before, the most important consideration is risk assessment. We are, in this instance, talking about people who are serving four years or fewer and who will be released anyway. We believe that we have a responsibility to make that release as structured as possible, but we shall be extremely careful about risk assessment in the cases that he mentions.

Criminal Justice System (Delays)

10. Mr. Sheerman: What measures he is taking to tackle delays in the criminal justice system. [30348]

Mr. Straw: The Government are acting to tackle delay throughout the criminal justice system. The Crime and Disorder Bill provides for statutory time limits that will be tougher for young offenders than for adults, and tougher still for persistent young offenders.

Mr. Sheerman: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that. I am sure that my constituents and people who want a Government of law and order are very happy that we have moved so quickly to implement what we said in our election manifesto. He knows better than most of the number of vested interests in the legal system, so will he be vigilant and keep a monitoring brief on judges, barristers, solicitors and the Crown Prosecution Service, all of which seem to have a vested interest in delay and delay, as that means more money for them?

Mr. Straw: I accept what my hon. Friend says. Not only are we keeping an eye on the vested interests, but we shall be setting them clear targets. A number of magistrates courts have already proved that our policy can be implemented. Teesside magistrates court, for example, has introduced a fast-track system for young offenders to reduce the time between charges being made and any trial to six weeks—or 42 days—which more than halves the time that it usually takes to deal with persistent offenders. I congratulate Teesside on that.

Mr. Soames: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that justice delayed is justice denied, and that everything that he can do to speed up the dispensation of justice will be welcome? Will he and his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General consider carefully whether the Crown Prosecution Service has adequate financial resources? I recently visited the CPS local office in Horsham, which is doing an extremely good job, but there is no doubt that it is short of barristers and short of money. I should be grateful if he could tell me what he can do about that.

Mr. Straw: I shall certainly write to the hon. Gentleman on the specific point that he raises. He may know that a major inquiry into the running of the CPS by the former High Court judge Sir Ian Glidewell has been under way since just after the election. It will report shortly and, I believe, lead to major improvements in the efficiency and effectiveness of the CPS.

Criminal Justice System

11. Mr. Mackinlay: What plans he has to review his Department's responsibilities in relation to the criminal justice system. [30349]

Mr. Straw: As part of the comprehensive spending review, I am chairing a cross-departmental review of the criminal justice system, to consider ways in which the delivery of the Government's objectives for the criminal justice system as a whole can be improved. There are no plans to make changes in departmental responsibilities.

Mr. Mackinlay: Will my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary reflect on the fact that, when the Government's credentials as a modern and constitutionally reforming Administration come to be tested, one consideration will be whether they have been able to restructure the criminal justice system so as to make it much more answerable to the House of Commons? In addition to its core duties in relation to criminal justice, his Department is cluttered by other duties. Moreover, his criminal justice duties are shared with the Lord Chancellor, who combines the post of Minister, judge, Speaker of the House of Lords and interior designer. Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a real case for having a Minister of justice who is answerable to the democratically elected House of Commons?

Mr. Straw: As I said, we have no plans to make changes in departmental responsibilities. I believe that we shall be judged at the next general election by whether we have delivered at a local level on our crime and disorder pledges.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: We all hear what the Home Secretary says, but we all saw Government Front Benchers furiously trying not to laugh their legs off at the Lord Chancellor. This is none the less a serious matter. Given the number of staff that the Lord Chancellor is accumulating at vast public expense, when will the Government announce the setting up of a Department of justice at the expense of the Home Office?

Mr. Straw: I have always enjoyed the humour of my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), and I have made it clear that there are no plans to make changes in departmental responsibilities. We believe that what matters is the ability of the three Departments involved in the criminal justice system—the Law Officers' Department, the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Home Office—to co-operate effectively, as we are doing, to deliver improved efficiency on the ground.

Prisons (Drug Testing)

13. Mr. Timms: When he last carried out a review of the mandatory spot tests for drugs in prisons. [30351]

Mr. George Howarth: Mandatory drug testing is being reviewed within the broader assessment of the Prison Service drug strategy that I have commissioned. All relevant issues are being explored.

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend will be aware that some prisoners and former prisoners have alleged that the current mandatory drug testing regime provides an incentive for prisoners using cannabis to switch to heroin, to reduce the chance of being caught. Is that allegation being considered in the current review? Should we not as quickly as possible give prisoners access to voluntary testing and other help, including follow-up help outside prison once their sentences are completed, so that those who want to break free from drug misuse can do so?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that the statistics suggesting that there could be a perverse incentive in the mandatory drug testing regime to move from cannabis to heroin are under examination. Sixty-three establishments are involved in various kinds of drug treatment and it is proposed that about £7.3 million be spent on the problem next year.

Mr. Green: Does the Minister acknowledge that there is a terrible air of complacency about his reply on this important subject? Will he at the very least assure the House that, when the inevitable review that he has set up finally reports, some action will emerge from it on the smuggling of drugs into prison, because we all know that that is how they get there? Without action on that front, any words from the Government will simply seem hypocritical.

Mr. Howarth: The mandatory drug testing system was introduced by the previous Government; there are difficulties with it, but we welcome it. When the review is completed, we will consider what is the most appropriate action. Let me make it absolutely clear, in case the hon. Gentleman needs any reassurance, that we do not think it acceptable that drugs are smuggled into prisons and taken by prisoners, so we will do what is necessary to stop it. In the meantime, we must have a clear picture of what exactly is going on, so that we can consider how to deal with it.

Budget Allocation

14. Mr. Simon Hughes: What proportion of his budget is allocated to (a) prevention of crime and (b) detection and punishment of crime; and what plans he has to change this allocation. [30352]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): It is impossible to identify the overall level of funding for crime prevention. Although £19.3 million is specifically allocated, the police budget, which is more than £7.2 billion, and other resources also contribute to both crime prevention and detection.

Mr. Hughes: I am sure that the Minister will accept that the more we can prevent crime, the less we will have to spend on detection and prosecution. As part of the review that the Home Secretary has quite properly instigated, will two specific matters be considered?

First, if the figures are right, about a quarter of all prisoners have themselves been victims of abuse, so if we can prevent the physical and sexual abuse of youngsters we will be more likely to prevent their offending subsequently. Secondly, if we can find useful activities—not only work—for youngsters outside school, and outside school hours, we will prevent the huge amount of crime that is carried out between about 4 pm and 10 pm by 14 to 20-year-olds, who could be better employed doing other things.

Mr. O'Brien: All I can say is that I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bill O'Brien: Will my hon. Friend take note of the situation faced by the police in West Yorkshire? When he considers the police budget, will he remember that the capping system has meant that the charge for band D properties in the area has been reduced by 57p per annum? That will have an effect on the monitoring and prevention of crime. Given the extra resources that have been allocated by the Home Office to crime prevention, the funding for West Yorkshire appears to be an anomaly. Will the Minister investigate that serious situation?

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I will investigate that important matter for my hon. Friend and write to him.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has the Minister been able to ascertain what will be spent in real terms on new policing, or has there been a cut? Certainly, Dorset police believe that when they have paid for everything that goes up every year, such as pensions, they will have to make cuts. Local authorities are trying to help the police by, for example, putting in cameras, but they are now finding that they cannot even bid for town centre cameras, because there is no matching funding. Will the Minister consider that problem carefully?

Mr. O'Brien: Police expenditure has been targeted to rise by 3.7 per cent. and the figures are clear. On the subject of crime prevention, the Crime and Disorder Bill and the new crime reduction partnerships will ensure that the police are more closely involved with local councils in work on crime reduction. However, the hon. Gentleman must consider the whole budget. It would be wrong to consider only the money allocated to crime prevention under a single budget head. Crime prevention has a role across billions of pounds of budgets, and the Government are committed to making crime prevention a priority across our whole budget.

Crime Against Businesses

15. Ms Blears: What steps he is taking to combat crime against businesses, with particular reference to inner-city areas. [30353]

Mr. Michael: The Crime and Disorder Bill requires local authorities and the police together to conduct an audit of local crime and disorder and to develop a strategy to cut crime. They are required to involve the wider community, including the business community, in that process. We are also working with business to tackle specific problems, such as retail and car crime.

Ms Blears: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. In cities such as Salford it is crucial that businesses, which are the key to economic regeneration, feel safe and protected. I know it is difficult, but has my hon. Friend considered involving businesses in some of the community punishments, such as the reparation order, that make the people who commit crimes face their effects on the prosperity of the whole community?

Mr. Michael: Yes. My hon. Friend is right. I visited Milton Keynes recently, as did my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and saw the way in which the business community is productively engaged with the people who are involved in the correction of offenders. We visit various cities—my right hon. Friend will visit Salford on 2 April—and such visits give us the opportunity to discuss the issue with business. I am pleased by the way in which business is engaging with our agenda to cut crime.

Mr. Hawkins: The Minister will be aware that a number of crimes against businesses have, sadly, spread from inner-city areas to other urban areas. Several businesses in my constituency have recently been targeted by ram raiders. Will the Minister confirm that he is urgently liaising with police forces to tackle that serious crime against businesses?

Mr. Michael: Yes. In recent weeks, I have had several discussions with police forces about smaller town and rural crime. Those problems will be addressed by our proposals, because we need a partnership between the police, local authorities and the communities in smaller urban and rural areas as well as in the cities.

Prison Medical Service

16. Helen Jones: What plans he has to improve the prison medical service. [30354]

Ms Quin: The Prison Service and the national health service have established a joint working group to advise Ministers on the options for improving prisoners' health care. The group will be looking in particular at whether responsibility should be transferred to the NHS, as recommended by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons.

Helen Jones: I thank the Minister for that reply, but does she agree that one of the main obstacles to improving the service is the lack of suitably qualified staff? As the Home Office's own figures show that, in a service with a large number of mentally disordered offenders, only 21 of 197 doctors are members of the Royal College of Psychiatrists, and only 34 per cent. of health care managers are registered nurses, will she assure the House that the working party will consider, as a matter of urgency, the need to recruit more qualified staff into the prison medical service, and to provide an adequate career path to retain them in that service?

Ms Quin: My hon. Friend makes important points, and I pay tribute to her for the keen and detailed interest that she has taken in this matter. We are very keen to improve training in the prison health service, and the working group is considering that as one of its priorities. It is a very important issue to make progress on if we are really to respond to the recommendations that the chief inspector made in his report "Patient or Prisoner?".

Alcohol (Young People)

18. Mr. Bradshaw: What steps he is taking to reduce the number of young people who engage in under-age consumption of alcohol. [30356]

Mr. George Howarth: The Government are committed to tackling under-age drinking. Our statement of 17 July last year, a copy of which is in the Library, set out our views on the action needed by all concerned parties to tackle alcohol abuse by young people under the age of 18.

Mr. Bradshaw: Following the Minister's visit to Exeter last week, he will be aware of the great concern locally about the phenomenon known as the booze cruise, which exploits the current loophole in the law and allows alcohol to be sold to under-age children as long as they are on a moving boat. Does not that fly in the face of our desire to curb under-age drinking, and what is he going to do about it?

Mr. Howarth: As recently as last week, my hon. Friend and I visited his constituency to talk to people who had been involved in such cruises. I am looking very carefully at what all the people who were worried about that issue said, and considering what action will be appropriate. One aspect that we can look at immediately is whether the operator concerned is in breach of his sailing licence.

Mrs. Lait: Further to that, does the Minister share my concern that under-age drinkers have access to cheap alcohol because of the great prevalence of bootlegged and smuggled alcohol? Does he agree that the multi-disciplinary approach to stemming that tide of alcohol is the best one possible, and will he guarantee that police forces involved in trying to stem that tide will receive the resources that they need?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady is clearly right. As any of us know from our own constituencies, there is a problem in that people go abroad, bring back various forms of alcohol and sell it to young people. I agree that a multi-disciplinary or multi-agency approach is a very good way of tackling that problem, and we are committed to such an approach. It shows the value of working in partnership to try to eradicate such problems.

Human Rights Bill

19. Mrs. May: If parish councils are among those organisations whose acts and omissions it is intended should be able to be challenged under the Human Rights Bill. [30357]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Although it will be a matter for the courts, we think it likely that parish councils will be regarded as public authorities.

Mrs. May: I thank the Minister for that reply, although it gives some cause for concern in the following respect.

The Government have already had to undertake reviews of the application of the Human Rights Bill in two important areas—its implications for the press and for the Churches—and the Home Secretary has undertaken to consult in those two areas because the Government have discovered that the Bill's implications may not be what they originally thought that they would be. Therefore, will the Government now accept that, as I believe, there is a very real need to review the way in which the Human Rights Bill will affect other public authorities, such as parish councils, which form such an important part of our village community, and will the Minister undertake to consult and review the implications for those important parts of our village communities?

Mr. O'Brien: The Bill does not change the substance of convention rights; it only changes access to them in our courts. Broadly, we wish to ensure that all bodies for whose actions the United Kingdom Government are answerable are treated as public authorities under the Bill. The Government are committed to bringing people's rights home from Strasbourg, whereas most Tories appear to want to keep power under the European convention on human rights across the channel, in Strasbourg. The question needs to be asked: why do the Conservatives seek to deny people access to their rights, and why are they so determined to keep power in Strasbourg?

Fiona Mactaggart: Does my hon. Friend agree that giving everyone in the United Kingdom access to local jurisdiction over human rights helps to bring people together? Does he share my view that it is perturbing to hear people pressing for sectional interests to get a pass out of the Human Rights Bill—which of course they will not get, because we have an international treaty obligation in that regard? We should encourage people in the Churches, the media and local authorities of all kinds, including parish councils, to recognise that they have a responsibility to respect the human rights of others.

Mr. O'Brien: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Bill will ensure that there is greater respect for human rights in this country, and will raise Britain's status in the world as a country that respects human rights.

Mr. Gibb: Given the limited budgets of parish councils and the limited scope for parish councils to engage in abusing human rights—certainly in my constituency—is there not a case for specifically excluding parish councils from that ludicrous legislation?

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand that the convention currently applies to public authorities anyway. We are not changing the substance of that. We are ensuring that people have greater access to their rights. For the life of me I do not understand why Opposition Members are so opposed to allowing British citizens access in their own courts to their own rights.

Internet (Racist and Anti-Semitic Material)

20. Mr. Dismore: If he will make a statement concerning the use of the internet to spread racist and anti-Semitic propaganda. [30358]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government deplore the distribution of racist material via the internet. Provided that it falls within our jurisdiction, material passing over the internet is subject to the same laws as material distributed by other means.

Mr. Dismore: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are more than 600 anti-Semitic and racist sites on the internet, many of which promote holocaust denial? The internet is readily accessible to young people. Bearing in mind the transnational nature of the internet, will he take the opportunity of Britain's European Union presidency to raise the problem with our European partners and to work with them to find a way of tackling this growing menace?

Mr. O'Brien: Indeed, we are already doing that. We condemn such material on the internet. The National Criminal Intelligence Service has been in close liaison with other countries to combat internet abuse, and the G7 action plan on high-tech crime commits us to developing closer links to combat internet crime even more effectively.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Is the Minister aware of the related problem of defamation or libel on the internet? As he observed, the problem is one of jurisdiction. Does he realise that it is possible to defame people in the foulest terms and for them to have no remedy, if the internet service provider is situated abroad? When he undertakes discussions with his European colleagues on racism and anti-Semitism, will he also discuss the problem of defamation or libel?

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman is right. It is increasingly being recognised what an impact the internet can have on the lives of all of us, and on crime and civil torts such as defamation. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary discussed these matters in December with G8 colleagues. As the discussions move forward, the international community will increasingly realise that the only way to tackle these issues is through international co-operation.

Young Offender Teams

22. Mr. Linton: What powers he intends to give to the proposed young offender teams; and if he will make a statement. [30360]

Mr. Michael: The Crime and Disorder Bill places duties rather than powers on youth offending teams. The teams will co-ordinate youth justice services in their area. They will play a key role in working with young offenders in the community from the point of arrest to completion of sentence.

Mr. Linton: Does my hon. Friend agree that youth offending teams will have to work hard to re-establish the credibility of cautions, given that many young offenders receive up to six or seven cautions? Does he support the work of the Thames Valley police, who have turned the caution from a five-minute formality into something more like an hour-long ordeal in what they call restorative justice?

Mr. Michael: I certainly commend the actions of the Thames Valley police in encouraging young people who are being cautioned to understand the damage that they have done to others. The credibility of the caution system has been completely undermined in recent years. That is why we are replacing it with a final warning system. Not only will young people be told that their offending must stop but there will be intervention, action and community involvement for them and their families in order to stop their pattern of offending.

Antisocial Behaviour

23. Mr. Amess: What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of ways of dealing with antisocial behaviour. [30361]

Mr. Michael: Antisocial behaviour can grow out of control unless it is nipped in the bud—particularly with young offenders. Those problems have grown out of control in recent years. This Government have acted swiftly to reform the youth justice system to make young people face up to the consequences of their own behaviour and to make them realise that the most effective way to deal with antisocial behaviour is to be firm, fair and swift.

Mr. Amess: Has the hon. Gentleman noticed that at times the whole country seems to be covered in graffiti—whether they are on road signs, on the tube or on walls? There is a particular problem in Chalkwell ward in my constituency of Southend, West—a ward that the Conservatives won from the Liberal Democrats last week. Will the Minister tell the House what effective measures are in place to apprehend those vandals who continually indulge in antisocial behaviour through acts of graffiti?

Mr. Michael: I am not sure which of those two parties the hon. Gentleman blames for the graffiti problem. We intend to nip things in the bud by encouraging partnership between police and local authorities in order to recognise problems as they begin to grow. We will not allow problems to develop—as has happened in recent years—to the point where it is impossible to put the genie back in the bottle. We intend to tackle those problems.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As the guardian of the interests of Back Benchers, you will be aware that it is traditional to have a St. David's day debate around 1 March, when Welsh Members of Parliament may raise any issues relating to Wales. I am sure that it will not have escaped your notice that this year there is no arrangement or provision for such a debate. Today we shall consider the remaining stages of the Government of Wales Bill in Committee, which is hardly the same thing.

My point of order concerns whether you have received any explanation of why there is no such debate. If not, is the absence of a St. David's day debate not a massive and calculated insult to Wales? Does it not signal the beginning of the cynical and deliberate marginalisation of Welsh Members in the House that we predicted would follow devolution? Madam Speaker, as you are the defender of Back-Bench interests—not least those of Welsh Members—is that not something that you deplore?

Madam Speaker: The business of the House is not a matter for me: the conduct of business of the House is my responsibility. This matter should have been referred to the usual channels some weeks ago. Indeed, it should have been pressed on the Leader of the House last Thursday during business questions. However, I notice that the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who leads for the Opposition in considering the Government of Wales Bill, is proudly wearing his daffodil. I must be even-handed and note that the Secretary of State for Wales is doing likewise.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Whenever an international court rules against a country, it is surely a matter of some urgency and concern. Have you received any request from the Crown Office in Edinburgh or from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office seeking to make a statement of explanation about the ruling against our country, by 13 votes to two, brought down by the international judges in relation to Lockerbie? Has any such request been made?

Madam Speaker: I must inform the hon. Gentleman that no request of that nature has been put to me. To the best of my knowledge, no Minister is seeking to make a statement on that matter today.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 (Code of Conduct) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 23rd February, be approved.

That the draft Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 (Procedural Rules) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 23rd February, be approved.

That the draft Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 (Guidelines) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 23rd February, be approved.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Government of Wales Bill

[7TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Considered in Committee [Progress, 25 February].

[MR. MICHAEL J. MARTIN in the Chair]

New clause 40

FORESTRY COMMISSIONERS' FINANCES

'.—(1) The provision of funding for the exercise by the Forestry Commissioners of their functions in relation to Wales shall be the responsibility of the Assembly.

(2) What subsection (1) requires of the Assembly is that it shall provide such funding as the Assembly considers appropriate for the exercise by the Forestry Commissioners of their functions in relation to Wales.

(3) In deciding what funding it considers appropriate to provide for the exercise by the Forestry Commissioners of their functions in relation to Wales, the Assembly shall have regard in particular to what it considers those Commissioners need to spend in order effectively to discharge their functions in relation to Wales.

(4) The Assembly shall before the beginning of each financial year of the Assembly consult the Forestry Commissioners about the funding it is to provide for them in that financial year; and in determining the amount of that funding the Assembly shall take account of the Forestry Commissioners' estimates of—

(a) what they will need to spend in that financial year in order effectively to discharge their functions in relation to Wales, and

(b) the income which they will receive in that financial year and be entitled to apply towards meeting their expenditure on the exercise of their functions in relation to Wales.

(5) Schedule (Forestry Commissioners) (which makes provision consequential on this section) has effect.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.34 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ron Davies): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new schedule 1—Forestry Commisioners.

Government amendments Nos. 542 to 544.

Mr. Davies: I made it clear on Second Reading that I would table amendments about forestry in Wales, to combine the advantages that come from the Forestry Commission retaining an overall strategic role for forestry in Great Britain, with our aim that the Forestry Commission should be answerable for its operations in Wales to the National Assembly for Wales.

Forestry is important to the economy and environment of Wales. At 31 March 1997, the forest area stood at 247,000 hectares, or 12 per cent. of the total area of Wales, of which the Forestry Commission owned 120,000 hectares. Current production levels represent 15 per cent. of the British total. The latest figures suggest that 4,750 people employed in Wales are dependent on forestry, including 1,270 employed by the Forestry Commission, and more than 1,700 employed in wood processing industries, in which Wales has benefited from substantial investment.

Forestry can also provide farmers with an opportunity to diversify farm business through woodland planting as an alternative to agricultural production. Well-designed forests can provide high-grade landscape and wildlife habitats, and can be used to advantage in the reclamation of derelict sites, and provide excellent recreational opportunities.

The Government are not proposing the establishment of a separate Forestry Commission for Wales.

The Government amendments will ensure that, in future, the assembly will have responsibility both for setting policy in respect of forestry in Wales and for funding the activities of the Forestry Commission in relation to Wales.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Is my understanding correct that responsibility for the Forestry Commission—a UK-wide body—in relation to Wales will transfer from the Secretary of State for Scotland to the Welsh assembly? For the past 10 or 20 years, the Forestry Commission has been anomalous, in that it is the only body with a remit outside Scotland for which the Secretary of State for Scotland has ultimate departmental responsibility. Will my right hon. Friend go into detail about the relationship between the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh assembly in respect of forestry?

Mr. Davies: As my hon. Friend will know, with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, I currently have responsibility for all forestry matters. My hon. Friend is correct in his understanding that, post-devolution, the responsibility that I currently exercise will devolve to the Welsh assembly, and the responsibility currently exercised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will devolve to the Scottish Parliament.

On matters that operate GB-wide, it will be necessary for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the representative of the Welsh assembly, and the appropriate Minister in the Scottish Parliament to agree. It will be open to the Scottish Parliament, because it will have jurisdiction in this matter, to legislate by means of primary legislation. It will be open to the Scottish Parliament to decide to introduce further changes. My hon. Friend is correct in his understanding. If he will bear with me, I shall deal with this point in a moment.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): A number of my constituents work at the Forestry Commission's headquarters in Edinburgh, and there is real concern and a lack of clear understanding about their future. I am trying to be constructive about this, but can some document be placed in the Library fairly soon, outlining in detail precisely what the thinking is, because there are quite a number of worried people? They are worried about whether they will have to move their homes yet again, having recently moved north to Edinburgh. They are asking, "Do we have to move south, or somewhere else?" Families' futures are very much at stake here.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend raised that matter on Second Reading, when he asked me particular questions about the likely employment consequences for people in his constituency. Later in my remarks, I want to answer fairly specifically some of the questions that my hon. Friend asked. However, I take this early opportunity to assure him that there is nothing in the Bill that will in any way prejudice the livelihood, or the opportunity for continued employment within the present work force, of my hon. Friend's constituents. As I said in reply to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), the Scottish Parliament will have jurisdiction in this matter. No one can foretell what it might want to do in future.

New clause 40 deals with the devolution of responsibility for funding. The Forestry Commission's funding is currently provided from a single vote approved by the House of Commons. Discussions are in progress on the appropriate transfer of resources into the Welsh block as a result of a significant shift of responsibility. At present, the commissioners' functions relate to Great Britain as a whole.

Paragraph 1 of the new schedule accordingly contains an order-making power for me to provide for the separate exercise, in relation to Wales, of the commissioners' functions, and for their functions to be exercised differently in respect of Wales. If an order under paragraph 1 amends Acts of Parliament, it will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. That is the purpose of amendments Nos. 542 to 544, to clause 144.

I currently have wide-ranging powers in respect of the commissioners enabling me to direct the exercise of their functions in relation to Wales. As I explained to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West, I exercise these powers jointly with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister of Agriculture. These powers will be transferred to the assembly and made separately exercisable with respect to Wales in the transfer order under clause 22.

The forestry commissioners have powers to regulate activities in their forests. They may also make regulations to prevent the introduction into Great Britain of, for example, forestry pests and diseases.

Paragraph 2 of the new schedule provides for such subordinate legislation, where it contains only provisions relating to Wales, to be subject to procedures in the assembly instead of in Parliament. The overall effect is that the assembly will approve the commissioners' subordinate legislation.

Paragraph 3 of the new schedule provides that the status of the commissioners as a Government Department and the status of their staff—the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—are not affected by these changes. I take this opportunity to tell the Committee that, in my view, these amendments in themselves are most unlikely to reduce the number of staff employed by the Forestry Commission. It will remain a Great Britain body, and any changes to this arrangement would require primary legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow raised that point on Second Reading. Obviously, as I have said, we cannot predict how the assembly will choose to exercise its functions, including that of funding the commissioners, but the drafting of new clause 40 ensures that, if the assembly wishes to exercise its functions in a certain way, it must have a proper dialogue with the commissioners.

The arrangements for Scotland are broadly similar, although the details will be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. They will differ from those for Wales, because of the different structure of the Scotland Bill, and in particular because it is proposed that the Scottish Parliament should have legislative competence over forestry.

If the Scottish Parliament were to legislate to create a separate forestry commission for Scotland, the Government would need to reconsider the issue, and in particular to decide whether to retain the commission on a Wales and England basis or whether to create separate bodies. As I have said, such changes would require primary legislation.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I wish this matter to be clarified: if and when the Bill is enacted, and any Member of this place wishes to ask a question or seek information about the Forestry Commission working in Wales, for example, would he or she table a question to the right hon. Gentleman, to the Secretary of State for Scotland or to the Minister of Agriculture, or would he or she not be able to table a question?

Mr. Davies: I say to the hon. Gentleman, in the gentlest possible way, that it is a question not of whether the Bill goes through, but of when. Last weekend, the leader of the Conservative party made the position absolutely clear. My understanding is that his party is now in favour of devolution. I assume that the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) will lead his troops into the Lobby in support of Government policy.

It would be inappropriate for me to comment on which questions Madam Speaker would deem to be in or out of order, because I would be trespassing on matters for which I am not responsible. My current responsibilities will transfer to the assembly, and where those powers need to be exercised jointly, they will be so exercised by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh assembly.

The Table Office or Madam Speaker could advise the hon. Gentleman on tabling a parliamentary question to a Minister in this House who would answer on those broad policy matters. To influence the implementation of detailed policy in Wales, the hon. Gentleman would have to join the happy and growing band of Welsh Conservatives who will seek election to the assembly. Now that he has expressed an interest, he must look for what passes as a safe seat in Wales, although finding one may be difficult.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I am interested to hear the Secretary of State singing the praises of the Welsh assembly and inviting my colleagues to stand for election. Will he stand for election to the Welsh assembly?

Mr. Davies: In fact, I suggested to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman)—

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Answer the question.

Mr. Davies: I shall certainly answer now. I said that the hon. Gentleman should try to find a safe seat; if I were to stand for the Welsh assembly, I would not have as much difficulty finding one as he would.

Paragraph 4 of new schedule 1 deals with the forestry commissioners' receipts. [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Devizes has spent the past month or so berating me for arrogance; now he chunters from a sedentary position and accuses me of being coy. The transition from brutishness—I am supposed to have cast aside public and political opinion in Wales—to coyness is remarkable.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Davies: Of course. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's question will bring me back to the matter of the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Dafis: We are speculating about Conservative intentions, and the Secretary of State will be as intrigued as I am by the proposal of the leader of the Conservative party for a more equal pattern of devolution within the United Kingdom. Does that not imply that there should be a Parliament in Wales with powers equal to those of the Scottish Parliament, and, further, that such a Parliament should have the power to establish a forestry commission for Wales? Would that not be an excellent idea, because forestry is an important industry in Wales and has many distinctive qualities that should be addressed at an all-Wales strategic level?

Mr. Davies: The idea might be excellent, but it is outwith Government policy, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is to transfer to the assembly the powers that I currently exercise. He will not be surprised if I describe devolution as a process. It is for those who come after, in the assembly and in the House of Commons, to decide whether to modify the powers of the Welsh assembly. I am not proposing that; I am proposing sensible and practical arrangements for the transfer to the assembly of my current forestry responsibilities.

I was referring to paragraph 4 of new schedule 1, which deals with the Forestry Commission's receipts. The measure has been drafted to allow the assembly to choose whether to fund the commission's activities in Wales on a net or gross basis—that is, to decide whether the commission should retain its operating income to help it to meet its own expenditure.

We must also recognise that the commission's forestry assets in Wales have been built up using United Kingdom taxpayers' money.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): We have paid for them.

Mr. Davies: Paragraph 4 provides an overriding power for the Treasury to direct that certain receipts, such as those arising from major asset sales, should be returned to the Consolidated Fund.

The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) was right to say that we had paid for the assets. That is why I say that a balance must be struck. I assume that, if the Forestry Commission disposed of certain assets to assist its annual operations, the asset sales would be retained by the commission. In the event of a major act of privatisation, however, the Treasury would understandably want to retain the right to ensure that the contribution of United Kingdom taxpayers as a whole was properly safeguarded.

Paragraphs 5 to 9 deal with the accounts and audit arrangements. The Forestry Commission will produce separate accounts for Wales, which will be audited by the Auditor General for Wales. He or she will also be able to carry out value-for-money studies, and the Comptroller and Auditor General will retain access rights. Paragraph 10 provides for the forestry commissioners to produce an annual report about their activities in Wales, and for it to be laid before and published by the assembly.

The Government amendments devolve to the assembly responsibility for funding the forestry commissioners' activities in Wales, and make the commissioners properly accountable to the assembly.

Mr. Evans: The new clause, new schedule and amendments deal with an aspect of rural Wales that needs to be protected. They deal with our natural environment—trees, plants and wildlife, conservation and preservation, jobs and tourism, recreation and nature, and our ancient woodlands and forests.

The rural community feels threatened. Yesterday, 284,000 people marched here in London, crying out in frustration and fear that their voice was not being heard. Many demonstrators travelled from Wales to be here, and I hope that the Secretary of State—who was not on the march—was at least able to hear what they said. They were good-natured, but they were extremely frustrated. Large numbers turned out from all parts of Wales to join yesterday's demonstration, because they care for the countryside. I assume that that is what new clause 40 purports to do as well, and I shall ask a number of questions about it towards the end of my speech.

The Forestry Commission has a profound effect on our land. It was established in 1919 as an answer to first world war deforestation. In fact, deforestation had been going on for some time. At the turn of the century, only 5 per cent. of our land was forested; today, thanks to the commission's work, that percentage has more than doubled.

Forests are vital, not only for their value as timber but for their natural beauty and their part in conservation and recreation. The nation's forests need protection from, for instance, disease. The commission's research division is very important in that regard, and I shall want to know how it will be ensured that that research function will be properly protected in Wales under the new arrangements.

We need to prevent the reduction of crops by pests. We also need research into ways of increasing the productivity of forests, and the establishment of forests on difficult sites, if areas throughout Wales are to benefit. The conservation of rare and endangered species is important, as is the protection of our ancient and semi-natural woodlands.

The Forestry Commission's research is mainly done in house, but it also commissions outside work. We shall need to know how that will be done under the new arrangements, and what impact the assembly will have in directing key commissioning in certain areas. As the Secretary of State said, the commission has a large staff, and we shall need to know more about how staff will function after the changes. The commission also has an international impact. Will the assembly have a say in some of the international commitments in which we are involved on behalf of the commission?

Forests and woodlands support much of the rural economy, and they are environmentally and socially important. The White Paper entitled "A Working Countryside for Wales" spoke of the economic role of forestry and of the Government's aim to increase Welsh woodland by about 50 per cent. by 2050. Are the commitment and the target still operative, and how will they be affected by the proposed changes?

In January 1996, the Government's panel on sustainable development, which was chaired by Sir Crispin Tickell, spoke of the need to draw up a national forestry strategy that was supported by regional strategies containing targets that were related to the main economic, environmental and social benefits that forestry could provide. The incentives needed to meet those targets were identified. Will the relationship with regional strategies remain the same? What will be the impact on the Forestry Commission's national picture?

Mr. Ron Davies: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he raises these matters. I do not want to be too brutal with him, but I have to say that many of the issues he raises are policy matters, on which the assembly and the Scottish Parliament will decide. We are debating structures—the way in which my current powers will pass to the assembly. It is not for me to decide how the assembly will formulate and implement its policies—unless I seek election to it. Those are matters for the assembly.

Mr. Evans: We can tell that the Secretary of State is seriously considering whether to move from this place to the assembly in 1999. I do not want to be brutal with him, but I hope that he decides to go to the assembly, because not many Labour Members have shown themselves keen to move there from Westminster. Perhaps he can lead the rush of his Back Benchers. [Interruption.] I shall not seek election to the assembly. I suspect that the people of Ribble Valley would not wish to have representation there.

Mr. Davies: How on earth can the hon. Gentleman square that stupefying statement with the comment over the weekend by his party leader that the Conservative party wants to make the assembly work? How on earth will it work without the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Evans: I, too, find that a difficult question.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we could get back to new clause 40.

Mr. Evans: We shall have to leave the question unanswered, and return to the debate on the new clause.

I hear what the Secretary of State says. It is important to look not only at the policy functions that are to be devolved to the assembly but at the national strategy, and how it will weigh with what the assembly wishes to do. I shall shortly come to the funding arrangements. I assume that the Forestry Commission will wish to continue its important consultations with local communities on such matters as planting and felling. It is important for it to carry on with its policy of ensuring that, where necessary, there are prosecutions for illegal felling, and warnings in less serious cases. It should enforce the restocking of illegally felled areas.

I have spoken about only some of the Forestry Commission's work, because it has an important and diverse role. The commission and the timber trade could do much for Wales. We import £7.5 billion-worth of wood materials and manufactures, and export £2.3 billion-worth. That leaves a gap of more than £5 billion. That shows the potential, and if Wales can exploit that, it will be an important boost to the Welsh economy.

My fears about changes to the Forestry Commission centre on the factionalism that may break out if the Welsh assembly pursues one route when a national strategy dictates that the Forestry Commission will pursue another route. We must ensure that both bodies work together absolutely, with one policy and with the same priorities.

The Forestry Commission's funding arrangements will be vital. The Secretary of State for Wales said that Ministers are currently talking about how much money will be provided in the block grant, part of which the assembly will provide to the Forestry Commission. However, we have been given no assurances on how much money will be earmarked for the Forestry Commission. Moreover, the money that is provided to the assembly for the commission will be only notional, and it will not be ring-fenced. The Welsh assembly will decide what priority to place on the Forestry Commission's work.

The Welsh assembly may not necessarily say, "The Forestry Commission is an easy target; we'll cut its money." The assembly—perhaps because of the Committee's debate on sustainable development, on 25 February—may take the opposite view, and decide that the Forestry Commission's work is vital. It may therefore decide to spend more money on the commission than the Treasury had originally notionally allocated.

We must get the Forestry Commission's funding right, especially as so many competing demands will be placed on the assembly. As hon. Members have said during the Bill's passage, the assembly will have to determine how to order its priorities. Last Wednesday, for example, in the Committee debate on the assembly's role in promoting business in Wales, "business" was interpreted very widely. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) also mentioned the tin can that will be rattling outside the Welsh assembly, and the inevitable calls that the assembly will face for all sorts of money for all sorts of worthy projects. The Forestry Commission will be only one of those worthy projects.

There is enormous ignorance of the Forestry Commission's good work, of the depth of its remit and of the vital nature of its role. In future debates on whether money should go to education, to social services or to the Forestry Commission, my fear is that the commission will be an easy target for Members of the Assembly, and that it will suffer cuts. Such cuts cannot be made currently, because the national budget allocates the commission's funds. After devolution, because of competing interests, the assembly could decide to downgrade the Forestry Commission's role.

I assume that the Secretary of State is involved in negotiations on the funding arrangements. We know that there will be—although the Bill does not mention it—a type of Barnett formula in Wales, which the Secretary of State has assured us will apply after devolution. Will such a Barnett-type formula be devised to fund the work in Wales of the Forestry Commission, so that the definite needs of Wales are emphasised, and the funds allocated to the Forestry Commission are not simply divided into three?

Mr. Ron Davies: The hon. Gentleman's earlier interpretation is broadly correct: the assembly will have responsibility for deciding whether to increase or decrease the resources going to forestry. There is nothing exceptional in that responsibility, as that is the importance of devolution. Furthermore, the assembly will occasionally want to reassess its priorities in, for example, education, the environment and the health service. Any Secretary of State currently has that discretion, and it is one that the assembly will enjoy. He was therefore correct in that assertion.

On the hon. Gentleman's latter, specific question, I am currently in the process of discussions with my colleagues in the Government to determine how the Forestry Commission's budget can be disaggregated. I will want to ensure that the Welsh assembly gets its fair share of the disaggregated Forestry Commission budget once the new financial arrangements apply. It will then be a matter for the Forestry Commission to decide whether, by using additional money from the block grant, to supplement the resources that will provided to it by disaggregation of the existing Forestry Commission budget.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to the Secretary of State. He will appreciate that we in Wales are interested in ensuring that we get our fair share. I was wondering whether special needs, tasks or projects within Wales would be able to get more. Will there be some form of Barnett formula after devolution?

Mr. Davies: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman yet again, but his two points are inconsistent. He cannot suggest that there should be a Barnett formula and then ask for special consideration. The two positions are mutually exclusive. However, I can assure him that, during the discussions about the disaggregation of the budget, I shall press as hard as I can to ensure that the particular interests of Wales are reflected in the financial settlement.

I share the hon. Gentleman's great admiration and respect for the Forestry Commission, and attach the same importance as he does to its work. It has done a superb job over the years. I am glad that it is now following better policies than it did several decades ago, although not necessarily in the past decade.

Mr. Evans: Under several Governments, I presume. It is important that the Forestry Commission gets it right, but it needs resources.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned his concern about his constituents who are employed by the Forestry Commission. The Secretary of State said that there would not necessarily be any reduction in staff because of the changes. I wonder whether additional staff will be required, because of the way the budgets will be allocated and because there will be more of a regional bent to the way in which the Forestry Commission will work in future. If extra staff are required and the resources are not increased, its task will not be as well fulfilled. I would be interested to know whether, as a result of the changes, the Forestry Commission is likely to need extra staff.

I spoke earlier about the goal of 50 per cent. more woodland by the year 2050. Is it the Secretary of State's understanding that the same targets will exist? Will the Welsh assembly be able to alter that target to a greater or lesser extent?

Mr. Davies indicated assent.

Mr. Evans: We are dealing with a vital chunk of devolution, and a major change. We want to ensure, therefore, that the assembly is given not only the resources, but the knowledge of how important it is that the money is not channelled off to meet other priorities. The assembly must understand the importance of using the money it will receive for the particular task at hand.

The Secretary of State also mentioned sales—whether some of the proceeds could be given back to the Forestry Commission to use in pursuit of its targets within Wales, whether the assembly could take any of that money, and how much could be retained by the Treasury. Will he clarify exactly how the system will work? It all sounds very vague, and as if the Treasury will be able to step in.

We know that the demands on the Treasury are constantly rigorous, and that it is always keen to ensure that it gets its fair share of the money. How will it be worked out? Will it be through a concordat or a general understanding, or will there be a more specific definition of what is a major sale and what is a minor one? Obviously, the Forestry Commission is constantly buying and selling, so we are talking about rather large sums of money. Of course, privatisation would involve an enormous sum of money.

Will the Secretary of State say a bit more about the various roles and where the money will end up? Could the proceeds of sales be siphoned off from the Forestry Commission to the assembly? If so, given the priorities that the assembly will set itself, it may wish to use some of the money for other projects, so it would not be reinvested into the Forestry Commission's tasks and targets.

Mr. Davies: It is probably best to deal with these issues as we go along, rather than trying to deal with them all at the end—if that is all right with you, Mr. Martin.

The hon. Gentleman seems to be arguing that we should ring-fence the Forestry Commission budget. It would then be both a ceiling and a floor. That would merely fix in time the spending pattern for the Forestry Commission, making it difficult for the assembly to embark on new policies or change its priorities. If the forestry budget should be ring-fenced, why not those for health, the Welsh Development Agency or education?

[Mr. Davies]

The purpose of devolution is to allow the assembly to change its priorities from time to time, reflecting local circumstances and its political will.

I had an exchange about funding earlier with several hon. Members. If the Forestry Commission wanted to dispose of assets and recycle the money as part of its annual operations, it would be able to do so as at present. If, on the other hand, there was a major privatisation, it would be open to the Treasury to recover part of the money because it reflected previous Great Britain investment. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a precise definition of what would be a major privatisation and what would be considered annual operations. We shall have to make such judgments as we go along.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for that response. The Secretary of State will understand why we are asking such questions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) said earlier—the response to his point reinforced it—after devolution we shall have limited powers to question the Secretary of State for Wales on matters relating to the Forestry Commission in Wales. I suspect that we shall usually be ruled out of order because our questions will be considered not the responsibility of the Secretary of State. It is right that we should ask questions now, because the opportunity to do so will be curtailed.

There is a fear that, after devolution, if the assembly gets part of any money raised from sales, it may spend it elsewhere, particularly when budgets are tight. The assembly will not have direct tax-raising powers, but here we have the possibility of an indirect tax. The assembly may be keen to award itself other indirect tax-raising powers.

Mr. Ron Davies: The hon. Gentleman is misconstruing what I said. I made it clear that, if the forestry estate was rationalised or certain sales were made to fund other forestry projects in Wales, the matter would remain within the assembly's discretion. The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that there will be privatisation, with the proceeds used to fund other services. I do not expect that. The hon. Gentleman should not raise the spectre of the Welsh assembly selling off the forestry estate in Wales wholesale to fund its other priorities. That is not what I said.

Mr. Evans: The Secretary of State likes to look at the devolution proposals through his rose-tinted spectacles, believing that everything will be fine and there will be sunshine. Expectations about what the assembly will do must already be high in Wales. It is right to consider worst case scenarios in Committee, to ensure that devices are in place to prevent them from coming about. That is all we are asking of the Secretary of State. We want him to clarify his interpretation of the Bill to ensure that it is carried out when devolution takes place.

The Forestry Commission is doing a good job. I have no problems with the way in which it is performing its functions in Wales, Scotland and England. It is fulfilling its targets with its limited budgets. The Secretary of State's passion for devolution is evident, although he is being rather coy—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said—about whether he will run for the assembly. Such a description does not normally sit easily with him. We need to be certain why, if the Forestry Commission is not broken, we trying to repair it.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I did not intend to speak, but I was intrigued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's mention of disaggregating the Forestry Commission's budget. I think that that is what he said; he certainly used the word "disaggregating".

I am totally ignorant about the Forestry Commission's finances, but I was surprised that it is necessary to disaggregate its budget. I should have thought that the Welsh Office would already know how much the Forestry Commission spends in respect of Wales—perhaps I am wrong. If the Welsh Office does not know, the Secretary of State will have to conduct the disaggregation exercise every year in order to arrive at a hypothetical disaggregated figure, which will be added to the rest of the block grant and handed to the assembly. If I am right—I could be completely wrong—the assembly would not, in this rather convoluted procedure, hand back the hypothetical disaggregated sum to the Forestry Commission. I do not know. The assembly might or might not hand back the equivalent of the disaggregated hypothetical sum. Is that the position?

Mr. Ron Davies indicated assent.

Mr. Denzil Davies: My right hon. Friend is indicating that I may quite correctly have reached such a convoluted end. I find it strange that, at the moment, the Welsh Office does not know how much the Forestry Commission spends or what its budget is for Wales. Who—I ask, perhaps rhetorically—decides the Forestry Commission's budget? Presumably, it is decided by the Treasury at the moment. Is it decided in negotiation between the Treasury and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food? My right hon. Friend said that he was responsible for the Forestry Commission in Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies: The essence of my right hon. Friend's case is absolutely correct. Forestry Commission operations in Wales are not funded at the moment out of the block grant. They are subject to a separate vote, which is negotiated with the Treasury by the respective forestry Ministers. His argument is correct that, post devolution, the forestry budget will be disaggregated. The block will increase, and that will form the basis of any future decisions that the assembly might want to take in funding forestry.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Perhaps one is playing with words. The budget must already be disaggregated if the Secretary of State for Wales is one of the three Ministers who negotiate with the Treasury on the total Forestry Commission budget. The Welsh Office must know what part of that relates to Wales, otherwise there would be nothing to negotiate. There is no need to disaggregate the budget because it is already disaggregated.

Mr. Ron Davies: Certain elements of the Forestry Commission's operation may or may not relate directly to Wales. That matter will have to be discussed. Indeed, it is the basis of current discussions. I cannot give my right hon. Friend a precise figure, because we have not yet arrived at the appropriate adjustments that need to be made.

I shall try to help the Committee by making it clear that, during the current financial year, the Forestry Commission expects to spend £27 million in Wales and generate income of £29 million. In addition, there is the appropriate Welsh share of Great Britain expenditure and income, which has to be calculated. The Welsh share of net GB expenditure is nearly £30 million.

Mr. Denzil Davies: In effect, the budget is £27 million-plus. That is the figure about which—possibly—there is some doubt, although the Welsh figure is fairly clear. Will the "plus" figure also go to the Welsh assembly, which will decide whether to hand it back to the Forestry Commission? In effect, the Welsh assembly could pocket the GB figure. Is that what my right hon. Friend is saying?

Mr. Ron Davies: That is the effect of it, yes. My right hon. Friend says that the Welsh assembly could pocket the money, but it could not do so and simply walk away. As he knows, the money will be in addition to the block, and the assembly will then have to decide its spending priorities. It will be for the assembly to decide whether forestry is a higher or lower priority and whether the programmes will vary from year to year.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I do not want to pursue the point, but I find it rather bizarre that the £3 million, being a "GB" or British figure, will be handed over to the Welsh assembly. No doubt the assembly will do its job properly and not abuse its position, but this point highlights some of the difficulties in dealing with a Great Britain body that is based in Scotland and which will be answerable, in part to the Scottish Parliament, in part to a Minister in England and in part to the assembly in Wales. One can only hope that matters will work out all right.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): After that fascinating exchange about the financial side, I wish to raise what I suspect the Secretary of State will describe as a legalistic point, but one that is of considerable interest to Opposition Members, as it is part of a general pattern. Incidentally, I am still waiting for the Secretary of State to write to me about the errors that he made during our previous Committee sitting.

Will the Secretary of State, either now or when he winds up the debate, tell us whether the order-making power given in paragraph 1(1) of the new schedule is one that could, at least in theory, be transferred to the Welsh assembly through a transfer of functions order or a subsequent version thereof? If so, is it true that if that were to happen—even if it is not the current Government's policy—the Welsh assembly would itself have the ability to make orders in respect of the Forestry Commission? If so, how would that relate to the powers of the Scottish Parliament in respect of the Forestry Commission and to the activities of the UK Parliament?

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: I welcome the new clause, the new schedule and the Government amendments, because it seems to me that one could not fail to devolve forestry to the Welsh assembly. It would have been a great mistake had forestry and the funding responsibility for it not been devolved.

Mr. Evans indicated dissent.

Mr. Morgan: I see the hon. Gentleman shaking his head—I take it that he does not believe that forestry should be devolved in the way proposed in the new clause. Because of forestry's intimate relationship with agriculture and rural life generally and because of its impact on the sustainability of rural life, responsibility for dealing with agriculture, forestry, tourism and other aspects of rural life should be devolved to the assembly, so that those matters can be dealt with according to the way in which the assembly sets democratic priorities.

My first point relates to the one raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). It would be useful to know when the disaggregation exercise will be completed. I do not know whether it will be done before the Bill goes to another place, or whether it will be carried out in connection with proceedings in another place, but, like my right hon. Friend, I should like to see the figures. The Committee should know what the present funding position is in respect of the Forestry Commission's various responsibilities, both those that are clearly a Wales responsibility and those that are the Wales share of the wider United Kingdom or Great Britain responsibility.

That is because of the switch taking place in the Forestry Commission's work and within forestry generally—from the giant monocultural plantations that formed the basis of the commission's work for 60 or 70 years, to the microforestry work that it increasingly emphasises nowadays. That change of emphasis is designed to achieve greater sustainability and to assist farmers to diversify from, for example, sheep farming in the uplands to being able to harvest a proportion of each year's growth in hardwood forests.

The switch from big monocultural plantations to the harvesting of natural growth in small coppices—a switch, therefore, from softwoods to hardwoods—is important, and requires a totally different approach not only to funding, but from Forestry Commission officers, in terms of the intimacy and local control that they need in working with farmers, landowners, local conservation groups and community forestry groups, for example.

We should also consider the job consequences of that switch and the number of jobs that can be created by harvesting only the natural growth of local hardwoods. If those woods are fed—through local sawmills or even, as I have seen in hardwood forests in south Wales, mobile sawmills—into furniture and similar industries, a massive number of jobs could be created in rural areas, to replace some of the jobs that are threatened in upland farming and other rural occupations.

Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State say what the implications of the switch from soft to hardwoods—and from the big to the small scale—will be for the funding questions to which he referred and the disaggregation exercise? We all hope that that exercise will be finalised as soon as possible, so that, as has been said so many times in this interesting micro-debate, we have the information that we need.

Mr. Ron Davies: I am grateful for the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) because, as the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) said, what happens to forestry is an important part of devolution. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) properly drew to the Committee's attention the difficulties that could arise. The Forestry Commission is a unique body that is, by and large, answerable for policy to the House of Commons through the Secretary of State for Scotland, as it is based in Scotland. By establishing a Scottish Parliament and a Welsh assembly, we shall create an asymmetrical structure, so we need to ensure that there are appropriate arrangements in Wales, just as our colleagues in Scotland will have to make appropriate arrangements there.

I believe that the new clause, the new schedule and the amendments will enable us to have the best of all worlds. We shall retain the overall advantage of the Forestry Commission's status as a Great Britain body, but there will be an opportunity for greater flexibility to reflect the priorities in Scotland and Wales.

In response to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West, it is likely that the new financial arrangements will apply from 1 April 2000, so we have some way to go before they are finalised.

Mr. Dalyell: I think that there is a real difficulty. Some of us have had discussions of a fairly confidential nature—no one wants to be embarrassed, and I am honestly not out to make trouble—and we know that there are real difficulties from the Edinburgh perspective about how the arrangements will work. Will the Forestry Commission put a candid paper into the Library to make public, before Report, its view on these difficult technical questions about investment and other aspects of its work?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend will have to take up that question, if he feels it appropriate, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is the lead Minister on these matters. We need not make too much of this, as the functions of the Forestry Commission will not change, and the powers that I currently have to influence those functions will be transferred to the assembly. After devolution, the Scottish Parliament may want to exercise its powers of primary legislation to bring about more fundamental changes, but we cannot properly address that in our consideration of the Wales Bill. My hon. Friend should pursue his concerns elsewhere, not in this forum—although he should not for a moment take that to mean that I am encouraging him to pursue my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on the matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West rightly referred to the changing emphasis of the Forestry Commission, with its shift from a monoculture of softwoods to more varied hardwood production and the introduction of more small-scale enterprises. I strongly endorse those policies. It would be for the assembly to discuss with the commission the policies that should be pursued. The assembly could influence those policies by direct discussion with the commission and, in extremis, by exercising jointly the powers of direction that I currently hold. By its ability to fund the commission, it could ensure that its priorities were properly adopted.

4.30 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall happily give way to the hon. Gentleman, if he will first let me deal with the points that have already been made. I was trying to wind up the debate, not the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Shepherd: The Secretary of State is not winding me up.

Mr. Davies: I am glad to hear that.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley spoke about the functions of the Forestry Commission. The new clause and our other changes will not affect those functions. As I have explained, an order under schedule 1(1) will provide for the commission's functions to be exercised separately, and differently, in Wales, but the functions themselves will remain. The policies that the commission follows in Wales will have to be discussed with the assembly. The funding that the assembly provides will reflect its priorities.

Mr. Shepherd: Am I correct in understanding that the assembly can, if it deems it appropriate, reduce the block grant from £27 million or £30 million to £20 million, for instance, so that the Forestry Commission's objectives, which were the basis of the original grant, could be frustrated by a cut decided on by the assembly?

Mr. Davies: I would have given the hon. Gentleman a far more robust response if he had asked whether the assembly could choose to reorder its priorities and increase the amount available to the Forestry Commission. He would have been entirely correct in that suggestion. That is the essence of devolution. In pursuance of policies to support and rebuild the countryside—we are dealing as best we can with a terrible crisis created by the legacy of 18 years of neglect—it may well be that the assembly will want to devote more money to forestry. If that is what the hon. Gentleman is asking, the answer is yes. The assembly will be able to vary the amount going to forestry.

Mr. Evans: The Secretary of State said that the Government wanted to do as much for the countryside as they possibly could. Was he on the march yesterday?

Mr. Davies: My Sunday arrangements are a matter for me. I do not propose to tell the Committee, because it may be that I was doing far more interesting things than coming to London to demonstrate on behalf of the countryside. The hon. Gentleman will know that I am a country man: I was born and have lived all my life in the countryside. I venture to suggest that, if the Government of the day had listened to the warnings that I and others gave them as far back as 1989 about bovine spongiform encephalopathy, for example, they would not have got into such a dreadful mess and wasted £3.5 billion of public money.

I have a good understanding of the countryside dimension. I believe that it is important that we follow a holistic approach, and I have no doubt whatever that the Welsh assembly will pull together the strands that are necessary to ensure that we have a vigorous policy to address the problems of the countryside.

The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) raised a specific point. I was unaware of the fact that he had raised matters earlier to which I have not yet responded, but I assure him that I shall make inquiries and, if my officials have been negligent, I shall certainly not be negligent myself. The hon. Gentleman will understand that. If my officials have been negligent in giving him a precise answer, I shall remonstrate with them whole-heartedly. I have no doubt that as I speak scribes are looking back at each and every intervention by the hon. Gentleman in the debate and ensuring that he receives a reply. Of course, he is correct that if I fail to provide him with satisfaction, that is my responsibility, not my civil servants'. However, they will know what fate will befall them if they put me in that unfortunate predicament.

The order-making power in new schedule 1 could not be transferred to the assembly because, under clause 23(3), only functions in part VI of the Bill can be transferred. As the power would, in all likelihood, be used only once to set up the arrangements that I have described for forestry in Wales, there would be no need for such a transfer.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

'.—(1) The Assembly shall make a scheme setting out its proposals for securing that its functions are exercised with due regard to the principle that sustainable development should be promoted.

(2) The Assembly shall keep the scheme under review and in the year following each ordinary election shall consider whether it should be remade or revised.

(3) The Assembly may not delegate the function of making, or remaking or revising, the scheme to—

(a) a committee of the Assembly, or

(b) a member of the Assembly's staff.

(4) The Assembly shall publish the scheme when first made and whenever subsequently remade and, if the scheme is revised without being remade, shall publish either the revisions or the scheme as revised (as it considers appropriate).

(5) The Assembly shall consult such persons or bodies as it considers appropriate before making, remaking or revising the scheme.

(6) After each financial year of the Assembly, the Assembly shall publish a report of how its proposals as set out in the scheme were implemented in that financial year.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 29

ABOLITION OF RESIDUARY BODY FOR WALES

'.—(1) Paragraph 18 of Schedule 13 to the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 (provisions for winding up of Residuary Body for Wales) is amended as follows.

(2) In sub-paragraph (2) (meaning of "the transitional period" within which the Residuary Body must try to complete its work and at the end of which it is to be wound up, for "period of five years beginning with the establishment of the Residuary Body" substitute "period beginning with the establishment of the Residuary Body and ending with 31st March 1999".

(3) Omit—

(a) in sub-paragraph (3), "Subject to sub-paragraph (4),", and

(b) sub-paragraph (4),

(under which the Secretary of State may specify a period longer than the transitional period as the period at the end of which the Residuary Body is to be wound up).

(4) For sub-paragraphs (5) to (7) (duty of Residuary Body to submit scheme for its winding up and to make arrangements for transfers etc. and power of Secretary of State to make orders) substitute—

"(5) The Residuary Body shall, before the end of the period of three months beginning with the day on which the Government of Wales Act 1998 is passed, submit to the Secretary of State a scheme for the winding up of the Residuary Body.

(6) The scheme shall include in relation to the Residuary Body's remaining functions, property, rights and liabilities—

(a) a statement of arrangements made by the Residuary Body for their transfer by the Residuary Body to another body or bodies,

(b) proposals for their transfer by the Secretary of State to another body or bodies, or

(c) such a statement in relation to some of them and such proposals in relation to the rest.

(7) The Secretary of State may by order make provision for giving effect to the scheme (with or without modifications) and for the transfer of functions, property, rights and liabilities of the Residuary Body to another body or bodies (whether or not as proposed in the scheme).".'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ron Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 515.

Mr. Davies: The White Paper made clear the intention to wind up the Residuary Body for Wales before 2000. The view was taken that the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 provided the necessary legal framework to effect the wind-up before the assembly was established. However, further consideration has concluded that the powers in the 1994 Act do not allow the certainty that will be necessary to wind up the residuary body in the time scale necessary. The issue is not a point of controversy between the Government and the Opposition, and new clause 29 and Government amendment No. 515 are intended to provide the necessary certainty.

From the outset, I wish to make it clear that the residuary body and the local authorities in Wales agree that an early wind-up is desirable. Following the local government reorganisation of 1996, the residuary body inherited 21 properties, of which only six remain to be disposed of. The residuary body hopes to sell them in the coming months, although there is no guarantee that that will happen. None the less, new clause 29 and Government amendment No. 515 are designed to ensure that the residuary body can be wound up by 1 April 1999, irrespective of whether it still has any unresolved property disposals.

[Mr. Davies]

Furthermore, the residuary body will be required to submit a wind-up scheme that includes proposals for the subsequent transfer of property within three months of the Bill being enacted. Local authorities will be consulted on the residuary body's draft scheme before any wind-up order is made. The new clause does not stipulate how, at the wind-up, property vested in the residuary body should be disposed of, and we await its proposals in the wind-up plan on whether the properties, if unsold, should be transferred to an appropriate local authority by agreement or, in the absence of such agreement, by order.

Mr. Evans: As the Secretary of State says, the new clause is not controversial. He referred to the six properties that will remain in the hands of the residuary body. Is there any controversy about any of those six properties? Does he expect any problems with their sale or transfer to local authorities?

The Secretary of State said that he had talked with the local authorities and found that they were keen for the residuary body to be wound up early. In his discussions, did he encounter any reservations about the possibility of the residuary body being wound up? Has he had talks about the residuary body—gosh, that is difficult to say; the sooner it is wound up, the better—and, if so, what representations have been made to him about the early winding up?

Mr. Davies: I have had no talks with the residuary body, but my officials have and, to answer the hon. Gentleman's question directly, I am given to understand that both local government and the residuary body are anxious for the residuary body to be wound up.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether any problem attached to the remaining properties. I hesitate, when talking about property in Wales, to give him a categorical statement that there is no unresolved problem, but he asked specifically about the six properties that remain. They are the staff club at Westgate street in Cardiff; Greyfriars house and offices, Cardiff—which I understand are the subject of some offers at the moment; Nos. 3 to 5 Goring road, Llanelli; unit 7, Castle park, Flint; phase IV of county hall, Mold; and No. 3 High street, Caernarfon.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 28

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE

'. A document purporting to be—

(a) duly executed under the seal of the Assembly, or

(b) signed on behalf of the Assembly, shall be received in evidence and shall, unless the contrary is proved, be taken to be so executed or signed.'—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ron Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

As a body corporate, under common law the assembly will automatically be entitled to a seal. The new clause relates to the significance that courts attach to documents submitted in evidence and bearing the assembly's seal. Such documents are to be regarded as properly made unless the contrary is proved. There have been many similar clauses in recent legislation, including equivalent clauses in the Welsh Language Act 1993 and the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 7

PRIVATE AND LOCAL LEGISLATION

'( ) The Assembly may promote or oppose private or local legislation relating to Wales.'.—[Mr. Wigley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause relates to the issue of private legislation and is, to some extent, a probing new clause, if that term may be used. Clarification is needed on several questions regarding private Bills—I emphasise that we are talking about private Bills, not private Members' Bills.

I imagine that the answer to the first question will be yes. Does the assembly, as a geographically defined body within the United Kingdom, have the right to promote private Bills, as would a local authority or any other body, and the right to oppose private Bills?

The second question is: can Wales, as a unit, be considered as an area for which it is appropriate to initiate private Bills—can the assembly initiate private Bills that apply to the whole of Wales but which would need to pass through the private Bill mechanisms in the House?

The third aspect of the new clause concerns the extent to which the assembly may deal with private Bills. In the fairly recent past, fairly controversial private Bills from Wales have taken hours and hours on the Floor of the House. The Cardiff Bay Barrage Act 1993 is a perfect example of legislation that should be dealt with in the assembly instead of swallowing time on the Floor of the House of Commons.

There are less controversial examples—such as the Porthmadog harbour revision order that affects part of my constituency. From time to time, all hon. Members become involved with such legislation. The hon. Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams) is in the Chamber. A few years ago, a Bangor Market Bill passed through the House by way of the private Bill procedure—and no doubt another resembling it will do so again in future.

Such matters need not be dealt with in the House of Commons; it should be possible to deal with them in the assembly. However, the Houses of Parliament have a very tight procedure for dealing with private Bills and I am not convinced that the Government intend to make it easier for all that procedure to take place in the assembly.

There is some parallel with the order-making facility that is within the assembly's purview. The fact that the assembly may pass secondary legislation gives it a fair amount of power. If the Government are worried about the amount of power that may be transferred and about the need for checks and balances on the use of that power, I argue that it is no more radical to transfer to the assembly the power to deal with private Bills than to give it order-making powers because, as we heard earlier in the Committee, the power to pass secondary legislation is substantial.

Those are the three aspects of the new clause. We do not intend its wording to be wide enough to cover all three adequately. Our intention is to discover what will be the role of the assembly when dealing with private legislation and to express the hope that it will be possible to develop the assembly into—if it is not so from the start—a body that can deal entirely with these matters. The time of the House of Commons should not be used on matters that are essentially local and should be dealt with by people from Wales, in Wales.

Mr. Letwin: I shall briefly ask the Secretary of State a question that is in line with the probing new clause. In the context of the developing argument about the legal status of the National Assembly for Wales, it would be interesting to know whether the Secretary of State believes that, in the absence of such a new clause—although the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) may disagree with me, I think it likely that the Government will not accept it—the vires exist for the assembly to promote private legislation.

When I inquired, the Clerk in the Private Bill Office told me that any individual in the United Kingdom can promote a private Bill without having any special rights, duties or powers. Is the National Assembly for Wales, in that sense, a legal person? Does it have, therefore, the right to promote a private Bill and, if so, what would be the scope of that right and which moneys would it deploy in its promotion?

Would the assembly have the right, in promoting such a Bill, to use moneys that the Secretary of State had allocated to it for its general purposes? If so, would there be any constraint on that, or might the assembly spend 100 per cent. of its budget on the promotion of one private Bill?

Finally, to illustrate why I ask the extreme and apparently ludicrous question about the 100 per cent., if the nature of the private Bill in question were very special—if it were one which the right hon. Member for Caernarfon and his colleagues might want to be promoted, relating to the governance of Wales—would it be debarred by some means, or would it have to be debarred only by the ordinary processes of the House in considering private Bills?

Mr. Ron Davies: I thank the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) for opening the debate and I am pleased to tell him that the Government accept the broad principle of new clause 7. I hope that we will return at a later stage with an appropriate new clause because, as he suggested, the wording of his new clause is somewhat defective.

The Welsh Office has previously promoted at Westminster legislation that would have been local legislation if it had not been promoted by the Government; examples are the Conwy Tunnel (Supplementary Powers) Act 1983, the Cardiff Bay Barrage Act 1993 and possibly the Caldey Island Act 1990.

We do not want there to be any doubt about the power of the assembly to promote or oppose essentially local legislation, as the Secretary of State for Wales has done in the past. I cannot give the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) a direct answer to his question at this moment, but it is because we want to avoid doubt that the Government are minded to accept the thrust of the new clause 7.

The right hon. Member for Caernarfon asked whether Wales would be regarded as an acceptable geographical entity for the purposes of promoting private legislation. The answer is yes, I understand that that would be accepted.

Acceptance of the thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's case would not confer on the assembly the power to make primary legislation. The assembly could promote only a private Bill in Parliament.

The Government are considering further the precise terms of their new clause. For instance, it may be desirable to require a decision to promote or oppose local legislation to be supported by more than a simple majority of the assembly. We are looking into such matters and if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make representations during this brief debate or subsequently, I shall listen carefully to them.

We must also consider the interaction with the Transport and Works Act 1992. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the many hours of happy debate that the House had on the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill. Those proceedings have largely been overtaken by the Transport and Works Act 1992. We must ensure that the assembly could not promote an order for development under that Act and approve it itself. We will ensure that the new clause is technically correct in that respect.

In view of the undertakings that I have given, I hope that at the appropriate time the right hon. Gentleman will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the Secretary of State and I am glad to have had positive responses from him on two of the matters that I raised. At the end of his remarks, he touched upon, but did not clarify, the third.

The right hon. Gentleman acknowledged that the assembly is a developing body. To what extent is it possible—and to what extent is the possibility constrained—for the assembly to develop into a body that not only promotes Bills, but can dispose of them? For example, local authorities in Wales could propose their private Bills to the assembly if the Government deemed that to be appropriate. The order-making facility in the Bill—in clauses 22 and 141, I think—may indeed allow that to happen.

I realise that there must be checks and balances in the process of private legislation, that there may be private interests that need to be balanced and that there is a role for the House of Lords as well as the House of Commons. None the less, it may well be that the assembly could handle some aspects of private legislation from within Wales—that from local authorities, for example—without their needing to come through to Westminster. What is the Government's thinking on that?

Mr. Davies: We shall have to consider the matter carefully before we table the new clause that the right hon. Gentleman seeks. The problem is that private legislation is effectively primary legislation. I made it clear that we cannot through this mechanism confer on the assembly the power to make primary legislation. I said earlier that such a provision would have to be made by the promotion of a private Bill in this Parliament.

I understand that it would be largely a matter for the House authorities to decide whether a private Bill was an appropriate private Bill or whether it exceeded the provisions of this place for the handling of private legislation. I regret that I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman a precise answer on that point.

We must examine closely the operation of the Transport and Works Act 1992. The assembly cannot use order-making powers under that Act to create de facto primary legislation. That is not the purpose of the Act and we will have to ensure that our new clause takes that into account.

The hon. Member for West Dorset asked a fair question and I tried earlier to answer it. He asked whether the absence of new clause 7 would mean that the assembly would not have the power to promote private legislation. The assembly is a creature of statute and is given certain powers. That particular power is not conferred by the Bill, although there may be arguments about whether, de facto, the assembly could decide to do that. The Government have accepted the argument advanced by the right hon. Member for Caernarfon to avoid doubt.

Once we have tabled our own new clause, there will be no doubt and the assembly will have the power to promote primary legislation. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question about whether that would be in order in the present circumstances is that there is an element of doubt. Instead of prolonged debates about whether that can or cannot happen, the Government have decided to clarify the position by tabling their own new clause.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to the Secretary of State. His surprising response to the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) invalidates part of my question, as the problem will not arise.

I repeat the second part of my question. Under the Government's version of the right hon. Gentleman's new clause, will there be any limits on the expenditure that the assembly will be able to incur in promoting private legislation?

Mr. Davies: I am trying to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, but we do not have the new clause written yet, so I cannot tell him whether there will be such limits. Perhaps I can give him a steer. I do not think that it would be appropriate for us to lay down financial limits that should apply to the assembly in the exercise of its powers. The purpose of the Bill is to create the assembly and give it substantial powers to decide its own priorities. A pretty good case would have to be put to me for circumscribing the powers with a financial limit.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his positive response to at least part of the thrust of my new clause. I hope that the Government's new clause will be ready for our consideration, otherwise we shall have to look to the House of Lords to deal with it and we shall have a further opportunity to consider the matter when the Bill returns to this House.

I put it to the Secretary of State that given that there is a facility in the Bill to amend primary legislation by order in certain restricted areas—the Henry VIII powers, as they are fondly known, and we are all growing more knowledgeable about what Henry VIII could and could not do—

Mr. Ancram: On legislation.

Mr. Wigley: Of course. I would not for a moment suggest that heads should be rolling around the Chamber. Given that those powers exist, if that principle is applied to private Bills, as it may be applied to certain limited areas of public Bills, it might be a way of ensuring that the assembly can deal with certain matters without having to take up the time of Parliament on them. A range of issues arise and it is ridiculous that they become centralised to Westminster and take up the time of the House of Commons.

In drawing up the new clause, the Government may bear that in mind and give the assembly the flexibility to get on with scrutinising and deciding on some local matters, without every single one having to come through Westminster. That would accord with the general tenor of the Secretary of State's approach to other aspects of the Bill. I hope that the Government will move in that direction at the appropriate time.

Mr. Ron Davies: I shall reflect on the points that the right hon. Gentleman has made. The Henry VIII powers to which he refers apply only to specified legislation that is stipulated in the Bill. I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman's comments and, on the basis of our dialogue, I hope that he will withdraw his new clause and give the Government the opportunity to reflect on his case.

Mr. Wigley: I intend to do precisely that. We look forward to seeing the wording of the amendment or new clause that the Government will propose at the appropriate time. No doubt we shall return to our discussion of the detailed questions then.

Although the Henry VIII powers apply to specific legislation, the powers of clause 141 are fairly broad with regard to existing legislation to the extent that they impact on certain matters dealt with in the Bill. Flexibility along those lines would be helpful not only to the assembly but to successive Governments in this place. The ultimate control of granting an order to facilitate matters may rest with Governments in Westminster. There is no question of the assembly's marching away with those powers, but it should have the flexibility to ensure that matters are dealt with reasonably in Wales rather than centralised in Westminster. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

The First Deputy Chairman: We now come to new clause 11. Who will move it?

New clause 11

POWER TO CONDUCT REFERENDA

'.—The Assembly may conduct a referendum in Wales on any matter affecting Wales.'.—[Mr. Dafis.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5 pm

Mr. Dafis: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Thank you for your patience, Mr. Martin. This new clause concerns the power of the assembly to hold referendums. I want to probe whether the assembly will have that power—I certainly believe that it should and I believe that the absence of primary legislative powers strengthens our case.

The power exists already at varying levels of government. Parliament has the power to hold a referendum after it has passed an Act specifically for that purpose. The Scottish Parliament will also be able to do that as it will have primary legislative powers. At the bottom level of government, schedule 12, part IV of the Local Government Act 1972 confers the power to hold community polls on any question to be decided at a community meeting if the chair of the meeting consents and if the poll is demanded by at least 10 local government electors present at the meeting, or by at least a third of local government electors present at the meeting. That power exists at the basis of government at the community level.

The power of unitary or county councils to hold referendums is more ambiguous. However, section 141 of the 1972 Act allows those bodies to conduct an investigation and collect information concerning the county or any part of it. I am told that that could involve holding a countywide poll in certain circumstances. A parallel power in Scotland enabled Strathclyde regional council to conduct a referendum in March 1994 on the Government's proposals for the water industry in Scotland. That referendum was influential in the debate about whether the Scottish water industry should be privatised.

I believe that the national assembly should be given this power unambiguously—although it might not use it and, if it did, it would be used sparingly. It could be particularly useful in the kind of circumstances that arose in Scotland—if a future Government tried to impose upon Wales a set of policies that were unacceptable to Wales, which is not unheard of in Welsh history. For example, a future Government might wish to impose selection in the school system. We are currently debating education legislation that does that to a limited degree: it allows schools to apply to select pupils for certain subjects on the basis of aptitude. A future Government might introduce far more sweeping selection proposals.

If the national assembly could not prevent the introduction of such policies through secondary legislation—it might not be able to do that because of the way in which the legislation is designed—it might express its objections. Although the Government should take the assembly's views into account, they might decide to override them. The Secretary of State of the day could claim to have public opinion on his or her side—it would not be the first time that politicians have claimed to speak for the people; they have an unpleasant tendency to do that. Even my colleagues are sometimes guilty of claiming to speak for the community at large.

If a Secretary of State did that, a referendum would settle the argument by revealing the people's views. It would be a powerful tool for the assembly in establishing that it had a democratic mandate beyond that which it was given initially through the electoral process. I believe that the assembly should have that kind of power.

Mr. Evans: I can understand why the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) was rather reluctant to move new clause 11—particularly in light of what happened the last time there was a referendum in Wales. I am surprised and shocked that the hon. Gentleman is even considering using the referendum process as a device for testing public opinion. The last experience was not a tremendous or a ringing success, with only 50.1 per cent. of electors voting in that referendum.

The hon. Gentleman has said that new clause 11 is probing and is designed to determine whether the assembly will be able to instruct that a referendum be held in Wales. In light of all the evidence that the hon. Gentleman produced in the local sphere, I suspect that the assembly will have that power. It will be interesting to see whether the Welsh assembly will be able to instruct that a referendum be held in Wales on a constitutional question. Will the Secretary of State respond to that issue? Does he believe that the assembly will have the power to hold a referendum in any event?

The hon. Gentleman said that he thought that the power would be used sparingly—I suspect that that is because referendums are very expensive. We must also consider voter fatigue and the fact that electors do not like being asked to vote constantly. Under devolution, we are establishing an assembly with 60 politicians who will represent Welsh constituencies and regions. They will consider carefully events in Wales and will speak on behalf of Wales in that body. A referendum would devolve power away from the assembly to individuals. I suspect that the proposal is a product of new Plaid Cymru or Plaid Cymru Newydd—I know that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues are having problems deciding what to call their party.

If the assembly has the power to instruct that referendums be held, could Parliament instruct that those referendums be conducted following certain guidelines? For instance, Newport council has been criticised for spending £8,000 of taxpayers' money during the Welsh devolution referendum campaign on a leaflet publicising the yes vote. The Government have claimed that no taxpayers' money will be used to promote a particular side in a referendum campaign. However, I have reservations about copies of the White Paper that were sent to every letterbox in Wales, and I suspect that taxpayers' money was used to promote that case. Local authorities should not have the power to issue propaganda that is paid for with taxpayers' money from a very limited budget and delivered to every house in the area. It should be established at the outset that that should not occur.

Perhaps referendums will be used to sort out problems between the Secretary of State for Wales and the First Secretary of the assembly, both of whom might say that they speak on behalf of Wales. If they are not one and the same person—they might be because of Cabinet responsibility—a referendum might be used as a device, whereby the First Secretary will say, "I am speaking for Wales, and I shall hold a referendum to prove that that is the case," against the policy of the Government of the day.

Referendums might also be used to trample the wishes of minorities. We saw a fine example yesterday with the march through London, in which the Secretary of State for Wales did not take part; he said that he had better things to do on a Sunday than to march with rural people. Will minorities be protected to ensure that they are not trampled as a result of the wishes of the majority on country pursuits, including angling? Backed by a referendum, the majority might say that it should not take place in Wales.

Referendums on Sunday closing used to be held regularly in parts of Wales. I think that only one part of Wales is dry on a Sunday, but I might be wrong. One area held out rigidly. Perhaps referendums will be held in parts of Wales. If the previous referendum in Wales proved anything, it was that 11 areas of Wales were in favour of devolution and 11 areas were against.

The other important aspect is whether the assembly will have direct tax-raising powers. We know from earlier debates in Committee that the Liberal Democrats are not in favour of such a referendum. In fact, they tabled an amendment and said that they were not interested in another referendum in Wales. They thought that the assembly would be sensible enough to know when it was appropriate to use its tax-raising powers, without consulting the Welsh people. That is completely wrong.

Scotland held a referendum on a Parliament and on whether it should have tax-varying powers. The electorate chose to have a Parliament and, to a lesser extent, but with a majority, for it to have such powers. In Wales, the referendum was on the establishment of an assembly without any tax-raising powers whatever. It would be completely wrong not to have a referendum to establish whether it should. I give a commitment to the Secretary of State and to the people of Wales that under no circumstances would tax-raising powers ever be introduced for an assembly in Wales by a future Conservative Government without the Welsh people stating that that is exactly what they wish.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): I apologise for my absence at the start of the debate. My train should have arrived at 2.20 pm, but because of the railways policy of the previous Government—now the official Opposition—it arrived at 4.45 pm, so I deserve an official apology from them. This is an extraordinary state of affairs.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) did not make in his recycled speech what I would describe as substantial points.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I have to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. I seem to remember—he belongs to the same profession as me—being reminded during the early days of my career, "You shall take the train you need before the train you need to get to the court on time."

Mr. Livsey: I shall not be diverted. The fact that the train was one and a half hours late speaks for itself.

The new clause is an important aspect of the possibility of giving the assembly powers that could be useful. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley referred to the Sunday closing referendums that we used to have in Wales. We recognise that the clause on referendums applies only to secondary legislation; the assembly does not have the ability to make primary legislation. The assembly might seek a view on primary legislation to represent to Parliament. Parliament might wish to grant tax-varying powers to the assembly if that were the wish of the people of Wales. Westminster might enact primary legislation for that to occur. Is such a referendum possible?

What provision is there to implement legislation that follows a referendum? If the Welsh voted overwhelmingly in favour of tax-varying powers, would Westminster have any power to implement such legislation?

5.15 pm

There are other areas where referendums would be of great use in Wales. Perhaps county councils—particularly in the present climate with regard to the countryside—could be enabled to expand their smallholding schemes. It might involve enabling county councils to get hold of more capital to carry out such a policy. Would such a referendum be possible within a county in Wales, supported by the assembly? There are many issues where referendums could be useful. I, too, was on the countryside march yesterday, and proud of it.

Mr. Letwin: I shall, if I may, intrude a little further on the Secretary of State's good will and press slightly further the point raised by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis), who asked whether the Welsh assembly would have the power to conduct referendums in the absence of the new clause.

I draw the Secretary of State's attention to clause 39, in which we are told that the assembly may do anything that is calculated to facilitate or is "conducive or incidental to the exercise of any of its functions."

Does clause 39 give the assembly the power to hold referendums? If it does not, it would be extremely interesting to know whether that is because of the disconnection between a referendum and the functions of the assembly, or whether it is because the holding of a referendum could not be regarded as calculated to facilitate such functions. In other words, is the problem that a referendum might not be connected with the functions allocated in the Bill? Or could a referendum be construed as not facilitating those functions? If the answer is the second rather than the first, there could be forms of referendum that would be legitimate under the Bill as drafted, whereas other forms might not be. It would help the Committee to know, as we have not enlarged sufficiently in Committee on the general scope of the powers in clause 39.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): I speak in opposition to the new clause. It is extraordinarily vague and has the potential for great confusion, disruption and mischief-making. It is not circumscribed in any way. [Interruption.]

Mr. Ron Davies: I am grateful for the robust defence of the Government's position, but I should tell my hon. Friend that our position is flexible on this matter. He should not dig a deep hole for me, which I might find it difficult to get out of.

Mr. Thomas: If my right hon. Friend had contained himself, I would have gone on to enlighten him, by explaining why I regard the new clause, as drafted, to be extraordinarily vague. It refers simply to an ability for the assembly to "conduct a referendum . . . on any matter affecting Wales."

That ability is not circumscribed and is not confined to secondary legislation within the areas of government devolved to the assembly. This is an extraordinary omission.

As the new clause stands, it raises several crucial questions. The clause makes no reference to what rules should apply in relation to how the referendums should be conducted or to who will pay for them. It fails to take account of the important issue that the raison d'être for an assembly is to give Wales an elected voice through that assembly and through its elected representatives. Any attempt to use such a device as is proposed too speedily would, in my view, undermine the principle behind the assembly. That is why I object to the new clause.

Mr. Grieve: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Thomas: I have finished speaking.

Mr. Ron Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) for making, as he normally does, a forthright and vigorous defence of the Government's position. It was a particularly well-considered speech.

I wish to express my disappointment. I had hoped that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) had learned something over the past couple of weeks. For the first one and a half hours of the debate the hon. Gentleman was the model of circumspection—he was considered and well researched and it was a pleasure to listen to him—but then he degenerated into his old diatribe, which we have heard time after time. At the end of it, I was not sure whether he was speaking in favour of the new clause or against it.

It is worth reminding the Committee that new clause 11 is very brief. It reads:

"The Assembly may conduct a referendum in Wales on any matter affecting Wales."

The contribution of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley was astonishing. He talked about fox hunting, local councils, Parliament instructing the assembly and taxing powers. I am rather surprised that he did not suggest that we should have a referendum on the right to roam. If anyone wants the right to roam enshrined in legislation, it would seem to be the hon. Gentleman, having roamed all over the place. He made no reference to the new clause.

I wish to put one point to the hon. Gentleman forcefully. He reverted to type and talked about the referendum of 18 September, which the people of Wales won and which embarked us on this course of legislation. It was, of course, a consultative referendum. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to pursue the matter, let me remind him that the House of Commons voted by a majority of 231 on Second Reading to endorse the proposed legislation. That is what has given the present process of legislation real authority. We had an advisory referendum and the Bill has the vigorous, whole-hearted and full endorsement of the House of Commons.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will put aside, as he managed to do for the first one and a half hours this evening, all his worst prejudices against the people of Wales. I hope that he will accept—I know that the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) would be the first to do so—and acknowledge how reasonable the Government are on these matters, and how flexible and emollient we are when the Opposition make any reasonable suggestion, whether it comes from the Liberal Democrats, Plaid Cymru or even the Conservatives. If there is a shred of substance or rationality in proposed amendments, I am prepared to consider them.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Devizes will persuade his hon. Friend to acknowledge that the Government are exercising discretion and operating in the most delicate way possible in embarking on this process of legislation.

Mr. Evans: That is, of course, entirely in character with the way in which the Secretary of State conducts himself in the House of Commons. I was trying to be as reasonable as I possibly could in speaking to the new clause. However, I believe that the assembly would have the power itself to conduct a referendum. That is why I asked several questions, especially on constitutional matters. I am merely stating—it is a clear fact, irrespective of how we wish to rewrite history—that the most recent referendum held in Wales was not a great success, with only 50 per cent. of the people turning out.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman may believe that the Bill empowers the assembly. He will forgive me if I choose to rely on advice other than that which comes from the Opposition Dispatch Box, from the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman's point was taken up by the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), whose contribution I shall refer to before I take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis), who introduced the new clause. I refer the hon. Member for West Dorset to my reply to a previous debate, during which a similar question was asked. The assembly is a creature of statute. Unless power is spelt out in the founding, primary legislation, there must be a question whether that power can be properly exercised. That is my answer to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for West Dorset asked about the general power that exists in clause 39. It may well be that that clause could be used if the referendum being proposed was in pursuance of other powers that the assembly was exercising. There is some doubt whether clause 39 would provide the authority for a referendum to be held, if it were being held on a matter not in pursuance of other powers that the assembly was implementing. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that there is doubt whether at present the assembly has such power.

I return to the hon. Member for Ceredigion. I do not want to give a commitment at this stage to return with a Government amendment relating to the new clause. However, the hon. Gentleman has raised a serious issue and I would like to examine further the points raised by the new clause.

[Mr. Davies]

I have a number of concerns about the proposal that is at present before the Committee in the form of the clause. First, the clause does not make clear what electoral rules would apply for any referendum. The Government are determined to ensure that whenever a referendum is held, the rules are laid down clearly by the House of Commons and that they are followed scrupulously by the various electoral officers who are appointed to undertake the task. I want to ensure that any amendment that the Government were minded to bring forward would make clear what electoral rules would apply for any such referendums.

The referendums that have been held in the United Kingdom on several occasions over the past 25 years have been authorised by an Act of Parliament, as was the case last year, which led to the Referendums (Scotland and Wales) Act 1997. If the assembly were to have a power to conduct referendums in Wales, it would need to be constructed in such a way that it did not involve a power to make primary legislation. Paragraph 34 of schedule 12 to the Local Government Act 1972—the point raised by the hon. Member for Ceredigion about community polls in Wales—may be a precedent. That is one of the matters to which I want to give further consideration.

Finally, any explicit power for the assembly to conduct referendums would have to be limited in some way to its range of responsibilities and make it clear that the assembly would meet the cost of holding them.

I repeat that I cannot give a commitment—

Mr. Evans: The Secretary of State has just made the important point that the assembly would not be able to instruct that a referendum be held on an issue involving primary legislation. What would be the position if it were to have an advisory referendum as opposed to one involving primary legislation directly—that is, if it did not have that power anyway—and decided that it wished to have one on the independence of Wales, for instance? Would it be able to do that?

Mr. Davies: With respect, the hon. Gentleman has missed my point. I was saying that referendums that have been held previously have been the result of primary legislation that has passed through this Parliament. If the assembly were to have a power to conduct a referendum, it would need to be constructed in such a way that it was not seen to be itself exercising a power which was similar to primary legislation. It is the process by which the referendum is authorised that is of concern, and not so much the question that would form the matter for public debate. I hope that that deals with the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Ancram: Under the Bill as it stands, or under any amendment that the Secretary of State might table, would the Welsh assembly be able to instruct that a referendum be held on whether Wales should become independent or remain within the United Kingdom? Because of the reserved nature of constitutional matters in Scotland, there is genuine doubt about whether the Scottish Parliament would have such a power.

Mr. Davies: There is no doubt in my mind that the Bill as drafted does not give the assembly authority to hold referendums, which is why I shall consider the point raised by the hon. Member for Ceredigion. I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman a precise answer, because this is not a Government amendment and I am not proposing such a power.

5.30 pm

Mr. Ancram: Will the Secretary of State write to me on the matter?

Mr. Davies: If I do not table an amendment, I shall certainly write to the right hon. Gentleman. However, if we decided not to table an amendment, it would not be necessary to clarify the position because there would be no opportunity to hold referendums.

The principle must be that any referendum would have to be properly authorised and on a matter for which the assembly was responsible. If we were to go down that path and the Government were to propose such a power, there should be a debate about the matters on which the assembly should have the authority to hold referendums.

Mr. Letwin: Earlier, the Secretary of State mentioned the promotion of private Bills. Would any amendment that he tabled give the assembly the right to hold a referendum on its proposed promotion of such a Bill?

Mr. Davies: I gave way to the hon. Gentleman to enable me to reply to a point that he made in that previous debate. I wrote to him on 26 January and 19 February, giving detailed answers to questions that he had asked. I hope that he will put the record straight and acknowledge that my civil servants and I have been diligent and forthright in answering the questions that he has quite properly asked.

Mr. Letwin: I referred not to those illuminating letters, for which I am duly grateful and to which we might return on Report, but to Wednesday's debates on the Welsh Development Agency. The Secretary of State said that if he was mistaken in what he was telling me, he would write to me. Subsequent researches have shown that he was mistaken, and I hope that he will write to me.

Mr. Davies: If I undertook to write to the hon. Gentleman if I was mistaken, I shall do so, but I find such circumstances difficult to conceive. Nevertheless, I shall allow for the possibility and assure the hon. Gentleman that if I have made a promise, I shall keep it.

The hon. Gentleman should not interpret my remarks as a commitment to table an amendment allowing for referendums to be held. I shall consider such a provision, but I specifically said that I am not giving any commitment. However, he made a fair point: if the assembly were to promote a private Bill, I should have thought that it would want to ensure that there was wide support for the measure. The assembly might decide that there should be a referendum on a private Bill, but that is a matter for the assembly. It is not for me to speculate on how the assembly would use its powers to hold a referendum or to promote private legislation, should it be given them. Such matters will have to be considered some way down the road.

I repeat that I am not giving a commitment to table a Government amendment. However, I want further to consider those serious questions, and hope that the motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. Dafis: The debate has been useful and I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his responses.

I must place on record my undying and profound admiration for the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who is exceptionally skilled in flogging a dead horse. I am not sure whether his skills are becoming more or less admirable, but he seems to have an unending capacity in this regard. He also has a remarkable ability for losing track of the substance discussion. My special skill is mixing metaphors, but we shall leave that matter to one side.

The hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) questioned the appropriateness of referendums for making decisions. That is not what the debate is about: the question is whether the National Assembly for Wales should have such powers. Local bodies and bodies with responsibility for national legislation have such powers, so it would be wrong for the assembly to be unable to resort to referendums, should it wish to do so.

I am glad that the Secretary of State will consider these matters further, and I urge him to do so. I had not envisaged the assembly holding referendums on major constitutional issues. The power should be used sparingly and only when necessary, to ensure that policies that it had advocated were acceptable in Wales and were strengthened by a democratic mandate.

We have some confidence that the Secretary of State will bring forward a proposal. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 12

ADVICE FROM UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT STAFF

'.—(1) A member of the executive committee may request advice from staff of United Kingdom government departments and other public bodies in cases where the member considers that this would assist him in the carrying out of his duties under this Act.

(2) The Assembly and the Cabinet Office shall draw up a concordat governing arrangements for staff of United Kingdom government departments and other public bodies to respond to requests made under subsection (1).'.—[Mr. Wigley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause deals with the important matter of the right of members of the Executive Committee of the assembly to obtain advice from staff of United Kingdom Government Departments, or other public bodies, on matters that are relevant to their functions. Existing, and particularly proposed, legislation on subjects whose executive and administrative dimensions have been devolved will have implications for Wales. A member of the Executive Committee who is in charge of, for example, education or health in Wales might need advice from UK governmental staff in London who are drawing up legislation that affects Wales.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I am interested in the right hon. Gentleman's reference to UK Government Departments. He also mentioned education and health. As I understand it, no UK Government Departments will cover education and health in Wales.

Mr. Wigley: The right hon. Gentleman may want to move an amendment on Report to deal with that matter if the new clause is agreed to. As he well knows, legislation dealing with education in Wales will be passed at Westminster, not in our National Assembly for Wales. However, a member of the Executive Committee of the assembly will be responsible for the implementation of such legislation in Wales. Particular circumstances in Wales may bear on the framing, content and implementation of such legislation.

I accept that the new clause may be defective because it refers to Government Departments, but it is a probing amendment. We are trying to establish whether the right to advice exists. I hope that the Secretary of State will be able to confirm that such a right exists, or that, if it does not, a provision along the lines of my new clause is needed. If it would better meet the requirements of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), a new clause could be tabled, worded differently from mine but at least going in the same direction.

The Bill needs to be clear. Those charged with making decisions in the Cardiff Executive need to know where they stand. The door needs to be open. Subsection (2) of the new clause provides for the drawing up of "a concordat governing arrangements" for that approach to be possible. The concordat is necessary, for the simple reason that there may be an Executive in Cardiff of one political persuasion, and a Government in London of another political persuasion.

Mr. Denzil Davies: That is devolution. The right hon. Gentleman wants devolution and a unitary state at the same time.

Mr. Wigley: This particular Member of Parliament would be very happy for all the law-making powers to be in our own national assembly in Cardiff, where the problem would not arise. The problem arises because of the split function, and the need to ensure that those in charge of framing legislation have some interface with those who must act on the implications of the legislation. My party would be very happy for the assembly to have the full powers available to the Scottish Parliament to make its own laws on, for instance, education, without having to come to Westminster; but that is not what we are discussing. The new clause tries to deal with the difficulty that may arise because of the split function.

We need a concordat of some kind, although whether it is enshrined in legislation may be another issue. We need ground rules to ensure that those who, from May 1999 onwards, will be carrying out their new responsibilities in the assembly know exactly what they can and cannot do. We do not want their route to be blocked by certain political considerations at Westminster. We want certain rights to be embedded in primary legislation—rights on which they can fall back when necessary.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I will speak briefly. The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) became more and more confused as his speech went on—

Mr. Wigley: Rubbish.

Mr. Davies: That is the kind of reaction that we receive from members of Plaid Cymru—is it still Plaid Cymru?—when we criticise them.

[Mr. Davies]

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a split function. There is no split function; there are two separate functions. The right hon. Gentleman is talking about the function of the assembly, and the function of United Kingdom Departments. The Treasury, the Foreign Office, the Home Office, the Department of Social Security, the Department for Education and Employment and the Ministry of Defence will be involved, but I can think of no other functions that will be carried out on a United Kingdom basis.

That goes to the heart of the problem. The right hon. Gentleman says that it is just a matter of drafting, but drafting often shows up defective thinking, and in this instance there has certainly been defective thinking. There is no reason why the assembly should go to United Kingdom Departments for advice. It can go to the Secretary of State for Wales, who presumably is considered to come within the ambit of the phrase "United Kingdom government departments". After all, he will have nothing much else to do.

Mr. Wigley: I should have thought that it was fairly clear that the Welsh Office is a UK Department for this purpose. The new clause covers the Secretary of State for Wales, but it also covers other Departments. It includes the Treasury—with which a link may well be needed—as well as Departments such as the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. When it comes to national heritage, the relationship between UK and Welsh responsibilities is very unclear.

Mr. Davies: Why on earth should a member of the Welsh assembly be able to demand advice from Her Majesty's Treasury about UK matters? I understand the point about the Secretary of State for Wales. I would not object if the new clause said that a member of the Executive Committee could request advice from staff of the Secretary of State for Wales—although he may not have staff—because, as a member of the Cabinet, he can presumably ask other Departments what effect this or that legislation will have on Wales.

It is being suggested, however, that a member of the assembly should be able to roam around under powers not available to Members of Parliament. I am not in favour of the Official Secrets Act, but it exists. Will members of the assembly sign it when they ask for information? Not only is the new clause misconceived: it shows how much confusion there is.

Subsection (2) asks for a concordat. Apparently, there are to be concordats in any event, because there is a real problem. Perhaps, when he responds to—and, I hope, rejects—this rather silly new clause, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will tell us when we shall see those concordats. Will they appear before Third Reading? My right hon. Friend indicates that that is possible. How will we be able to debate them, and with whom will they be drawn up? I cannot imagine that the assembly and the Cabinet Office will have their own little concordat. I do not see where the Cabinet Office comes into it.

5.45 pm

Mr. Wigley: May I press the right hon. Gentleman, to ensure that I fully understand his objection? Does he object to the fact that we refer to a member of the Executive Committee? Does he assume that there would be some links on a civil service level between those serving the Executive in Cardiff and civil servants here, given that we have a unified civil service?

Mr. Davies: That is not what the new clause says.

Mr. Wigley: I asked the right hon. Gentleman a question.

Mr. Davies: There is not much point in the right hon. Gentleman asking me. We are debating his new clause, and his new clause says that a Member of the Assembly—an elected Member, albeit a member of the Executive—can roam around Departments and ask civil servants for advice. It goes on to ask for a concordat to ensure that that happens. It makes no sense.

I do not want to go on about the drafting, but subsection (2) also refers to public bodies. Who are those public bodies? Again, Members of the Assembly can roam around and ask them questions. Does that apply to all public bodies? The new clause is wholly misconceived, but that is not the point; the point is that there is complete confusion in the right hon. Gentleman's mind—and, indeed, in his party.

Mr. Livsey: We support the new clause. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) seems almost to be asking whether there is a right to roam among civil servants, but I do not think that that is the context in which the new clause was tabled. I believe that it would give access to UK civil service expertise in regard to, for instance, important Ministry of Defence issues. There is a danger that a camp may be closed in my constituency, which would have a considerable impact on employment in the area. I am curtailing my speech, but I think that Members of the Assembly should have access to expertise on such matters.

Mr. Evans: I, too will speak briefly.

The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) referred to the Executive sitting in Cardiff. I am not sure whether such a decision has been made. Presumably that was a Freudian slip, unless there is something going on which we have not yet been told.

Will the Secretary of State clarify the relationship that will exist between his Department, with its own civil service, and the assembly? Obviously, members of the assembly's Executive will make policy at a secondary level, but I suspect that they will want to have constant discussions with the Secretary of State. During our debates, we have been led to believe that there is a great hope that the assembly and the Secretary of State—irrespective of the political colours under which they happen to be flying—will work together in the best interests of the people of Wales. Perhaps he will put some flesh on the bones of the matter to show exactly what the Secretary of State will do after devolution. I suspect that much of his work will be negotiation and consultation with the assembly. Plaid Cymru is trying to have its cake and eat it. It wants the best of both worlds.

Mr. Ron Davies: My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) was absolutely right in his critique of the new clause. The right hon. Member for Caernarfon

(Mr. Wigley) said that there should be consultation between the assembly and Whitehall Departments, but his new clause refers to a "member of the executive committee", and that is its weakness.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) spoke about relationships. Obviously, there will have to be a close working relationship between the Secretary of State and his Department and the assembly. The better, closer and more clearly defined that relationship is, the better will be the government of Wales. I cannot pretend that in my inside pocket I have a list of do's and don'ts or prescriptions or rules that will apply to ensure that relationship. However, the holder of my office when the assembly is in being will realise that there is a heavy responsibility to ensure that the relationship operates as effectively as possible. I shall write to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley if he requires further information.

I understand why the right hon. Member for Caernarfon moved the new clause, but, as I have said, it is defective and does not seem to achieve what he wants. However, it is right to explore the nature of the relationship between the assembly and Whitehall Departments. It is important to remember that the Welsh Office does not operate in isolation from the rest of Government. There was discussion about the continuing role of the Department for Education and Employment and the Health Department. The assembly will derive its changing powers to operate under secondary legislation from the nature of primary legislation that has been passed by Parliament.

It is important that the desires of the assembly should be transmitted to people in Departments that are responsible for drafting legislation to facilitate the assembly's work. There will certainly be a need for a continuing relationship not only on the non-devolved matters that my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli spoke about—he mentioned the Home Office, the Treasury and the Ministry of Defence—but on devolved matters. At the moment, departmental work proceeds smoothly because information and professional advice are shared, and policies and secondary legislation are developed in consultation within Government. It is a two-way process.

The assembly will want a framework of liaison arrangements with relevant Departments, and they will be based on the existing positive relationships between civil servants in the Welsh Office and their counterparts in other Departments. Of course, those are relationships between civil servants and not between Executive Committee members or assembly Secretaries. The Government concluded that that relationship is best provided by a series of non-statutory concordats, whose nature has already been debated. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli spoke about those.

It is most unlikely that the concordats will be available before Third Reading, but my right hon. Friend will know, and other hon. Members may be interested to know, that I published on Friday a statement of the principles for drawing up concordats. Copies have been placed in the Library. Hon. Members who wish to get a feel of the Government's thinking on the matter should study that document, which consists of two and a half pages. It could not be classified as a ripping good yarn, but it is worth reading.

It will be for the assembly to agree the concordats. In the meantime, we shall work up drafts based on the principle of providing the assembly and Whitehall Departments with the confidence that working relationships will be conducted properly and in accordance with agreed processes such as adequate consultation, and will avoid constraining either the assembly or Whitehall Departments in their fields of competence.

Mr. Wigley: Perhaps I could be clear. Is the Minister saying that the non-statutory concordats that may be developed will enshrine a right to ask for advice at civil servant level from Departments other than the Welsh Office if those Departments are in charge of drawing up legislation that may affect Wales? May I take it that that right would not be unreasonably refused?

Mr. Davies: As I have said, it will be for the assembly to agree the concordats, so I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman a categorical assurance about a right. I cannot bind the Government or the assembly on that, but I can make it clear that we shall certainly work up the drafts of the principles.

There must obviously be proper working relationships, and they require an exchange of ideas and information. While I cannot say to the right hon. Gentleman that rights will be enshrined in the concordats, which will be non-statutory, I can assure him that the Government wish to make sure that the concordats provide the necessary framework for consultation between the Government and the assembly.

Mr. Ancram: Last week, the Secretary of State answered a question on concordats and set out the basis on which they would operate. Am I right in thinking that they will not come before Parliament or, indeed, the assembly for debate?

Mr. Davies: We discussed those matters in some detail in earlier proceedings. The concordats will be non-statutory, and they will not be finalised until the assembly is established. As I have said, it will be a matter for the assembly and the Government of the day to decide how those matters are to be presented to Parliament. That is not to say that they will be presented to the House. The concordats will be agreements between the Government and the assembly and will not have any legislative force as a result of measures that have been passed by Parliament. I should be happy to discuss the matter.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ron Davies: As my right hon. Friend knows, the knife is about to fall, but I shall give way briefly.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Will there be separate concordats for each Department or will there be one giant concordat?

Mr. Ron Davies: Just as there will be not one giant dome but a dome with a baby, so there will not be one giant concordat. I am not promising baby concordats, but there will be a concordat for each Department. We have already explored the matter. The working relationship between the assembly and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be close, and, because of the European dimension, it will be important. The concordat for that Ministry will be different from those for other Departments in which the assembly's involvement will be less. There will be a series of concordats.

[Mr. Ron Davies]

I take direct advice on only a few matters from officials in other Departments. We debated forestry policy earlier, and that is a good example, because on that I am advised directly by officials from the Forestry Commission, which is a public body. Of course, I also receive advice from my own officials.

The new clause provides for almost unfettered rights for assembly Secretaries to request advice from officials in any Government Department or public body. That goes far beyond current practice, and risks placing unreasonable work loads on officials in those Departments without any constraints on cost, time or good working practice. On that basis, we cannot accept the new clause as drafted. However, where appropriate, the relevant concordat will provide for assembly Secretaries to have access to advice on the basis on which I have access now, but it will be via civil servants of the assembly. It will be for them to have relationships via the concordats with Whitehall Departments before feeding the information to the assembly Secretaries.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Caernarfon—having initiated the probing debate that he wanted—has been satisfied by that response. I invite him to withdraw new clause 12.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that response. Obviously, we will have to wait to see the detail of those concordats before we can reach any firm conclusion on them. However, I am glad that this short debate has facilitated an opportunity for the Committee to give some attention to the matter, and for the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) to ask questions which were clearly worrying him on a matter that would not have been dealt with otherwise in our debates.

On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 14

CONSULTATION WITH BUSINESSES

'.—(1) The Assembly shall make a scheme (referred to in the Act as the business scheme) setting out how the Assembly proposes, in the exercise of its functions, to sustain and promote business in Wales.

(2) The Assembly shall consult with such businesses and business organisations in Wales as it considers appropriate before making, remaking or revising the scheme and in making, remaking or revising the scheme the Assembly shall have regard to any advice which has been given and to any representations which have been made to the Assembly by businesses and business organisations in Wales.

(3) In determining at any time the provisions to be included in the scheme the Assembly shall consider how it intends to exercise such of its functions as relate to matters affecting, or of concern to, business in Wales.

(4) The scheme shall specify—

(a) how the Assembly proposes to consult business and business organizations in Wales about the exercise of such of its functions as relate to matters affecting or of concern to such businesses and organizations, and

(b) how the Assembly proposes to monitor the extent to which any proposed subordinate legislation is consistent with sustaining or promoting business in Wales and the extent to which it imposes obligations or costs on businesses in Wales.

(5) The Assembly shall keep the scheme under review and in the year following each ordinary election shall consider whether it should be remade or revised.

(6) The Assembly shall publish the scheme when first made and whenever subsequently remade and, if the scheme is revised without being remade shall publish either the revisions or the scheme as revised (as it considers appropriate).

(7) After each financial year of the Assembly, the Assembly shall publish a report of how its proposals as specified in the scheme are implemented in that financial year.'.—[Ms Lawrence.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 14 would require the assembly to establish a scheme stating its proposals on sustaining and promoting business in Wales. From the commencement of our debates on the Bill, and following publication of the White Paper, the Secretary of State has maintained that the legislation is built around partnership and inclusivity. In clause 64, the Bill is already innovative in stating a commitment to consult business in Wales, which has not previously been consulted. The new clause attempts to recognise that innovation, but goes a little further and gives business interests parity with the interests of both local government and the voluntary sector, which are already more comprehensively provided for in clauses 110 and 111.

The proposals in the new clause attempt to establish a proactive approach in the relationship between the assembly and the business sector, rather than a merely reactive approach by the assembly, which might have a knock-on effect on the Welsh business sector.

I have determined from my discussions with businesses in my constituency that there is widespread support for the Bill's proposals requiring the assembly to assess the cost implications for business of any proposed regulations and to consider businesses' views. There is widespread support also for a strategic approach to economic development in Wales—via the new Welsh Development Agency—by establishing links with the four economic forums, by placing renewed emphasis on indigenous businesses and, therefore, by implication, by placing emphasis on sustainable development.

The Federation of Small Businesses has stated that there are 3.45 million small and medium-sized enterprises across the United Kingdom, and that if the economic climate enabled each of them to take on one more employee, there would be no unemployment in the UK. UK-wide, 80 per cent. of jobs are provided by companies employing fewer than 20 people. In my constituency, that percentage is even higher.

In the spirit of the partnership and inclusivity promised by the Secretary of State, the views of SMEs must be heard and listened to if we are to make real progress in the battle to improve gross domestic product in Wales. Within the framework of the national assembly, there must be a recognition of the role of business in that process. Every effort must be made to improve Wales's ability to produce competitive goods and services.

The assembly's economic structures and policies must promote Welsh business as the basis of improving the standard of living of everyone—not only selected parts of Wales.

Establishing in the Bill a scheme specifying plans to promote and maintain Welsh business will give Welsh business parity with local government and the voluntary sector. Clauses 110, 111 and 33, for example, provide for the assembly—quite rightly—to create a scheme to sustain and promote local government in Wales, to promote the interests of the voluntary sector and to support cultural aspects of Welsh life. However, it is equally right that similar arrangements should be made to promote the interests of businesses in Wales, on which the vitality of the Welsh economy ultimately depends. New clause 14 would meet that need, and ensure that the assembly listened to business and worked in partnership with it. New clause 14 would also have the benefit of ensuring that outside expertise from the business community was available, ensuring that the assembly's Committees were well informed in their decision making.

As a member of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, I have been involved in recent investigations into the effects that the national assembly will have on economic development in Wales. Evidence given to that Committee, which was published last week, shows that business believes that the assembly holds tremendous potential, but also that it is essential that extra burdens are not placed on Welsh business in comparison with business in England. Businesses' concerns related to both the implementation of secondary legislation and to such pragmatic matters as the assembly's handling of issues such as planning appeals and call-ins.

The Confederation of British Industry, for example, feared that proposals to handle in Committee the Secretary of State's current role in determining appeals and call-ins might cause delays that would disadvantage Welsh business. That concern provides a simple example of the need for the assembly to think not only proactively but strategically in maintaining its links with business, and to think through the impact of all its actions on Wales's businesses. A scheme such as that outlined in new clause 14 would create the framework for such an interchange.

Clause 41(2) provides for the assembly to make subordinate legislation provision for Wales that is different from that for England, recognising Wales's and England's different needs. However, it is vital to ensure that businesses in Wales are not disadvantaged in economic development, by having to bear greater compliance burdens than businesses in England.

A local cheese maker in my constituency informed me that the business's compliance burden increased tenfold during the time when the previous Government were in office. The assembly will have the responsibility not only to ensure that that burden is not increased but, I hope, to reduce it. Similarly, the new clause will ensure that a mechanism is established to avoid such increases in compliance burdens.

The opportunities offered to Wales by the establishment of the national assembly, as stated in the Bill, are exciting and innovative. However, the additional benefits gained by implementing a scheme such as that outlined in the new clause would be even more significant.

Mr. Evans: At this juncture, I should declare my interest in having a small business in Swansea, which I still own, and in having—as have several generations of my family—many years of business experience in the retail trade.

Mr. Ron Davies: Was it handed down?

Mr. Evans: Yes, of course; like new Labour, we believe in the hereditary principle. [Interruption.]

I am generally in favour of new clause 14. I hope that the proposed scheme will make transparent the assembly's plans for supporting businesses.

The super-quango consisting of the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Land Authority for Wales will also have policies to promote businesses in Wales. In Wednesday's debate, we discussed the CBI's concern about whether the assembly would meddle too much in the new super-quango's daily functions. The question arises as to whether new clause 14 enables the new WDA to formulate strategic policy and to eliminate confusion. If the new clause does that, it is a good idea.

The new clause's proposals to consider businesses' interests on the same level as those of the voluntary sector and of local government are also absolutely right, so that there is no confusion in the super-quango's demarcation of its various roles.

We shall have to do a bit more than merely pay lip service to our desire to promote business in Wales. I am sure that all political parties in Wales want Welsh businesses to do well, whether they are established by inward investment or are new indigenous Welsh businesses. We want all businesses in Wales to prosper.

We know that businesses in Wales already must confront problems such as the 48-hour working week, a minimum wage and works councils. Moreover, with the introduction of regional development agencies in England, we shall want to ensure that businesses in Wales are able to compete on an equal footing with businesses in the rest of the United Kingdom.

I support the ethos of the new clause. I hope that whatever scheme is set up—irrespective of whether it is under the new clause—consultation will go further than the CBI and the Institute of Directors, as many other all-Wales bodies are equally relevant.

The hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) was absolutely right to mention small businesses, as they represent the vast majority of businesses in Wales. We have to look to that sector to increase employment. We can no longer rely on the large industries that employ 15,000 to 20,000 people to generate extra jobs. Small and medium-sized enterprises are spread around Wales, and they should be given every encouragement, as that will benefit the whole of Wales. We should consult the Federation of Small Businesses and local chambers of commerce throughout Wales and listen carefully to their views on promoting business.

The hon. Lady mentioned that the gross domestic product in Wales is very low, especially in certain areas. That was demonstrated by the reply to my recent question to the Secretary of State for Wales. There is clearly inequality in that respect. Therefore, we need to ensure that areas that are doing badly will be boosted by any new scheme.

[Mr. Evans]

On Wednesday, we agreed that "business" should have a wide meaning, and that certainly applies to the new clause. Given yesterday's events, we should remember that many farms in Wales are desperate for support. I hope that any new scheme will also consider how the assembly can establish policies genuinely to assist small businesses in the rural community, and particularly farmers. We must also consider the ripple effect. Businesses that supply farms with tractors and capital goods, and which repair barns and erect fences and walls, are also affected by the current crisis.

The next debate will be about the regional aspect. Any new scheme must reach all parts of Wales.

Mr. Livsey: I congratulate the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) on introducing the new clause. It is absolutely essential that the assembly should consult business. The proposed scheme would provide business advice to the assembly and would undoubtedly benefit the Welsh economy and investment prospects for Wales.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) referred to small businesses, which are particularly important as they are more likely to provide indigenous growth, which is vital to increasing employment and wealth creation throughout Wales. In many of our constituencies, particularly rural ones, up to one third of the population is self-employed. Many self-employed people run small businesses and are often burdened with a great deal of bureaucracy. There will be a need for businesses—particularly small businesses—to liaise with the assembly in respect of how they can best be assisted. There is evidence of a lack of a level playing field for small native businesses as compared with inward investment schemes from other parts of the world. Certainly in mid-Wales, businesses from other parts of the United Kingdom appear to have greater advantages than indigenous enterprises.

Reference has been made to the agriculture industry. About 56,000 people are involved in farming in Wales—I was one of them for a considerable time, although I was never a newsagent. I hope that the new clause will enable a policy to emerge, to assist those small businesses to develop for the benefit of everyone in Wales.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) on introducing the new clause, which the Government should consider carefully. It is vital that the new assembly consults business, but there is already a requirement in the Bill for it to do just that. It is a welcome innovation.

We should be careful, however. It is my view that the assembly's relationship with business is crucial to the success of the assembly and to economic development in Wales in the coming years. We have to get that relationship absolutely right. There are dangers in thinking that we can legislate on a relationship between Government and business in Wales and thereby solve most of our problems. It is not quite that simple. We have to establish a relationship that allows business and Government to do what they do best without interference. We should not ask business to behave as a philanthropic or democratic organisation or expect Government to behave as a business. Traditionally, the record on that is not terribly good.

Wales has been particularly good at establishing just such relationships. Our economic success in respect of inward investment has been due almost exclusively to the "team Wales" approach and has set the standard for the rest of the United Kingdom. It is one reason why other regions look to us with envy—and so they should—in respect of attracting direct foreign investment. However, trying to attract the English investment to which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) referred presents a more difficult problem. We have to be clear about making sure that we get our fair share.

We should remember that London and the immediate surrounding area accounts for 40 per cent. of our GDP per capita. Wales has the lowest percentage in the United Kingdom and the gap is widening, so we have to take a balanced approach to developing indigenous small and medium-sized companies. Of course we have to do that, especially in areas that depend on small businesses, but we must also recognise that we must continue the battle to attract our fair share of United Kingdom investment and build clusters of small Welsh companies to service incoming companies. That means that we have to get the formula right, so I ask the Government to consider the new clause carefully.

Mr. Wigley: I welcome the opportunity that the new clause provides to examine the opportunities for business. The National Assembly for Wales should provide a stimulus for the business sector and encourage people to take the initiative, take risks and set up enterprises because of the atmosphere of confidence that we hope will be engendered. It should not tie businesses in knots and prevent them from undertaking ventures.

In examining the phrasing of the new clause, I fear that businesses might expect to play a greater role in determining policy than might be possible in practice. The hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) gave the example of the town and country planning function. Businesses are understandably worried that the processes may be slowed down. They may hope that subsection (4) would provide them with a means of influencing planning decisions as them. That might give them inappropriate leverage in the planning function. If the provisions are to mean anything, businesses will want such influence, but it may not be possible to provide it in the mechanism for even-handed planning at assembly level.

The assembly must feel itself to be a partner with business and industry in Wales, working hand in hand with them to create the conditions for a thriving economy. The hon. Lady obviously has the creation of such a partnership in mind. The thrust of the new clause must be of relevance to the Government and the assembly.

Mr. Dalyell: I should like to raise a practical problem. Last year, I had the good fortune of opening a branch unit of Personnel Hygiene Services in the small village of Blackridge in West Lothian. The Secretary of State will know that the headquarters of Personnel Hygiene Services are in his constituency, in the Western industrial estate in Caerphilly—the postcode is CF83 1XH. I expect that he knows it well. They are good people. The Welsh leaders were most welcome among us.

However, the company has a problem. On 19 February, Mr. Louis Howe wrote to me on behalf of the company about the Special Waste Regulations 1996. He said:

"Of particular interest is point two, which brought to the attention of the Environment Agency the fact that the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency are interpreting the Regulations differently to the Environment Agency.

We find this particularly annoying as we believed the establishment of the Agencies would lead to common national standards enabling us to standardise our practices and procedures nationally. Unfortunately, we must now regard England/Wales and Scotland as two separate entities and we wonder what disparities will occur in the future to further complicate our businesses."

The House of Commons should be careful about complicating people's businesses. I shall ask the relevant Ministers for the full answers to the details in the letter. Such problems are bound to arise when, to use the phrase of my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), we start unbundling the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I accept the sentiments behind the new clause. The premise is that because small and medium-sized enterprises are so important for the Welsh economy, it is essential that the legislation facilitates a partnership between them and the assembly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) said.

No doubt my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will refer to clause 64, which provides for a regulatory appraisal before general subordinate legislation is approved by the assembly. The effect of legislation on small business will be taken into account in the appraisal. However, that clause does not go far enough. The Government should take on board the points made so well by my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence). Small businesses are vital. Clause 64 refers to a regulatory appraisal simply in the context of subordinate legislation. That is narrow in scope, contrasting with the general reference in the new clause to the functions of the assembly. Clause 64(2) says that an appraisal will not be necessary if it is "inappropriate or not reasonably practicable".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) on presenting the new clause in a positive spirit, with the strong support of all sectors of business in Wales. She has clearly had considerable consultation with the larger business sector and small businesses. I am also pleased that the Opposition are taking a new constructive view, with the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) supporting the important issues raised in the new clause. My hon. Friends the Members for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) and for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) raised some relevant points, which I shall try to deal with later. Coming in from the flank, the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) also supported the principles of the new clause.

We have always believed that the assembly should provide an environment in which business can flourish. In our White Paper, "A Voice for Wales", we laid great stress on the importance of the assembly's role in creating a growing and sustainable economy. That will largely be a matter for the policies of the assembly, which we should not attempt to predetermine in the Bill. As a democratic body, the assembly must develop its own policies and account to its electorate for their effects. We can create an effective institutional framework for it.

We have created a mechanism to ensure that the assembly's legislative procedures take proper account of their effect on business. My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West mentioned clause 64, which provides for statutory regulatory appraisal. That is a significant and radical legislative innovation in Britain, which the CBI has recognised and welcomed.

The new clause is a different matter, going beyond that. In providing for the assembly's relations with local government, the voluntary sector and business, we are not trying to create a blockbuster clause to deal with all the issues, such as sustainable development. We have tried to tackle the issues in a way that will be suitable for each sector. For local government, we have a duty to promote, a scheme and the partnership council—that builds on the existing concordat with local government and the established negotiating machinery. For the voluntary sector, we have consultation arrangements and a duty to promote, building on and strengthening the existing consultation arrangements and the concordat that we are finalising. For business, we have the statutory recognition of a process of regulatory appraisal.

The new clause would knit all those factors together and add them on top of statutory regulatory appraisal. That would create a risk of greater complexity and a slowing down of decision making, referred to by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley. The assembly could become too bureaucratic, which is what business fears most.

We shall resist the detail of the new clause, but I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire that we accept the spirit of it: there should be regular, open and constructive dialogue between business and the assembly—not just with big business but with small business, as the hon. Member for Ribble Valley said, and not just with traditional industries but with business in rural areas. My hon. Friends the Members for Vale of Glamorgan, for Clwyd, West and for Preseli Pembrokeshire all laid stress on encompassing all business in order to get the framework right.

We propose to return to the matter with a Government amendment. In the light of that, I invite my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire to withdraw the motion.

Ms Lawrence: I thank the Minister very much for accepting the new clause's principles. Bearing in mind his commitment to take them on board, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

DECISIONS AFFECTING VITAL INTERESTS OF A REGION

'.—(1) No legislative, administrative or other decision shall be made by the Assembly which the presiding officer determines might reasonably affect the vital interests of any region, unless the same shall have been approved by a resolution of the Assembly which was itself supported by at least one third of the Assembly members in that region.

(2) In making such determination, the presiding officer—

(a) may not be overruled by any resolution of the Assembly, and

(b) shall have regard for the views of the region possibly affected through its regional committee and the individual members thereof, which views shall be binding upon the presiding officer unless he certifies that he is satisfied that the same are without any reasonable weight.'.—[Mr. Ancram.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

6.30 pm

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss new clause 24—Decentralisation within Wales—

'.—The Assembly shall give active consideration to the decentralisation of appropriate functions from Cardiff to other parts of Wales, and shall actively seek to encourage other public sector bodies over which it has control, or which are answerable to it, to do likewise.'.

Mr. Ancram: It is appropriate that we are debating this important new clause on 2 March, the day after St. David's day. I genuinely regret the absence of a St. David's day debate. I was looking forward to participating in my first such debate, as I was told that they were occasions on which matters relating to all interests and parts of Wales could be properly aired. I only hope that the absence of such a debate this year is not a forerunner for future decisions and the beginning of the marginalisation of Welsh Members of Parliament following devolution.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that there could hardly be a more appropriate subject for a debate the day after St. David's day than the constitutional future of Wales?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been listening. I said that it was most appropriate that we were debating the new clause on this date. I was merely making the point that I hope that we are not having a St. David's day debate just because we are having this debate. For the sake of hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies, who will continue to do so after devolution, I hope that we are not seeing an end to the traditional St. David's day debate, which was certainly welcomed by Welsh hon. Members, if not the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas).

Mr. Ron Davies: My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) would not know, because he was not a Member during previous debates.

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will advise his hon. Friend on the value of St. David's day debates.

The new clause stems directly from the result of the referendum on 18 September, when the people of Wales—we cannot avoid the fact that, more precisely, just over 25 per cent. of the people of Wales—voted for an assembly. That tiny minority, about which much has already been said, was not replicated evenly across Wales. Indeed, Wales was effectively split down the middle. The most significant aspect of the result was the regional variation in the yes and no votes. It reflected deep differences and different outlooks—and, indeed, fears—between the various parts of the Principality. The geographic split in the vote was both instructive and not a little alarming. As politicians who are used to studying the nuances of votes, we should be most unwise to ignore the way in which the votes were distributed.

I may not be Welsh, nor can I claim to know Wales as well as I know Scotland but, since June, I have travelled extensively in Wales and regularly visited various parts. It does not take a great deal of expertise to realise that Wales is fundamentally divided. It is not just, as one Labour Member said, that Offa's Dyke has moved west, but that the north fears domination by the more populous south, the east expects and fears favours for the west, and both English and Welsh speakers fear losing out to one another.

I think that we all realise that the north looks not to the south for its economic centre of gravity but to Merseyside and beyond. Monmouth feels more affinity with its erstwhile historic English county neighbours than with its quarter of a century of Welshness. There is fear, resentment and a feeling of a democratic voice being ignored. To turn a blind eye to that would risk storing up immense problems for the future and build in a destabilising factor of unacceptability in the assembly. That would serve nothing, least of all the concept of devolution in Wales.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I want to pull up the right hon. Gentleman on the travesty of history in referring to Monmouth and Wales being connected for a quarter of a century. He may recall that the only reason why Monmouthshire has any English connection is that the Laws in Wales Acts of 1535 and 1542 placed Monmouthshire in the Oxford circuit for judicial purposes—but that was all. One only has to look at the place names in Monmouthshire. In fact, in Herefordshire, the right hon. Gentleman will find a similar good dose of Welsh place names. It could be argued that Offa's Dyke should be moved a little east.

Mr. Ancram: I listen with great care to what the Minister has to say. However, judging by my visits to Monmouth and the correspondence that I have received from there, his view is not unanimously held. I shall be corrected if historically I am wrong, but I think that Monmouth was made a county of Wales in 1972, having previously been a county of England. [Interruption.] I shall certainly be corrected.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. Friend may care to bear in mind when praying in aid the position of Herefordshire that, if questions of national identity are anything to go by, during the disestablishment of the Church of Wales, the parishes on the Radnorshire side of the border were offered the choice of whether to stay in England, and they chose to stay in England. The argument that, somehow, Herefordshire should always be viewed differently is complete bunkum.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The argument is straying into English matters. I should be grateful if the Committee returned to the new clause.

Mr. Ancram: I accept your strictures, Mr. Lord, and turn back to regionalisation in Wales.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: Yes, I always enjoy giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Morgan: On Wales and Monmouthshire, I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman has committed the most ghastly historical solecism. Monmouthshire was never in England. For centuries, legislation has referred to Wales and Monmouthshire, which clarified Monmouthshire's position. That is anything but Monmouthshire being in England. To say that, since Monmouthshire was not in Wales, it must therefore be in England is completely wrong. The right hon. Gentleman should withdraw that remark straight away before he receives letters from history teachers throughout Wales—and England.

Mr. Ancram: I said that I stood open to correction. The hon. Gentleman used a fair amount of what the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) was accused of the other day: legalistic talk. The position is absolutely clear. The referendum results

"showed a marked difference in views between north Wales and south Wales and between east and west Wales".

I do not think that any of us would deny that "we need to do a lot more work to bring Wales together."

We must continue to listen to what people in Wales tell us.

Mr. Ron Davies: The right hon. Gentleman is compounding his mistakes. First, he is making a grave error in trying to overemphasise the counts that were conducted on the basis of unitary authorities. They were merely the mechanisms for counting. The count itself was an all-Wales count. As history recalls, in that referendum, the people of Wales voted yes. The right hon. Gentleman's second error is to disregard the thousands of people in the unitary authorities of Monmouth, Wrexham, Flint and Conwy—the local authorities that voted no—by suggesting that they share a monolithic view that there should not be an assembly. That is just not so. There is a broad base of support right across Wales. He should also have regard to the fact that the swing in Monmouth from the 1979 vote was huge.

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman says that, when I say that the referendum

"showed a marked difference in views between north Wales and south Wales and between east and west Wales" and that

"we need to do a lot more work to bring Wales together"—[Official Report, Welsh Grand Committee, 18 November 1997; c. 12.]

I am compounding my error; but those are not my words—they are his, spoken in the Welsh Grand Committee on 18 November. It seems strange that, when I quote them back to him, I am told that I am compounding an error and that I have somehow misunderstood the position. When I read his words of 18 November, I agreed with him and because I am repeating what he said, I hoped that he would agree with me, but that may be too much to hope for.

The point is that nothing in the legislation as it stands works to bring Wales together. Nothing heals the rifts or quells the fears that the Government have created by this legislation and which, as the Secretary of State admits, were reflected in the referendum result. In the setting up of regional Committees, there is a cosmetic attempt to assuage the fears of north Wales, but, in practice, that is a meaningless gesture, and north Wales knows it. The southern-dominated assembly gets to decide how many regions there will be; it draws up the boundaries for those regions; and, because the regional Committees are only advisory, they can simply be ignored by the southern-dominated assembly.

In short, nothing in the Bill addresses the fears and concerns of people outside south Wales. People in the north of Wales will have watched the cavalier way in which the Secretary of State cast aside their bids to home the currently itinerant National Assembly for Wales. The fear is not temporary: it is a fear of long-term, if not permanent, domination. In any democracy, the fear of permanent domination by a majority is a recipe for ultimate breakdown. We cannot allow such a democratic deficit to be built into the new National Assembly for Wales, first, because that would be a mockery of its name and, secondly, because it would create a long-term legacy of resentment.

I accept that our new clause might not provide all the answers, but it is designed to build in a safety net that would bring some much-needed comfort and reassurance to the Welsh people, both those who live outside the south and those who live in the south. Essentially, the new clause would ensure that any decision that might affect the vital interests of a particular region would have to be authorised by a vote of the assembly in which at least one third of the Members from the region affected—however they were elected—gave their approval. That is a variation on the principle of weighted voting, which is often used in cases of this nature to mitigate what would otherwise become an oppressive majority.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: I am interested in the underlying principle. The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that south Wales is more populous than the rest of Wales: south Wales contains about 2 million people out of the 3 million living in Wales as a whole, and if industrial south Wales were compared with north Wales, the population ratio might even be 4:1. However, the right hon. Gentleman was always against devolution, even though Wales had only about 5 per cent. of the United Kingdom population, whereas England had about 85 per cent. of the population. Why was he not in favour of devolution if he believes that people worry about being dominated by a majority with different political patterns?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman was obviously concentrating so hard on campaigning for the yes vote that he did not listen to the arguments made on the no side during the referendum campaign. We argued that the White Paper opened up the danger but provided no solution to it and that, unless a solution were found, it would be a fundamental flaw that could undermine the concept of devolution in the longer term. That fear was clearly shown in the way in which votes were distributed within Wales.

Mr. Morgan indicated dissent.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman may shake his head but, according to The Guardian of 20 September, the Prime Minister said in Downing street the day after the referendum:

"We must take account of the narrowness of the margin and that is why we carry on, allaying their fears, and making sure they know that this is about decentralising power."

The Independent of the same day quoted the Prime Minister as saying:

"moves to create a Welsh assembly would carry on while the Government concentrated on 'allaying the fears of people that were expressed during the campaign'."

The Prime Minister accepted that there were fears, that the margin was narrow and that something had to be done to address that; but, having waited since the referendum to find out what measures were to be taken to address those fears, we find that there is none. For that reason, we tabled our new clause. We are trying to supply what the Prime Minister inferred would be produced by the Government, but which they have singularly failed to produce.

Mr. Morgan: It is the consistency of the right hon. Gentleman's argument that I am questioning. If that is what he believes, given the 4:1 ratio between the populations of industrial south Wales and north Wales, why was he against Wales being given any devolved powers, given that, in the United Kingdom, there is a 17:1 ratio between the populations of England and Wales?

Mr. Ancram: I am finding it difficult to understand whether the hon. Gentleman believes that it is healthy that one part of Wales may be able permanently to dominate another. Those who believe in devolution think that that is wrong and, if devolution is to work, we need to apply the sort of remedy that is contained in our new clause.

The one-third threshold is not a major hurdle and it is not obstructive—it is reasonable. The test of what decisions should be subjected to the threshold would be for the Presiding Officer to determine, having clear regard to the views of the regional Committee. It is right that the Presiding Officer should be able to exercise independent judgment as to whether to apply the threshold. I suspect that such decisions would most often involve economic and industrial issues, where fairness was essential to the future economic cohesion of Wales as a whole; or cultural or social matters, where parity of esteem was crucial to the smooth working of devolution. Given the nature of Wales and of the referendum result, it is surprising that Labour Members find it so difficult to accept our fairly modest remedy.

The overall intention is not to create gridlock, but to ensure that, in specific and important matters, the interests of any region cannot be overridden roughshod by a geographical majority. The provision would probably not be used often, but where and when it was used, it would work to bring Wales together. It would provide a protection that democracy would welcome, but that Wales's geography denies. It would give teeth to the concept of regions within Wales, which the current proposal for toothless advisory Committees singularly fails to do. It would remove the causes of the real concern and fear that have been expressed to me in my travels. It would reduce hostility by giving all parts of Wales the confidence to try to make devolution work, in the knowledge that it was no longer weighted to work against their interests.

The new clause would remove one of the deepest flaws in the Bill and the nature of devolution to the assembly as proposed. It is central to making devolution work constructively, rather than destructively. In that spirit, I commend the new clause to the Committee.

Mr. Dafis: I rise to speak in support of new clause 24, which stands in my name and those of my right hon. and hon. Friends. I should say first that the reference to Cardiff in the new clause is not based on any assumption about the location of the assembly; it refers to the relocation of functions that are currently at Cardiff. We want that sort of radical decentralisation.

New clause 24 represents an infinitely preferable approach to dispersing activities and power than that suggested in new clause 21, which would place a totally unreasonable constraint on the assembly's ability to develop national policies, and would make it difficult to take any strategic decision that could be interpreted as being to the disadvantage of any region. It is a curious idea that the final decision about whether the interests of a region were seriously threatened should be taken by the Presiding Officer of the assembly—I cannot imagine that the Speaker of the House of Commons would want, even after consulting hon. Members from throughout the United Kingdom, to decide whether a policy constituted a sufficiently serious threat to a region that it should be changed. The proposal is inappropriate and improper.

I despair of the Tory party. Centralists have always advocated the policy of divide and rule. The British empire was adept at it, and the Tory party is the remnant of the British imperial way of thinking. New clause 21 would entrench the purported divisions that Conservative Front Benchers say that they want to heal. Does the Conservative party intend to campaign for election to the assembly with such an appallingly negative agenda? If so, it will find it difficult to enter the assembly.

New clause 24 would create a presumption in favour of decentralising functions throughout Wales. There are various reasons for such an approach, including such elementary ones as the financial savings that would come from locating functions in areas of lower property values. More importantly, we must use the location of Government Departments, functions and arm's-length bodies—such as the remaining non-departmental public bodies—as an instrument of regional policy.

That policy has been widely used at the UK level to create employment: when the Employment Service was created, it was located at Sheffield, and one of the best examples in Wales is the establishment of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency at Swansea. I welcome the further moves in that direction in Wales. The Welsh European programmes executive will be based in the Cynon valley and in Machynlleth, bringing high-quality jobs to areas that need such a transfusion.

Unfortunately, the trend has largely been in the opposite direction. In 1993, I think, it was decided to transfer a section of the Welsh Office Agriculture Department from Trawscoed outside Aberystwyth to Cardiff, which led to significant job losses in an area where such jobs are scarce and getting scarcer. That was done on the spur of the moment. The decision was taken in June or July 1993 on the basis of short-term cost savings—it was certainly a short-sighted policy—and was a disgraceful example of the tendency to centralise for the most superficial reasons and in the teeth of strong opposition. I do not believe that it would have happened if a national assembly had existed, as the assembly—unlike the Welsh Office at the time—would have had a strategic view of the location of jobs. Another example was the removal from Aberystwyth to England of all but an outpost of the British Geological Survey.

I trust that both those actions will be reversed over time—soon, in the case of the Welsh Office Agriculture Department. The department would appropriately be located in rural Wales, particularly rural Ceridigion—although I would say that, wouldn't I? That would create high-quality, well-paid employment and the spin-off of other job opportunities.

The use of electronic communications would facilitate further decentralisation as the pattern for future activity in Wales, and we should consider the assembly's activities in that context. It has been suggested that there should be access points to the assembly in various parts of Wales. I hope and trust—that is the right word to use—that the National Library of Wales will, in effect, be the assembly's library. It would be absurd to try to replicate the massive resource at Aberystwyth wherever the assembly is located—electronic communications would make feasible the use of that tremendous resource.

Other Welsh Office departments, such as the one responsible for industry, could be located in the valleys, Swansea or even further west. The new Welsh Development Agency must operate in a much more decentralised way than before. It seems inevitable that a core headquarters, which will be responsible for strategic functions, should be located in the capital, but the regional offices should also be powerful, and should become centres for the development of expertise in some of the agency's functions. Business services, for example, could be located in one of the regional offices, as could the policy unit itself.

The regional office for the central region—the canolbarth, as we call it in Welsh—should certainly be responsible for rural policy for the whole of Wales. I also believe that the office should be in the west, which tempts me to utter the name Aberystwyth once again, although perhaps that would be to overstress my point. The location of the WDA office for the central region will be a live and real issue.

The new super-TEC—the new training and enterprise council—should be established in the south-east, but away from Cardiff and Swansea: in the valleys, perhaps. The Welsh Language Board or its functions—however they are to be delivered—would appropriately be located in Welsh-speaking areas, and why not move the Arts Council from Cardiff?

Mr. John Smith: I have much sympathy with the hon. Gentleman—

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: Does he want anything in Cardiff?

Mr. Smith: I think that there is case for rewriting the new clause to mention Ceredigion. Surely the location of those bodies is for the new assembly to decide; it is not our business to pre-empt it. The hon. Gentleman used the word trust—he should trust the assembly to make the right decisions.

Mr. Dafis: Yes, but it is our business to probe policy issues, consider the ways in which the assembly will operate and lay down some principles in advance. Decisions that may be made before the assembly is established could also benefit from the application of those principles.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. Gentleman is talking about the principles. I wonder whether he wants to leave Cardiff, the capital city of Wales, with anything at all. The last speech along those lines that I heard from a major political leader was by Pol Pot in Cambodia, who believed in getting rid of the capital city altogether and dispersing its entire population to the countryside. Is that really what the hon. Gentleman has in mind?

Mr. Dafis: The hon. Gentleman is being untypically facetious. I see no danger of Cardiff being left with nothing; a lot is happening in, and concentrating on, Cardiff. No less a person than Mr. Russell Goodway, in his advocacy of locating the assembly at Cardiff, suggested that certain departments should be located well outside Cardiff, and mentioned the Welsh Office Agriculture Department as an example.

Spending on government is an important reality, and the dispersal of that spending is worth advocating seriously. In the new Wales that we want to create, we should certainly consider the dispersal of the high-status activity that is associated with government; of prosperity; of vitality; and of influence. We are devising a system of government at the very time when electronics is revolutionising communications, and when distance, however great, is becoming far less of an obstacle to the co-ordination of activities.

It is also important to overcome the perception that the government of Wales will be remote from the people. That is a similar theme to that of the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), but I hope that I am being more constructive and positive about it. On the United Kingdom level, that perception has been influential in bringing about the devolution proposals enshrined in the Bill and in the Scotland Bill.

We must avoid the perception—however inaccurate—of a single centre where the members of the power elite socialise, drink coffee, wine and dine, and cobble together deals that serve their own interests rather than those of the people at large. Much of the debate about the location of the assembly has sprung from such concerns.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument closely. Will he be more specific? When he talks about the perceived elite, is he referring to the Government party?

Mr. Dafis: When I think of elites, I normally think of Tories; that is deeply ingrained in the culture in which I was brought up, so I shall not apologise for it. Elites are people who, for various reasons, have power and influence and tend, if their power is not curtailed, to look after their own interests.

Mr. Grieve: Is that not a most compelling argument for new clause 21?

Mr. Dafis: I spoke about that new clause earlier, and I do not need to go over that ground again. It is an absolutely cockeyed new clause.

We have the opportunity from the outset to establish an approach to government that avoids the geographical imbalance that has disfigured Britain; that typifies the United Kingdom; and that people fear may be replicated in Wales.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that a programme to get civil servants, some of whom must necessarily be based in south Wales, out of their bunkers in Cardiff or elsewhere and into the regions, to educate them about how people live in other parts of Wales, is as important as permanently dispersing them around the country? Of course, that applies equally to civil servants in the mainstream United Kingdom civil service.

Mr. Dafis: I am sure that there are civil servants sitting not far from us at the moment who are keen to educate themselves about the needs of Wales in its entirety. Among Welsh Office civil servants, I have never come across anything but a desire to understand the needs of Wales as a whole; the problem has often been with their political masters.

New clause 24 was drafted to highlight at the outset the importance of the principle that I have outlined.

Mr. Livsey: The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) made a divisive speech in support of new clause 21. He could perhaps have concentrated more on the advantages of having strong regional bodies within Wales. He talked about permanent domination and democratic deficits. None of us wants to be permanently dominated, but in 33 of the final 50 years of this century we have tended to be dominated in a certain way. The assembly will set us free from such domination.

We do not want to replicate that domination in the Welsh assembly. The regions are vital, and there is a great difference between all the regions in Wales. I often liken Wales to a jigsaw puzzle in which people in different parts of the country think entirely differently.

The challenge to the assembly is to unify the regions and give them a common purpose. We need the generosity of spirit to reach out into all the regions of Wales and bind them together; but they also need their independent voices. I agree with the right hon. Member for Devizes that there is not much in the Bill to give us hope. Ministers must give us more meat on the bone—if I may use that phrase—for the regions of Wales.

The regional Committees must have real teeth. Ministers must prove to us that that will be the case. They have alluded to the matter in rhetoric, but they have not made any concrete proposals. I hope that they will not ride roughshod over the regions. That phrase was used by the right hon. Member for Devizes. No region of Wales would want to be ridden roughshod over by Swansea, Cardiff, Wrexham or anywhere else. The regions want a life of their own, but in close association with the assembly.

What are the vital interests referred to in the new clause? A definition would be most illuminating and would assist me in making a judgment on the new clause. Inclusivity is vital, but we need to ensure that the regions have a fair deal; after all, they have strong characteristics and individual needs. We need to be persuaded that the legislation will meet that challenge.

The notion of one third of the assembly's members having to support any decision that might affect the vital interests of a region is interesting, although I am not sure why it should be specifically one third. I have more confidence in new clause 24 when it provides that the assembly should decentralise functions from Cardiff. That provision is similar to an amendment that we have tabled recently. Functions should be decentralised from Cardiff—or Swansea, as the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) pointed out—to the regions whenever possible and we should encourage public bodies to do likewise. I totally agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of that point.

I was professionally involved in the work done by Trawscoed. It was obvious that the staff were doing a job that was relevant to rural Wales and accessible to a large proportion of the population—the farming community in particular. When I lived and worked in Aberystwyth, the administrative section of the Welsh Office Agriculture Department was removed to Cardiff and I did not think that that was an especially good idea. The assembly will need to consider such moves.

We want to enable more local people to become involved in the decision making in their areas. We all know about the difficulties in Wales of communication and transport and the inadequacy of the infrastructure. It is vital that the assembly appears inclusive; the regions must have adequate powers. The assembly must react to and accept proposals from the regions. Many people from the regions of Wales will have great confidence in an assembly that behaves like that, and I hope that the Minister will convince us that it will do so. Otherwise, we shall have to adopt the new clause to ensure that it does so.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I oppose new clause 21. I understand the political motives behind it; it is clear that, in the speech of the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), we have heard a rehearsal of the campaign that will be conducted by the Conservatives during the elections to the National Assembly for Wales in May next year. Their campaign will be based on divisiveness. We had a fascinating insight into it tonight.

The right hon. Member for Devizes struck a chord, however, because a rudimentary reading of Welsh history shows that the country has been prone to parochialism and regional tensions. One need only consider the history of the Welsh princes and the abject failure to establish any political unity in Wales until recently to see that. Wales is a parochial country and it is proud of its parochialism.

At St. David's day dinners such as those I have attended recently, the first question asked is not, "Which school did you go to?"—as Conservatives might ask each other—but, "Where do you come from?" People want to know exactly which part of the valley or which part of a community others are from because they take great pride in their locality. However, it would be wrong to institutionalise that diversity and to mistake the message of Welsh history and our rich patchwork of communities. It is pessimistic to believe that Wales is incapable of political unity; that is taking cynicism too far.

I reject the premise behind the new clause, which is typical of the patronising attitude of Conservative Members to the Welsh people. Conservatives think that the Welsh people are incapable of forming a political community: that is wrong. The Bill takes great care to address regional tensions in Wales and it is right to do so. The voting method is clearly designed to enable more inclusive debate in Wales.

The new clause raises practical considerations. The Presiding Officer would be in an invidious position if he or she had to decide what constituted the vital interests of a region. How should a region be defined? Extraordinarily, the official Opposition define regions as coterminous with European constituencies, but that definition is unworkable. The new clause is divisive and would be a disincentive to the constructive, bridge-building approach that the Welsh people need to improve their economic and social status. I reject the new clause and I deplore the sentiments behind it.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I shall speak in favour of new clause 21. I should have preferred the opportunity to speak in favour of new clause 17 but, unfortunately, it was not called for debate.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Gentleman should not mention any clause or amendment that has not been selected by the Chair.

Mr. Swayne: I apologise, Mr. Martin. New clause 21 will do very well.

It is appropriate that the new clause provides a mechanism that would address the interests and outlook of the regions that are at variance with the Welsh mean. If we take Monmouthshire as an example, we find that in the referendum only 10,592 voters were in favour of the assembly, against 22,403—more than double—who voted against. That was true not only in Monmouthshire: it was mirrored all the way down the March. Such results should be set in the context of an overall majority in Wales for the assembly of only 6,700-odd.

The Prime Minister said that sensitivity would be exercised. New clause 21 would be evidence of such sensitivity, were it accepted. However, the sensitivity shown in the remarks made by the Secretary of State for Wales only two hours ago, when he said that the people of Wales won on the night of the referendum, leaves those of us who are anxious about the future of the interests of the regions I have mentioned feeling that our anxiety is well placed. Such regions are characterised by small market towns whose economic and political outlook is at variance with that of industrial south Wales, and our anxiety about them must be addressed.

The Secretary of State would do well to appreciate that Owen Glendower failed to take Monmouth and, shortly after that, he met his end. The Monmouthshire and Berwick-upon-Tweed Act 1756 specifically excluded Monmouthshire from the provisions of legislation pertaining to Wales except when it was explicitly included.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: First, perhaps the hon. Gentleman could tell us more about how and when Owen Glendower met his end, because—according to the history books—nobody knows how he met his end. Secondly, what is the hon. Gentleman's definition of a region?

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman will not make any mention of Owen Glendower and how he met his end, because the hon. Gentleman is talking about new clause 21.

Mr. Swayne: I shall not pursue that matter. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) asked about the definition of a region. We are constrained by the Bill and the new clause, but I acknowledge that another definition might have been more appropriate. To avoid being ruled out of order, I shall not pursue the subject any further. All I would say is that there must be a mechanism to address these issues.

I know that Labour Members dispute that because, on Second Reading, there was much talk of a new politics. It was said that the assembly would be very different; that it would have a gender balance; that it would be inclusive of all minorities; and that children would trip about in the aisles. In all, it was going to be an assembly for the new Jerusalem. I wondered where I had heard all that before—and then it dawned on me; we are back in Praise-God Barebones' "Parliament of the Saints" in the 1640s.

However, setting that aside, there must be a means of securing the interests of the regions that find themselves unsympathetic to the political outlook of the industrial areas in south wales that will dominate the assembly. New clause 21 provides such a mechanism.

Mr. John Smith: I strongly resist new clause 21, on the ground that it—if nothing else we have heard during seven days in Committee—blows the cover on the Tories. This is the new clause that proves that they have no intention of behaving constructively during the Bill's passage through Parliament or of campaigning during the assembly elections except in the divisive manner that we have heard tonight.

The Tories' hypocrisy is breathtaking. Theirs is the party that opposed devolution tooth and nail to the bitter end; and tonight they expect us to believe that they now want devolved regions within Wales—our country. What a nonsense; what hypocrisy.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman has obviously not read our new clause. We do not set out what the regions are, other than to accept the definition of electoral region that is already given in the Bill and for which Members will be elected both directly and by the additional member system. We are not inventing those—they are in the Bill. They were created by the Government.

Mr. Smith: Yes—and let me tell you what else this ludicrous new clause does, Mr. Martin. It proves once and for all that its authors have no understanding of what it is to be Welsh and what it is to be part of one nation. The proposal that our new national assembly, the single voice for our country, should be undermined by this bureaucratic nonsense, exposes them for what they are. It is an appalling new clause.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): I am struck by the passion with which the hon. Gentleman speaks. Notwithstanding the known conversion of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) to the assembly when the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) was not looking, does the hon. Gentleman accept that the new clause may be quite constructive? Taken at face value, it may be a constructive protection for regions within Wales. More to the point, there is genuine anxiety in the regions that a centralised southern assembly might discriminate against the regions.

Mr. Smith: I would draw attention to the different ways in which this issue has been dealt with—there is one approach in new clause 21, which is a nonsense, and another in new clause 24, which raises some serious issues about these regional anxieties. That is the difference. [Laughter.] Let the Tories laugh; they may laugh all the way to the next election, when they will be wiped out because of their behaviour during the Bill's passage and in this Committee.

Unfortunately, the new clause lowers the tone of the debate and the behaviour of the Opposition. Instead of constructively criticising the Bill and making realistic suggestions and proposals, they table wrecking new clauses such as the one before us and have no intention of giving the Bill principled support.

My final point is practical. We have already gone out of our way to set up the regional Committees. By doing so, we have recognised the differences within our country—one country, one nation, which is about to inherit its mature nationhood. We have restructured the powerhouse; we are recognising the differences that exist within our country by restructuring the training and enterprise councils. We are fully aware of the differences that exist in our country. The fact that the north-east Wales corridor—

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Smith: I give way to the right hon. Gentleman, but I hope that he will not mess about.

Mr. Ancram: Under the hon. Gentleman's system, how many regions will there be?

Mr. Smith: They will be regions established to reflect the genuine differences and the genuine interests of our people, which do vary.

It is crucial that we throw out, and have nothing to do with, new clause 21. Any country, any democratic body, any democratic forum, must be able to take decisions that are in the strategic interest of the whole constituency. One of the terrible legacies of local government reorganisation in Wales is that the strategic county councils have been done away with and a tier of unitary authorities has been created. Those authorities do a damned good job in representing their own areas but they cannot represent the country as a whole.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The hon. Gentleman is waxing lyrical on the importance of clarity in local government in Wales. He has had a moment or two to think about it; will he now answer the question? What number of regions does he favour?

Mr. Smith: This is typical of the behaviour that has characterised tonight's debate. The Tories are not serious; they are out to wreck this constructive Bill. It is vital that there is one voice for Wales: that one national body has the authority to speak for the whole country. For generations, if not centuries, the Tories tried to rule on the principle of divide and rule; they will not get away with it tonight.

Mr. Collins: We had a note of—perhaps unintentional—hilarity from the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith). Earlier, he waxed lyrical about how appalling, ludicrous and scandalous it was that there should be any suggestion of creating regions within Wales. When it was pointed out to him that regional Committees are in the Bill as proposed by the Government, he tried to change tack, but when he was asked—twice—how many regions or regional Committees he wanted, he was unable to say. That may show that there is some confusion on the Labour Benches just as, earlier, there seemed to be some confusion on the Labour Benches about whether Herefordshire should be inside the borders of Wales. Perhaps a new Welsh imperialist party is taking shape on the Labour Benches.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I was only saying that parts of Herefordshire used to be in the diocese of St. David's, that many place names in Herefordshire are Welsh and that at one time it would have been part of Wales.

Mr. Collins: The Minister is making my point for me. Earlier, he suggested that Monmouthshire was as Welsh as Herefordshire, which slightly undermined his argument.

Plaid Cymru Members rightly drew attention to what, from their point of view—and, I suspect, from that of many Labour Members—is the problem with new clause 21. It was said that new clause 21 is unacceptable because similar provisions will not apply in the Westminster Parliament. That slightly gave the game away, because we have been told throughout that the Bill will not create a Parliament and that the assembly will not have a power to make primary legislation. Nor will it have the power to introduce taxation. It is an assembly, not a Parliament comparable to Westminster. If it is argued that new clause 21 would not be accepted by Westminster, that gives part of the game away.

My primary concern, however, is to reveal the heart of the reason new clause 21 is needed. The argument has been voiced a little in this part of the debate, but not sufficiently during the Committee's consideration of the Bill. New clause 21 is needed to deliver on the clear promises given by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State the day after the result of the referendum, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) referred.

7.30 pm

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State said that they would take on board the fact that the result was exceptionally narrow, that they would listen to the arguments advanced by the no campaign—which did far better than anyone expected—and that they would present new proposals that would take account of the fact that the referendum result indicated not a huge mandate in favour of change, as the Secretary of State said, but the fact that the Welsh population was at best split down the middle, if not split one quarter in favour and three quarters apathetic or opposed.

Where are those new proposals in the Bill? We have heard a little about the regional Committees, but if we do not know how many regional Committees there are to be, as has been amply demonstrated, it can hardly be said that they are a central part of the Bill or that a great deal of thought has been given to them.

Mr. Dafis: The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) suggested that the regions referred to in the new clause are the electoral regions from which the additional Members will be elected. Are Opposition Members seriously suggesting that we should regard the Mid and West Wales electoral region, which extends from the coast in the north right down through the centre of Wales, including Llanelli, Carmarthenshire and Pembrokeshire, as a coherent regional entity for the purposes of the new clause?

Mr. Collins: I agree to some extent with the hon. Gentleman. He makes a powerful case against the Bill, which was not introduced by my party, and against the electoral system, which throws up such absurdities. That is what happens when the Government try to introduce a new system of elections—we heard in Home Office questions that five different electoral systems will apply in the United Kingdom during the next 24 months. That is absurd.

As my right hon. Friend said, we are proposing new clause 21 as a genuine attempt to get the Government to deliver on the promises that they made. They were not forced by us to make them. No member of the Conservative party was pulling the strings of the Prime Minister when he came out on the steps of No. 10 after the election and volunteered that the Government would listen and address the issues. The Secretary of State was not bullied or blackmailed into making the announcements that my right hon. Friend quoted earlier. He said that he recognised that the results showed that different parts of Wales had different attitudes towards the national assembly.

It has been suggested that Conservative Members are being divisive, but it was the Secretary of State who said that there were different attitudes in the Welsh regions. The new clause may not be the ideal way to deal with the problem, but no one has come up with a better way. At least there is some substance to the new clause—unlike the nebulous regional Committees, which seem to have only advisory functions, which can be overruled by the assembly and whose number is to be guessed at or plucked from the mind of the Secretary of State at some time in the future. Now, when the Bill is being considered by the Westminster Parliament, we are not to be told how many regional Committees there will be.

New clause 21 deals with a serious concern. We have heard from the Secretary of State and others who are in favour of the Bill that it is a major problem that needs to be tackled. The new clause deals with it in a responsible way. It provides that where there are to be decisions affecting the vital interests of a region, one third of the representatives of that region should vote in favour of that proposal. That is quite a low threshold by many standards.

The new clause is constructive and would enable the Government to deliver on their promises. It would reflect the fact that the referendum result did not indicate, as we have heard repeatedly from the Secretary of State, that the Welsh people are of one mind and one determination, for they were not, according to the referendum result. Parliament has a responsibility to deliver on the undertakings made from the doorstep of No. 10 that the Bill would be amended to take account of those differences.

We have the chance today, in the discussion on new clause 21, to make the Bill a great deal better and to give the Welsh people what they were led to believe, the day after the referendum, they would get. For that reason, I support new clause 21.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: Despite the attempts at elegant advocacy by Conservative Members, new clause 21 remains, as I think was admitted by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), legislative junk mail. They know that it will not work. They are trying to tap into a wellspring of those who voted no, and to use them as a springboard for a modest electoral revival in Wales in the assembly election campaigns, the Euro-elections or the local government elections next year.

I am afraid that Conservative Members are sadly mistaken if they think that trying to balkanise Wales is a constructive way forward. To provide for blocking minorities implies a degree of split in Wales that was not the purpose of the regional Committees, which were proposed in the White Paper and are mentioned in the Bill. Admittedly, only one is specified to serve the northern part of Wales. That may well be a northern Committee, but the rest of the structure of the regions is a matter that can be left until a later date, possibly to the assembly itself, to take account of the views of those elected to the assembly on the question of how many regions are needed in order to administer Wales in an appropriately decentralised way.

To install blocking minorities as the new clause proposes is absurd. It is an attempt to balkanise Wales. It is a sound principle that any new legislative body should not attempt to run before it can walk, but this is a proposal to hobble the Welsh assembly before it can walk.

There must be a balance in a democratically elected Welsh assembly, with a proportional representation component as to a third of the seats, which will enable people who are not of the majority party in any of the Euro-regions of Wales to have a fair chance to give them an incentive to take part in the election, even though they may never win a majority.

[Mr. Rhodri Morgan]

That applies to Conservatives in the south Wales valleys and to Labour people in some remote rural parts of Wales. They may never win a majority, but their supporters have every incentive to vote because the party may have a candidate elected under the list system. It will be inclusive in that respect.

The adoption of a committee system rather than a cabinet system in the modus operandi of the assembly is another way of ensuring that those who may not be able to win a majority nevertheless have some share of power. That also is intended to cover the fact that in areas of Wales there may be people who feel that they are not part of the dominant political culture.

In democracies we always count heads—we count majorities, and majorities could conceivably oppress minorities. We accept that. The ways around it are those that have been proposed: proportional representation, the committee system and the establishment of regional Committees, with an obligatory northern Committee and others to be sorted out by the assembly or at a later date.

The Welsh assembly must be given room to breathe. It must be able to act and to take a strategic all-Wales view at the times and on the subjects where that is appropriate. It must disperse and decentralise where it can, but it must have the strength to make decisions and to deliver on manifesto promises, taking as many of the people along with it as it can. Democracy requires the ability to get decisions made. To tie the Welsh assembly's legs together before it has had a chance to take a few strides, as new clause 21 would do, is absurd. It is an attempt to say to the assembly, "You don't exist yet, but, before you do, we want to make sure that you will be as weak as possible in case you do something to those who voted no in the referendum or those who vote Conservative in general elections".

Is there any evidence to suggest that, under the proposed structure—given the absence of primary legislative powers and given the existence of an obligatory north Wales Committee, of a proportional representation voting system and of a modus operandi by committee—the assembly will oppress minorities in Wales? We do not know the answer to that question, so why should we assume that the assembly—which, unlike Parliament, will have all sorts of special features designed to prevent oppression of the minority by the majority—will do that?

If those protections are not built into the Westminster system, why should we assume—even before the assembly is established—that it will oppress minorities because many people happen to live in the industrial south and north-east of Wales? It is true that 50 per cent. of the Welsh population live within 25 miles of central Cardiff—that is not a sin, although the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) might think so. That is the population distribution in Wales that we have inherited as a result of the various economic factors that lead people to live where they live. That is the way it is in Wales: many people live in industrial south Wales. We are heavily outnumbered by sheep in Wales by a ratio of about 9:1.

Mr. Öpik: Sixteen to one.

Mr. Morgan: It is not as many as that—perhaps it is 5:1. The sheep to people ratio in mid and north Wales is different from the ratio in the industrial south. That is due to the nature of economic activities in different areas of Wales.

We cannot, on the basis of some absurd fears, hobble the Welsh assembly with leg-irons before it is established. There are many protections in place as a result of the voting system, the modus operandi, proportional representation, and the obligatory north Wales Committee and the assumption of other regional Committees. If we were to accept new clause 21, myriad other new clauses would be suggested to provide further protection for those who voted no in the referendum. Those people would be offered individual opt-outs so that they would not have to pay obeisance to the Welsh assembly.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman referred to "absurd fears". Were those the fears to which the Prime Minister referred? If not, to which fears did he refer?

Mr. Morgan: The Prime Minister said that the narrowness of the majority in the referendum implied that the Welsh assembly would have to work very hard—and we would have to work hard in framing the legislation—to carry the people of Wales with us and overcome the apathy shown by 49 per cent. of electors who did not vote and those who voted no.

How will we carry those people with us? One thing we must not do is exaggerate their fears and extend the natural centrifugal forces in Wales that are created by the population distribution in industrial south Wales, with the mountains in the middle and another population belt along the north Wales coast. We must overcome those centrifugal forces.

We will not carry the people of Wales with us by balkanising Wales or—like the United Nations mandate in Bosnia—by installing blocking minorities for this or that and giving people the impression that they can opt out. That is not the correct way forward. We must generate enthusiasm for the new Welsh democracy that the legislation creates. We should not let people think that they can opt out in some way: they must opt into the new democratic structure. The Tories are trying to replay the referendum in an attempt to cash in on the high proportion of those who voted no and to create the impression that, in some way, the Tories are looking after their interests by helping them to opt out mentally, as it were, and not be part of the new democratic Wales.

That is an absolutely pernicious way of thinking, which is a reversion to the old Tory colonial mentality: when all else fails, try divide and rule. We will not allow that to happen in our proceedings tonight.

Mr. Grieve: The more I listen to the arguments advanced by Labour Members—particularly the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan)—the more convinced I am about the correctness of new clause 21. The hon. Gentleman manifested real anger and passion when it was suggested that the new clause might appeal to voters in many parts of Wales. It is extraordinary to suggest that new clause 21 is a wrecking measure and an Opposition conspiracy designed to exploit differences in Wales. That is rather similar to the suggestion that the countryside rally was a conspiracy planned by landowners who gathered together 284,000 forelock-tugging retainers. The two arguments have exactly the same lack of discernment.

The fact is that tensions are currently present in Wales—the passion with which Government Members have opposed new clause 21 shows that they know that very well. It is a tribute to the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) that he recognises that those tensions exist. The question is: will those tensions be addressed?

Mr. Dafis: I did not mention tensions. I spoke about the need to develop a decentralised pattern of government in Wales, unlike the grossly centralised pattern of government that Britain has had for so long.

Mr. Grieve: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman if I have misquoted him. I took the thrust of his argument to mean that he recognised that there is immense diversity of view in Wales. We know that from the referendum result. Numerous regions of Wales do not want the assembly. One might infer that they are suspicious of the assembly for a host of different reasons, ranging from a lack of desire for another tier of government to the fact that their regional identity is so markedly different from the areas of south Wales that they believe will become dominant that they are seeking protection.

Those problems will not go away. Over time, the sense of national identity reflected in the comments about a "national assembly"—and descriptions of it as such—may prevail. However, one can only apply one's own experience and what one sees for oneself when one travels through Wales. When I visit Wales, I get the impression that there is immense diversity and a great sense of local identity. Many people are deeply suspicious of the Cardiff assembly.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): What about the Swansea assembly?

Mr. Grieve: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman. The proposed new clause asks that those factors be recognised in order to prevent the regions from being trampled on by the Cardiff assembly. If that occurs, the consequences will manifest themselves—whether or not the new clause is part of the Bill—in hostility about the way in which the assembly operates. That is the reason why this is a sound and solidly based new clause.

Mr. Anderson: Is the hon. Gentleman privy to information that the rest of us are not in referring to the Cardiff assembly—or is that a general term of Conservative abuse for the Welsh assembly?

Mr. Grieve: I am aware that the assembly appears to be somewhat peripatetic as to its possible final location. I refer to it as the Cardiff assembly because, according to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, it will be dominated by the area within 20 miles of Cardiff where the population is. Regardless of whether the assembly is located in Cardiff or in Aberystwyth, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that its composition will be dominated by south Wales by virtue of population distribution. I also thought that the Secretary of State wanted the assembly to be located in Cardiff—the fact that Cardiff does not want it, because Cardiff did not want an assembly in the first place, is another matter.

Fear of domination is something that the Committee should address. It is said that Conservatives believe in divide and rule. Nothing could be further from the truth. We have spent the past six months arguing that we do not want the United Kingdom to be divided, and that we would prefer to maintain a unitary system. It is hon. Members on the Government Benches who have been fermenting discord, but having done so they set up their own imperial entity and seek to dominate other regions within it. That is the fantasy that they have created in their minds as to the way in which government should be conducted. That is a bad principle.

As the Government have accepted, there is tremendous diversity of view in Wales, and the Prime Minister has said that it should be recognised. They should have the courage to accept that and accept the new clause, which protects the regions of Wales. Whether or not these are electoral regions, they are the only ones that we have at the moment. If the Government were creative, they would identify the different regions in Wales and include them by amendment in the Bill. The fact that they have not done so has put the responsibility back on us, and we have done our best.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I shall make a brief speech in support of the new clause.

The United Kingdom is the result of relationships that have grown up over quite a long time. The question is: what unites the Welsh? One feature that unites the Welsh is the English. There is a relationship between England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Whether on the rugby pitch or trying to represent the Welsh nation, or whether one is making proposals, the reality is that there is a certain unity that the Welsh have had to have as 5 per cent. of the United Kingdom population. Once one devolves power to the Welsh assembly, one changes the nature of that relationship, and there is internal competition from within the Principality for resources. Ministers would be well advised to recognise that the debate, which so far has been in terms of Wales, England, Scotland, and the United Kingdom, will be different with a devolved assembly.

I have sat through the debates on almost all the clauses, and have been struck that whenever resources or the Welsh Development Agency is discussed, or even where the assembly will be based, hon. Members have jumped up to make bids for their respective regions. That is part of politics. We all like to represent our areas, but it is quite clear that there are different agendas in different parts of Wales.

There are worries. Fears have been expressed. None of us wants disunity in Wales. That is not part of the Conservative party's agenda at all. We wish people to work together. From what we have heard during the Bill's consideration, and from the result of the referendum, to which one must pay attention, we are concerned that many areas of the Principality had, and may still have, concerns about the way in which the assembly will be set up and how it will operate. What we on the Conservative Benches are trying to do, in our most helpful fashion, is to ensure that there is consent and consensus throughout the regions of Wales.

I agree that the regions chosen are not ideal, as they were set by the Government for electoral reasons. We should review the regions to see what interest there is. It is clear that there are differences between north and south Wales. If that were not so, there would not be a north Wales Committee in the Bill. There are differences between east and west Wales, with the exception of Pembroke. There is a diversity within Wales. All we are trying to do is to have that recognised by the assembly.

I hope that the Government will pay attention to the new clause. If they do not accept it at this stage, I hope that they will come back with proposals to ensure a great deal of unity throughout the regions for any proposal that they make.

We heard from hon. Members about the electoral system and the various methods of trying to create unity. My central point is that if one changes the relationship within the United Kingdom and ends up with a wholly Welsh assembly that deals with problems with a different agenda, the nature of the relationship within Wales will be changed.

I almost felt sorry for the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) when hon. Members started to talk about shifting jobs out of Cardiff to other areas of Wales, with hon. Members suggesting that perhaps the assembly should be in Swansea, or elsewhere. No doubt there will be fierce competition for the £7 billion of resources that the assembly will spend. There is no doubt that many people in Cardiff and the surrounding areas have jobs, living standards and mortgages based on the fact that they work for the Welsh Office, and the Welsh civil service. That will be a real issue for debate. Our proposal is to ensure the greatest consent throughout the regions—north, south, east and west.

I would not say that I am wholly uncritical of our proposals, because given that the new clause has been selected for debate, and the electoral regions were not selected by us, in different circumstances one could probably have done a better job of drafting a better proposal. I hope that the Government will take on board our concerns for the regions of Wales: the change in the relationship of the United Kingdom will change the dynamics of the debate in Wales. After all the debate and all the concerns that have been expressed, and with the great investment that the Government—indeed, the people of Wales—will make in the assembly, I hope that it will be a success, and that there will be a great deal of unity in setting out its objectives. None of us particularly wants to see it fail, although we opposed it in terms of the referendum. The key point is that it has to have consent throughout every region of Wales.

Mr. Letwin: I, too, speak in support of the new clause, but from a slightly different angle.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: A legalistic one.

Mr. Letwin: No, in contrast to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan). I do not wish to dwell on what he would describe as a legalistic point.

Mr. Morgan: For the first time.

Mr. Letwin: This is not the first time.

I shall dwell on precedent and effect, because part of the duty of the Committee is to consider the effects not just on Wales, which have been much discussed, but on the United Kingdom as a whole. This is a major constitutional Bill, and the new clause is a major constitutional provision. Both the Bill and the new clause will affect how the rest of the constitutional development of the United Kingdom proceeds.

In particular, with entirely unified objections from Opposition Members, we are led to believe that there may come a time, alas, when Her Majesty's Government will introduce a subsequent Bill with a view to making the current hotch-potch arrangements of regional development agencies in England the basis of English regional government.

Mr. Syms: Shame.

Mr. Letwin: I echo entirely the comments of my hon. Friend. It would be a shame, to put it mildly.

Nevertheless we must recognise that the Government have a significant majority. Indeed, they spare no pains to remind us of that daily. Having introduced such a Bill, the Government, with or without referendums—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going wide of the new clause before us.

Mr. Letwin: I intend to return specifically to the effect that the new clause would have—

The First Deputy Chairman: It is not a question of when the hon. Member decides to return to it. I am telling him to return to it now.

Mr. Letwin: I shall do so immediately, Mr. Martin—forthwith.

If the new clause is not adopted, a precedent will be created in that there will be no protection for parts of the entirely arbitrary regions, which may be set up for England, from other parts of the same regions with the greatest voting power. That precedent would suggest precisely the need for such protection. Without straying from referring to the new clause, I shall use as an example my own region, the south-west, which some hon. Members present also represent. It is evident to us that in the absence of mechanisms similar to those which are suggested through new clause 21, there would be a grave danger—especially in the case of Bristol, which has a great weight of the votes within the south-western region—of certain areas becoming the overwhelming and dominant features of an arbitrary region. There are parallel cases throughout England in what are, perhaps in contrast to Wales, entities that have hardly any cultural homogeneity, hardly any real historical association and hardly any feeling of being conjoined except by arbitrary fiat of Her Majesty's Government and by a Bill produced in the House of Commons in an arbitrary and legalistic, if I may put it that way, fashion.

There is a distinction between a country which has a real history and English regions which do not. The danger is—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We are not considering the Bill generally. Instead, we are dealing with a specific new clause. The hon. Gentleman must speak to the new clause, and he should know that.

Mr. Letwin: I accept your admonition, Mr. Martin. In one sense, I find it refreshing, having been accused throughout our consideration of the Bill in Committee of concentrating excessively on the precise words of each clause. In this instance, I am trying to relate my remarks to the new clause while illustrating what I think is an important precedent effect. If new clause 21 is accepted by the Government, or if any similar version is, the Government will be establishing a precedent that will provide protection of the sort that I have described for the English regions. That in itself would justify for many of my right hon. and hon. Friends the insertion of such a new clause.

Even if the Minister chooses not to take account of the new clause, and not to rephrase it in some way acceptable to himself and his colleagues, I would be extremely grateful if he were able at least to put on record that the Government accept the strength of feeling that would exist in a parallel case in English regions. I would be grateful also if the Minister would accept that where there are arbitrary collocations of particular places put under a single sub-national government, there is a need for protection of the sort suggested in the new clause.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): New clause 21 is excellent, and I support it on the ground that it is clear this evening that not one Government Member has understood how delicate the opinions of many Welsh people are on the question of the assembly. It grieves them to be reminded, but they must be reminded yet again, that 75 per cent. of the Welsh people did not want the assembly. Labour Members have been grossly insensitive this evening towards those who do not want the assembly.

Mr. Öpik: I am generally sympathetic to the terms of the proposed new clause. However, is the hon. Gentleman not weakening his argument by using the tired old debating point about 75 per cent. yet again?

Mr. Paterson: If the hon. Gentleman allows me to develop my argument beyond the first four sentences, he might learn what I am about to say.

The referendum proved that Wales is not homogeneous politically, socially and economically.

Mr. Dafis: Is England homogeneous in the ways that the hon. Gentleman says Wales is not?

Mr. Paterson: Certainly not, but we are not putting forward such a measure for England. We believe in a sovereign Parliament for a United Kingdom, and not for one region.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: Will the hon. Gentleman not rethink the repetition of the tired old line that 75 per cent. of the population of Wales did not want the assembly? His side lost the referendum campaign, and we on the other side won it. That is why the measure is before us. These are not just weasel words: I put it to the hon. Gentleman that they are a stoat's soundbites. Will he either rethink the tired old line or forget it? If he does not, his party, the Conservative party, will have no chance of ever reviving from the appalling position of zero Members in which it now finds itself.

Mr. Paterson rose—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We must be careful. We must not return to the argument about the referendum. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that he wished to develop his argument. He has referred to the referendum, but we will not get bogged down by that. Instead, we shall deal with new clause 21.

Mr. Paterson: Thank you, Mr. Martin. I am delighted that hon. Members are so interested in my comments. I would like to progress beyond my fifth sentence.

I am delighted also that the great listener has resumed his place. I refer, of course, to the Secretary of State, who said:

> "I am conscious that we need to do a lot more work to bring Wales together. We must address genuine concerns and I acknowledge the fact that we must listen and continue to listen."—[Official Report, Welsh Grand Committee, 18 November 1997; c. 12.]

I revert to my argument. Wales is not homogeneous. There are major differences between those in south Wales round Cardiff, who believe strongly—[Interruption.] If hon. Members rise to make interventions, I may be able to respond to them.

South Wales has little in common with the rural areas that are represented, for example, by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). There is a Labour-dominated elite in south Wales. That economy looks to the east, to the M4. Montgomery and the hills of Powys and those of Denbighshire have little in common with south Wales. The areas of Wales that I know well are in the north-east, on the borders of Wrexham. There again, the borders are arbitrary. The nearest village to my house, Overton on Dee, was a bastide built by Edward I. It is very similar in design to the bastides that he was building in Aquitaine at about the same time.

Borders are arbitrary, but social and economic flows are not. Labour Members must recognise that there are real misgivings, especially in north-east Wales, about an assembly that may be in Cardiff or Swansea—much depends on how negotiations develop with the local estate agents. We do not know where the assembly will be, but it is almost certain that it will be built in south Wales.

As I have said, there is real unease. I beg the Secretary of State to take that on board. There is unease in the markets in north Wales as there is among investors, who are coming over the border from places such as Chester, Manchester and Liverpool. Those are the areas to which the economy of north-east Wales looks.

Socially, many of the people in north-east Wales have come from over the border and are all along the coast. There are those who have come from Merseyside. They have little in common with those who will dominate the assembly in south Wales, and they are nervous.

[Mr. Paterson]

There is no transport system between north and south Wales. That is no one's fault, because there are mountains in the way. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire knows full well that the way to get through from north Wales to south Wales runs through my constituency and on to Shrewsbury. There are no links, and there is little in common. That was demonstrated graphically during the referendum.

New clause 21 would give the regions a chance. As proposed, the Bill contains no reference to a revising chamber. There is nothing to resist the diktat of the south Wales majority. [Interruption.] The two Ministers are laughing, but we could not have been faced with a more graphic example yesterday. There were nearly 300,000 people on the country march. They demonstrated that we cannot run a parliamentary democracy if the majority abuses its temporary power.

Ministers must take that on board. Majorities cannot use their power to trample on substantial minorities. The referendum showed that. I know from the people in north-east Wales, whom I speak to every week, that there are those in north Wales with real doubts about the whole project.

I turn briefly to new clause 24. The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) told us that he wants to reduce traffic. I cannot understand how traffic will be reduced if parts of the administration of the assembly will be dispersed around Wales. We have the horrendous example of the European Parliament. I think that about 80 trucks go up and down between Brussels and Strasbourg once a month. We do not want to see that in Wales, if it is to remain a green and unpolluted land. I shall vote against new clause 24, and strongly support new clause 21.

Mr. Win Griffiths: We have had an entertaining and, at times, passionate debate on the new clauses. New clause 21 would place on the assembly procedural limitations in decision making on the vital interests of any region. Decisions could not be made without the support of at least a third of the Members of the Assembly from that region.

The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) specified five electoral regions: I shall not cavil at what regions he could justifiably use for this purpose. The assembly's Presiding Officer would determine when a region's vital interests were likely to be affected by a particular proposal. In reaching that conclusion, the Presiding Officer would have to have regard to the views of the regional Committee, which would be binding unless the Presiding Officer certified that they were without reasonable weight.

The assumption behind the new clause should not go unchallenged. My hon. Friends the Members for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas), for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) and for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) considered the new clause typical of the Conservative party's cynical and patronising attitude to Wales. My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan saw it as hypocrisy: the Conservative party was opposed to devolution for Wales, but now seems to want devolution within Wales.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West said that the new clause was an attempt to balkanise Wales and to hobble the National Assembly for Wales. The Bill provides for proportional representation, and, through the regional Committees, for the views of all parts of Wales and of all parties that gain reasonable support across the whole of Wales to be taken into account.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) may know that the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs has suggested that regions could be based on the four areas used by the Welsh Development Agency, or on those to be used by the new powerhouse. The national assembly advisory group has been considering seven regions, but there will be consultations, on the basis of which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will decide on the best way forward. The principal point is that advisory committees will be set up.

It takes unprecedented gall for Conservative Members to discuss the worries of people in Wales. Only the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) can claim to have regular contact with any part of Wales. We should remind ourselves that, of the 40 Welsh constituencies, 34 returned Labour Members of Parliament, in industrial and rural areas; four returned Plaid Cymru Members; two returned Liberal Democrat Members; and not one elected a Conservative Member of Parliament. Conservative Members should approach with humility the matter of what they know about what the Welsh people are thinking.

The Opposition assume that the assembly will in some way ride roughshod over the interests of particular regions of Wales in a malign conspiracy to promote one area over another. Labour Members represent 34 of the 40 Welsh constituencies, and are always in a majority in Wales.

We reject the nightmarish picture painted by the Conservative party. The National Assembly for Wales will work for the whole of Wales, not just for parts of it. The electoral system that we are providing will ensure that the voices of all parts of Wales will be heard in the assembly, and that the interests of the whole of Wales are taken fully into account. New clause 21 would place an artificial and bureaucratic constraint on the assembly in the proper discharge of its functions. We cannot accept it.

We have heard much about the referendum and yes-voting and no-voting areas. I remind the Opposition that the distribution of yes and no votes—the so-called green and red areas—is artificial, and does not sufficiently represent how the votes were cast. Nearly 40 per cent. of the yes votes were cast in areas that voted no. The 10,000 yes votes cast in Monmouthshire were as crucial to the majority as the yes votes cast in Carmarthenshire. Wales voted for the proposal in a national referendum. We can forget about the concept of yes and no votes: there was a substantial yes vote in the no areas.

8.15 pm

The new clause is inconsistent with the Opposition's championing of a cabinet system for the assembly, because it would hobble such a system and make it difficult to operate. The Opposition have suddenly come up with a regional system, which would hobble the National Assembly for Wales. Why on earth did they not think of it years ago, when they were considering the electoral make-up of the United Kingdom? They could have given Members of Parliament from Wales, Scotland and the standard planning regions of England a vote on proposals that had an impact on everybody—a far greater impact than a national assembly with its own powers will have—and, if more than a third of them were opposed to a proposal, such as the poll tax, it could have been shelved or imposed only on those parts of England that voted for it. The story told by Conservative Members is ludicrous.

New clause 24 was spoken to by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) and supported by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey). The proposal for a National Assembly for Wales is aimed at bringing government closer to the people, and is at the heart of devolution. I look forward to the assembly making itself visible and accessible to all the people of Wales. However, the proposal in new clause 24 is not the best way forward.

Although the hon. Member for Ceredigion advocated devolution from Cardiff, it sounded like devolution to Aberystwyth. I shall put that matter aside for the moment, and point out that 25 per cent. of the executive quangos in Wales have headquarters outside Cardiff. There is also a substantial Welsh Office presence in a number of parts of Wales. We have no objection in principle to administrative devolution, but it is a matter that the assembly should consider. Significant extra costs would be built into the operation of the assembly in its early years if Parliament imposed an artificial timetable for devolution.

We must accept that the assembly may want to take up the theme of new clause 24, and will decide whether to undertake administrative devolution from Cardiff in its own time and in its own way. It is not, however, the job of this Parliament or this Bill to provide for such a set programme of administrative devolution. I hope that the hon. Member for Ceredigion will accept that.

Mr. Paterson: What reassurances can the Minister offer people in north-east Wales who have real doubts about the whole project? We have heard bluster from him, but so far we have heard no answers.

Mr. Griffiths: I realise that it is difficult for the hon. Gentleman to get to grips with the concept of the whole of Wales. Let me explain the point of our proposals. At present, no Conservatives represent north-east Wales, but under the additional member system, there is a chance that a few may do so. That will give an opportunity to some of the voice of north-east Wales that is not now heard in this Parliament to be heard in the national Assembly for Wales.

Similarly, the regional Committees will have an opportunity to give advice to the assembly. I have every confidence that the whole assembly will want to consider the views of its constituent parts. I realise that it is difficult for Conservatives to understand that any institution will listen to advice, because for 18 years they rejected advice consistently.

We will reject new clause 21 if the Opposition have the temerity to press it to a vote. As for new clause 24, I hope that it will not be pressed.

Mr. Evans: We always thought that this would be a significant debate. It has proved to be so, but it does not behove the Minister to talk about "listening", given that we have listened to what he just said about new clause 21.

I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce), for Poole (Mr. Syms), for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) and for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). They proved one thing, at least: that they have listened to what the people of Wales have been saying.

New clause 21 is intended to allay the fear of people in the regions that they will be dominated by Cardiff and the south-east. If we look at the result of the referendum on 18 September—[Interruption.] I was waiting for the Secretary of State to start huffing and puffing. This is the one thing that he does not want: he does not want people to talk about the result of the referendum on 18 September. I understand why—it was an embarrassing result for the Secretary of State—but we will not allow history to be airbrushed in such a fashion.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Let me remind the hon. Gentleman that, if the swing of opinion between 1979 and the referendum had been the same as the swing between then and the general election, there would not have been a Conservative Member in the House.

Mr. Evans: That comes from the same school of thought that told us a moment ago that it was Monmouthshire that "won it for us". It is ridiculous to use statistics in such a way. The result in Monmouthshire was appalling—more than two to one against the measure.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Hon. Members must not dwell on the results in Monmouthshire, or in any county of Wales; they must debate new clause 21.

Mr. Evans: I went down that route, Mr. Martin, in response to the Minister, who presented a particular proposition.

New clause 21 refers to the regions. We must not ignore the fears of Wales, and we must not ignore the result of the referendum. We must take it on board. We must accept that there was a low turnout and that the result was split, and we must not kid ourselves, or con the Welsh people, that it was otherwise. At least on the morning of the result, the Prime Minister—instead of flying to Wales to pat the Secretary of State on the back and say how wonderful the result had been—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We must not go into the history of the referendum, which is past and done with. What is won is won, and what is lost is lost. We must deal with new clause 21.

Mr. Evans: New clause 21 is intended to address the fears of the people of Wales, who, in the regions, did not whole-heartedly support the proposals. The result proved that Wales was split down the middle. New clause 21 is aimed to deal with the result of the referendum. The Government—along with the Prime Minister—said that they would listen to the fears of the Welsh people, but they have not done so. It is the same sort of listening as their "listening" to the countryside. That is why 284,000 people marched on London yesterday.

[Mr. Evans]

The Government said that they would listen to the sensitivities of the people of Wales. What have they offered the people of Wales in the Bill? They have offered clause 62. I do not know whether Labour Members have read clause 62, but it could be called the sop clause.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not start quoting from clause 62. We are discussing new clause 21.

Mr. Evans rose—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must listen to me, even if he listens to no one else in the Chamber. [Interruption.]

Mr. Evans: I will certainly ignore sedentary catcalls from the Secretary of State.

New clause 21 addresses the deficiencies of clause 62, which deals with regional Committees. Clause 62 provides for the establishment of a regional Committee in north Wales—[Interruption.] Will the Secretary of State listen for a moment? This is his Bill. The Government have decided to set up a Committee in north Wales, and other Committees in other regions of Wales. When the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) was talking about the Committees, we asked how many would be set up. He could not tell us, because he did not know. I suspect that he had not read the Bill properly. Clause 62 clearly states—

Mr. Win Griffiths rose—

Mr. Evans: I have no time to give way. I have only four minutes left, and I am trying to follow the Chairman's guidance as far as possible.

The Government refer to north Wales and the other regions. In subsection (5), they state that the members of a regional Committee should be the Members representing regional constituency seats and also regional seats. We have taken the new clause from clause 62, to try to be helpful and to deal with the fears of people in the regions. [Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Those on the Government Front Bench must be quiet.

Mr. Evans: Thank you, Mr. Martin.

The fact is that clause 62 does not address the fears of people in the regions, for instance in north Wales, who feel that they will be dominated by a Cardiff-based, or Swansea-based—certainly a south Wales-based—assembly. We tabled new clause 21 to allay those fears.

The Secretary of State and the Minister have talked about being inclusive, and listening to what the people have said. If they want the will of the Welsh people to be settled, they will accept new clause 21. It will provide real presence and structure; it will address the fears of the regions in vital respects that affect parts of Wales outside Cardiff and the south-east. They will have a blocking vote that will give the whole structure some teeth. Our new clause is intended to be constructive rather than destructive. We have tried to include the people of the regions outside Cardiff and the south-east. The new clause is straightforward, but if the Secretary of State is unhappy with it, he can prepare one of his own.

We want to listen to the people of Wales, but the Government have shown that they are not interested in anything other than spin, soundbites and cheesy smiles, and they are not enough to assuage the fears of people in the regions. That is why we will divide the Committee. We have listened to the people of Wales, and Labour has not. We shall speak up for all the Welsh people.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The Committee divided: Ayes 144, Noes 271.

New clause 22

EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES (WELSH PUBLIC BODIES)

'.—(1) It shall be the duty of any body mentioned in Schedule 13 to make arrangements with a view of securing that its functions are carried out with due regard to the need to secure equality of opportunity.

(2) In this section, "equality of opportunity" means the prevention, elimination or regulation of discrimination between persons on grounds of sex or marital status, on racial grounds, or on grounds of disability or of other personal attributes, including belief or opinions, such as religious beliefs or political opinions.'.—[Ms Julie Morgan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 25—Gender neutral drafting—

'.—The National Assembly for Wales shall use gender neutral language in its publications and when framing subordinate legislation.'.

New clause 30—Equal opportunities (candidatures)—

'.—(1) The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 shall be amended as follows.

(2) After section 49 of the 1975 Act there shall be inserted—

"Candidatures for National Assembly for Wales

49A. Nothing in Parts II to IV shall render unlawful any act done by or on behalf of a registered political party within the meaning of the Government of Wales Act 1998 if it is an act done for the purpose of, or in connection with—

(a) selecting female candidates only, or male candidates only, for election to the National Assembly for Wales ('the Assembly'), or

(b) taking any steps preliminary to, or in connection with, such selection which either favour or subject to a detriment either female or male candidates, provided that in the opinion of the party concerned the act in question is in the circumstances necessary to attempt to secure an equal number of members of the sex favoured as there are of the other sex as candidates of that party for election to the Assembly".'.

Ms Morgan: New clause 22 would impose the duty on public bodies of ensuring that their functions are performed with regard to equality of opportunity. It would apply to any of the public bodies mentioned in schedule 13 to the Bill—such as, for example, health authorities and trusts, the Welsh Development Agency and the Welsh Language Board. The membership of public bodies in Wales is very unrepresentative of the people of Wales, with women comprising less than a third of their membership. The new clause is therefore very necessary.

I should like to speak primarily to new clause 30, which would amend the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and allow political parties to introduce positive discrimination, to secure the selection of equal numbers of women and men candidates in elections to the assembly. I shall go into some detail on how the 1975 Act operates and on how new clause 30 would help to secure a more representative assembly.

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975, which is now 23 years old, was the first time that Parliament tried to legislate for equality between women and men. We have come a long way since the Act was passed, in our understanding of what we mean by equality and of how discrimination can arise. Discrimination often happens unintentionally, because little thought is given to the effect of actions on women and on men.

The 1975 Act differentiates between direct and indirect discrimination and states that, to claim discrimination in a tribunal, one must show a detriment. However, the Act provides only a few specific instances of detriment, such as in advertising. The Act makes it clear that its provisions apply to employment, education and access to publicly available goods, facilities and services, although it has been up to the courts to decide by case law what constitutes discrimination.

An individual alleging sex discrimination makes an application to a tribunal and argues her or his case, giving as much evidence as they can. Decisions are made individually. The Equal Opportunities Commission has made recommendations to establish a clearer and more comprehensive law, and has produced a document that is currently out for consultation. However, the law that currently applies is that which was passed in 1975.

The legal definition of discrimination has not been set in stone but has evolved by case law, both in United Kingdom and in European courts. It was not until 1986, for example, that sexual harassment was acknowledged as constituting sex discrimination. Even more recently, the courts have agreed that detrimental treatment of a woman because of pregnancy is sex discrimination. The law grows and evolves—reflecting society's views and sense of justice—in outlawing discrimination.

Until the Jepson case—which challenged all-women shortlists—it had been widely believed that the actions of political parties fell outside sex discrimination legislation. Section 33 of the 1975 Act specifically states that the Act shall not "be construed as affecting any special provision for persons of one sex only in the constitution, organisation or administration of the political party."

That means that we are legally able to have women's sections and women's seats on committees, which have been widely used by all political parties.

When Mr. Jepson began his case, in 1993, the Equal Opportunities Commission took an opinion, which confirmed its view that selection for parliamentary candidates did not constitute employment, and so did not fall within the scope of the 1975 Act, but was an internal matter for a political party. An industrial tribunal disagreed. However, that was only one tribunal; another might have reached a quite different conclusion. The case was not appealed, and therefore did not reach a higher court, where a precedent might have been set and the law clarified.

8.45 pm

The objectives of the European Community and of the United Nations are to achieve gender balance in decision making. The United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women was acceded to by the United Kingdom Government in 1986, and places special importance on women's participation in the public life of their country. Other conventions have reinforced the position of establishing a set framework of international standards of equality—including the Beijing declaration, and the platform for action arising from the United Nations conference on the status of women, which our Government agreed to implement.

Across the world, political debate now acknowledges that it is not enough simply to remove barriers to women's participation, but that we must take positive action and positive measures to get women involved. The concept of democracy that Labour is committed to renewing will have real meaning and lasting effects only when political decision making is shared by women and by men.

Article 4 of the UN convention encourages the use of temporary special measures to give effect to article 7, which spells out the right to participate in the formulation of Government policy, to hold public office and to participate in non-governmental, public and political organisations.

New clause 30, which would not only amend but clarify the 1975 Act, would allow British political parties to give effect to the principle stated in the UN convention, and would allow the UK to support and to take action in achieving the European Commission's fourth equal opportunities action programme—which has as one of its five objectives promoting a gender balance in decision making, and proposes that the Commission should develop a policy for promoting gender balance in decision making, by improving the quantity and quality of women's participation. The Commission plans to encourage and to support similar actions at the other decision-making levels—at both national and regional level—within member states.

The Labour party's proposals for Wales and for Scotland are absolutely in line with the EC and UN objectives. In Wales, women have been more dramatically under-represented in public and political life than in any other part of Britain. Wales has the lowest percentage of female councillors, and until May, only four women had ever represented Welsh constituencies. The three new women Members elected in May bring the grand total to four out of 40 and were selected from women-only shortlists. Positive action was required to ensure that more women were elected to represent Wales.

Labour has agreed to field equal numbers of women and men as candidates in the elections to the assembly and to the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): I whole-heartedly agree with the aim of gender balance, but my hon. Friend knows from our discussions on achieving that aim that it raises difficult issues for constituency parties. What is the problem with 50:50 shortlists? That form of positive discrimination could apply in the public sector as well as to political parties, although it would not guarantee gender balance. Will my hon. Friend explain why she rejects that idea?

Ms Morgan: I reject the idea of 50:50 shortlists because there is no guarantee that it will produce the required result. Obviously, it is a step in the right direction, but it would not guarantee 50:50 representation. I would accept that only as part of the solution.

We are working on procedures to achieve equal representation, but a worry remains that the law is unclear and any procedure adopted may be challenged. The new clause would not mean that there would be no legal challenge—nothing can guarantee that—but it would make clear the Government's intention that women should play a full and equal part in the national assembly and their commitment to allow political parties to take whatever steps they see fit to achieve that.

Sir Raymond Powell (Ogmore): Is my hon. Friend aware of my proposal that there should be 40 seats for women and 40 seats for men, totalling 80 seats in the assembly? Would not that solve the problem? It would do away with the need for proportional representation, as there would be an equal balance of male and female Members of the Assembly.

Ms Morgan: That would be a simple solution, and I welcome the proportionality that it would involve. However, we have to combine gender balance with the element of proportionality.

The new clause would enormously strengthen the position of any political party that needed to contest a legal challenge. We have to be aware that anti-equality organisations may mount such a challenge.

The new clause means that any case would have to hinge on European law. The Equal Opportunities Commission has taken further legal advice, which confirms the earlier advice that it received and argues that measures to ensure parity of female candidates are unlikely to contravene the equal treatment directives.

There have been a number of signs that European law will uphold special measures if they are consistent with United Kingdom law. First, the treaty of Amsterdam, which amends the treaty of Rome, makes it clear that positive action measures to redress the under-representation of women are lawful. Article 119 states that "the principle of equal treatment shall not prevent any Member State from maintaining or adopting measures providing for specific advantages in order to make it easier for the underrepresented sex to pursue vocational activity or to prevent or compensate for disadvantage in professional careers".

In the recent Marschall case, the European Court of Justice ruled that selection procedures that gave priority to female candidates when fewer women than men were employed was not unlawful discrimination, provided that there was an objective assessment of male as well as female candidates.

There is a great deal of evidence and legal opinion to suggest that a legal challenge to measures to field equal numbers of male and female candidates in elections to a new body such as the Welsh assembly, in a country where women have been so dramatically excluded from political life, would not succeed.

[Ms Morgan]

The argument in favour of amending the Sex Discrimination Act is that that would strengthen the ability of political parties to defend themselves against a claim, by making clear the Government's intention and demonstrating that democracy comes first. The establishment of the Welsh assembly is a crucial part of the Government's strategy to revitalise and renew our democracy, and for it to work, we must ensure that 52 per cent. of the Welsh population who were previously excluded are there at the start. We cannot afford to waste time and energy defending cases through industrial tribunals, when we need to make absolutely categorical and indisputable our commitment to equality and inclusiveness, as part of the new democracy.

The new clause would enable the Government to defend themselves against any claim or action by any political party; it is essential that we ensure that 52 per cent. of the Welsh population have an opportunity to serve on the assembly.

Mr. Öpik: We support the new clause, for the simple reason that it is about time that we started taking equal opportunities seriously. It places a duty on such as a housing action trust, the National Museum of Wales, or the National Library of Wales, to ensure that there is equality of opportunity in the carrying out of its functions. It states that "'equality of opportunity' means the prevention, elimination or regulation of discrimination between persons on grounds of sex or marital status, on racial grounds or on grounds of disability . . . religious beliefs or political opinions."

"any body mentioned in Schedule 13",

Mr. Livsey: Does my hon. Friend agree that agism should be included in that list? As it is my hon. Friend's birthday today, on which I congratulate him, does he not think it an appropriate moment to introduce that point?

Mr. Öpik: I thank my hon. Friend for undermining my repeated youthful credentials. The world should know that this is the end of my first third of a century on the planet. At 33 today, I remember when I was younger, but I shall leave those reminiscences until another time.

My hon. Friend raises a serious point, however. There is a great deal of age discrimination, and perhaps the new clause would have been even better if it had included that.

The new clause also demands acceptance that the Welsh assembly would necessarily use gender-neutral language in its publications and when framing subordinate legislation. In effect, it is saying that the status quo is not an option when there is a choice between prejudice and equality.

The challenge of our political generation is to ensure that equal opportunities are enshrined in the etiquette and the legislation of our political institutions. The greatest strength of the new clauses is that they spell out the demand for equal opportunities in the Welsh assembly—a case that has already been made in legislation.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): The hon. Gentleman has spoken a good deal about equal opportunities. The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan) spoke a lot about equality of outcome. Does he acknowledge that there is no guarantee that equality of opportunity will lead to equality of outcome? Where does he draw the line? Would he be prepared to go as far as the hon. Lady on what she described as positive action or affirmative action, or is he sitting on the fence, as Liberal Democrats are wont to do?

Mr. Öpik: I fully understand the Conservative crisis on the issue. I am flattered that the hon. Gentleman is asking the Liberal Democrats for guidance on what the moribund Conservatives should do to ensure equality of opportunity. My tuppenny-worth is that the important point for any political party—not just in Wales—is to set a strategy to dissolve the prejudices that so infest the political structures of the United Kingdom. To that extent, I agree with the desire of the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan) for a system to redress the balance, which surely nobody in any party can think is reasonable or fair as we come to the turn of the millennium.

There are differences of view on how best to achieve our aim. The Labour party is proceeding in one direction. We settled our process at a conference at the weekend. I look forward to hearing what the Conservatives will do to ensure that they do not live in the ancient past, with ridiculous sexual inequality and an overbearing proportion of men in whatever seats they can win in the assembly. I hope that that answers the question of the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes). I shall be happy to furnish him with a few more ideas on what the Conservatives might do, when he buys me my birthday drink in the Strangers Bar.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: The Liberal Democrats are claiming the moral high ground on sorting out the gender balance. Of the 46 Liberal Democrat Members of Parliament, how many are women? What did the Liberal Democrats decide at their weekend conference?

Mr. Öpik: I do not want to digress too far from the matter in hand, but in the spirit of directness that I always seek to achieve in my interactions in the House, I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's questions as briefly and clearly as I can. He well knows that of our 46 Members of Parliament, only three are women. That is an unacceptable proportion. We have said that, and others have said it. We must set about modifying not just the proportion but the first-past-the-post system, which creates such an outcome. The hon. Gentleman knows that we believe that a single transferable vote system would redress the balance. The statistics on our candidates in the general election back that up.

The hon. Gentleman's second point is probably more relevant to the issue under discussion. The fundamental need is to engender an attitude of not tolerating discrimination in our systems. To summarise very briefly, the conference decided that we must proceed with equal shortlists and show to one and all attitudinally that we are not prepared to accept the prejudices—which come from the head and heart rather than constitutional documentation—that have infested our party and kept us from achieving the sexual equality that we all seek. I hope that that is sufficient explanation for the hon. Gentleman. I see him nodding, so I shall move on.

On a clean sheet, which the assembly is, we can draw any picture that we want of etiquette and prejudice. We can reproduce the same old tired weaknesses and paradigms that we see in this House, or we can decide that the past is not an option, refusing to tolerate the sexism, racism and agism that have pulled down the credibility of our political system. [Interruption.] Despite some of the incomprehensible shocked disappointment coming from the Conservatives on what is not just logic but a moral imperative, we should all agree on the issue.

The Government can give a little. Some people think that it is a sign of weakness to accept someone else's ideas. It is the same for the Government sometimes. The starting point for overcoming prejudice is recognising that the vulnerability of listening to and accepting another person's views can help us to modify positions that may prevent us from achieving equality. Just as men must acknowledge that a person's capability should be assessed regardless of gender, just as skin colour does not define personal abilities, so being in government does not entitle a person to believe that they have a monopoly on good ideas. Those who think otherwise feed the fallacious assumptions of superiority from some arbitrary distension. That and a fear of looking vulnerable are the seeds of discrimination. The Government genuinely could go some way to accepting the new clauses, rather than giving some reason in the summation why that is not on.

Whatever one's view about the selection processes adopted by various parties, what possible harm would it do Ministers or the Government's image to accept the basic request of, say, new clause 25, to ensure gender-neutral language in the assembly's publications? That would not cost a penny. I suggest that those who do not think that that is important ask themselves whether they are unaware of some prejudice in their outlook in the political environment, which makes them discount the importance of changing words to reflect the attitudes so clearly enunciated by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North.

I urge the Government to show commitment to equality in terms of words and deeds. It is a virtue to admit fallibility. In doing so, they will provide the precondition to sweeping away sexual prejudice. The best thing that the Government can do is to prove that they mean what they say. They have been resistant to accepting change in our deliberations so far. I urge them to accept this change, to show us that they take the issue seriously and to send a message, behind which I hope we can all unite, that sexual equality is the only option in the assembly. The assembly should be a model of good parliamentary practice for the rest of the United Kingdom. We have a golden opportunity to dissolve prejudice.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): As I look to the Benches behind me, I freely confess that the Conservative party is not unpreoccupied with matters of female representation in this place, or in the party. One of the key features of our party's renewal will be the involvement of more women in its front line.

The new clauses display a remarkable lack of confidence in the electors of Wales and how their elected representatives will deal fairly with such issues without the sanction of primary legislation. The Bill already requires the assembly to exercise its functions with due regard to equality of opportunity. The assembly will also have to publish a report each year, outlining what arrangements it has put in place to achieve that and how effective they have been. I imagine that, by implication, that applies to the assembly's responsibilities. It is up to the assembly whether it wishes to lay down conditions for Welsh public bodies, as new clause 22 would require in primary legislation. New clause 22 would impose a duty on the bodies to make similar arrangements to the assembly for exercising their functions with due regard to equality of opportunity, but that surely should be a matter for the assembly and not be imposed by the Committee.

I shall brush over new clause 25 and move straight on to new clause 30. New clause 30 appears to be an interference in the relationship between the elector, the party and the elected. Whatever the internal arrangements of a party, it is not for legislation to lay down methods of selection. Nor should it legitimise forms of discrimination that would otherwise be illegal.

The way in which the argument about discrimination has progressed is extraordinary. Discrimination is outlawed in the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, the equal treatment directive and article 119 of the treaty on European Union. As that does not satisfy the political agenda of some of the participants, they want to make legislation more, not less, discriminatory.

When the Labour party tried to introduce women-only shortlists for parliamentary elections, that was found to be unlawful under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 in the case to which the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan) referred. Labour did not appeal, leaving the legal position still somewhat unclear, but several leading lawyers argue that the parliamentary selection process would not be subject to the Act if it came before a court of law.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why he thinks that the new clause would lead to a more discriminatory outcome when the whole point is that, starting with a clean slate and a new assembly, the intended outcome should be equal and that neither sex should have a numerical advantage over the other?

Mr. Jenkin: The logic of the hon. Lady's position is to accept an earlier suggestion that we should simply legislate for 50 per cent. of the Members of the Assembly to be women. That is not a democratic outcome, because the voters of Wales should decide the membership of the assembly, and they should be free to vote for the candidates whom the parties choose to put up. There is a difference between discrimination in the process and discrimination in the outcome. We are against discrimination in the process, whereas the hon. Lady is in favour of discrimination in the process in order to achieve a particular outcome that satisfies her beliefs. That is not necessarily more democratic.

We all want more women to come into public life, to compete for jobs in public life and to do well, but it does not do women a favour to promote women who are necessarily less well qualified than men. [Interruption.] Women are not inferior to men; women can do just as well as men and often do far better, as we in the Conservative party have discovered from time to time. The problem is that the new clause would legitimise discrimination, and that flies in the face of the very rights that the hon. Member for Cardiff, North is trying to create.

[Mr. Jenkin]

I refer the Committee attention to article 14 of the European convention on human rights, which the Government are incorporating into United Kingdom law. It states:

"The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

That is the true language of rights. The language of the new clause is the language of a political agenda that has more to do with restricting rights in favour of certain groups than with promoting genuine equality. That is why we oppose the new clause, although I congratulate the hon. Member for Cardiff, North on her tenacity and on her honesty in telling the House that she herself is here by virtue of such a discriminatory process.

Mr. Win Griffiths: The business of the Committee has meant that the debate has not been as long as we might have wanted it to be and my remarks will necessarily be brief.

New clause 22 arises out of a use of schedule 5 to the Scotland Bill and, unfortunately, the way in which that has been transposed into the Government of Wales Bill does not meet the same requirements that exist in the Scotland Bill. It would extend rights in respect of religious and political beliefs, but we have no statute law on those matters and they are therefore specifically excluded in the Scotland Bill, even though they are referred to in the interpretation of equal opportunities. Because of the pressure of time, I shall write in detail to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan), who stated her arguments clearly, and place a copy of the letter in the Library.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) spoke to new clause 25. We believe that the Bill already provides in clauses 47 and 113 for the assembly's business and the exercise of its functions to be pursued having regard to the principle of equality of opportunity. We also believe that the use of gender-neutral language is only one element in this. The national assembly advisory group is already considering equality of opportunity in the context of clause 47, and I shall ensure that its attention is drawn to the concerns that the hon. Gentleman raises.

On new clause 30, the Government attach great importance to much more extensive participation by women in the political process. I take it that that is the feeling of the whole Committee, despite some rather negative remarks. For far too long, there have been far too few women in our elected chambers. That is particularly true of Wales, where, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North said, women have been scandalously under-represented in political life. In 80 years, only seven women Members of Parliament have represented Welsh constituencies, four of whom are current Members. However, I am pleased that two of the five representatives of Welsh constituencies in the European Parliament are women—that is something on which to build.

9.15 pm

Mr. Dafis: I want to make it clear that Plaid Cymru Members strongly support the new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan). May I draw to the Minister's attention the fact that the Women's Institute in Wales suggested that the Equal Opportunities Commission should be included in the list of organisations in schedule 4, to establish a relationship between the assembly and the commission and so encourage the integration of gender balance into the work of the assembly?

Mr. Griffiths: Speaking off the cuff, I do not think that there would be any problem with that—we shall consider it.

The Government hope that representation in the National Assembly for Wales will, from the outset, be different from what we have had at Westminster. The assembly will be a new start for Wales, and we hope that women will be to the fore in ensuring that that new start is a success.

Sir Raymond Powell: What are the Government's proposals to ensure a gender balance? How will they ensure that women are elected to the Welsh assembly?

Mr. Griffiths: If I may continue with my speech, I hope that some of the issues will emerge as I proceed.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Three minutes.

Mr. Griffiths: Well, I shall have to proceed very quickly.

The Government are committed to the principle of equality. We want the assembly to be inclusive and equally accessible to all groups in Wales. New clause 30 would amend the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 to remove from its scope the selection procedure for assembly candidates. That is a complex issue. The requirements of European employment law, particularly the equal treatment directive, and the Sex Discrimination Act have established the framework in which we work.

The parties can take a range of steps to encourage more women to put themselves forward as candidates. They need to make a strong statement nationally of their commitment to encourage women to come forward as candidates for selection—I have no hesitation in giving that commitment on behalf of the Wales Labour party.

Parties should offer more training for women who are interested in putting themselves forward as candidates. There should be training for local selection committees, and promotional literature to encourage women party members to stand for selection. The Equal Opportunities Commission has offered political parties advice on how to put into practice equal opportunities in their selection procedures, and I urge all parties to take up that offer.

We are also aware that the procedures and working practices of a legislature may in themselves be an active disincentive to women who might otherwise be interested in standing for election. With that in mind, clause 47 requires the assembly to make appropriate arrangements to ensure that its business is conducted with due regard to the principle that there should be equal opportunities for all.

Clause 113 also requires the assembly to make arrangements to ensure that it has regard to the principle of equality in the exercise of its functions. The White Paper made it clear that we are committed to equal opportunities for all. That commitment extends to women and men, members of the ethnic minority communities, the disabled and others. We urge all political parties to have regard to the principle of equal opportunities in drawing up their procedures for the selection of candidates for the assembly elections.

I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North to withdraw the motion.

Ms Julie Morgan: In view of those remarks, and in the hope that the Government will examine the issues again during the passage of the Scotland Bill and consider whether free-standing legislation should be introduced, I reluctantly beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Wigley: On a point of order, Mr. Lord. In view of the way in which the guillotine is preventing debate on matters such as the consumer affairs committee, can we have some assurance that those matters will be given some consideration on Report?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): That is not a matter for the Chair at this point. I am sure that the Committee is well aware of the times laid down for debates this evening.

Mr. Livsey: Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord. May I make the same point about the Consolidated Fund, which is especially important?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I have dealt with that point of order. I remind the Committee that points of order simply take more time out of tonight's debate.

Mr. Ron Davies: Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord. Let it nevertheless be on the record that the timetable motion with which we are complying was agreed by all parties, and that the whole House has responsibility for the passage of the legislation.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that I have dealt with that point of order.

TREASURY CONSENT (LOCAL GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE AND COUNCIL TAX)

'(1) The Assembly shall not directly or indirectly do anything, or omit to do anything, which would have, or may have, the effect of increasing local government expenditure in Wales or the effect of increasing the rate of council tax in Wales without the consent of the Treasury.

(2) Such consent of the Treasury may be given from time to time and may be revoked or qualified at any time or times.'.—[Mr. Jenkin.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In an effort to ensure that everyone gets a chance to speak, I shall be as brief as possible. It was interesting to note in the previous debate that the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik), spoke for longer than the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan), who moved the original motion.

Paragraph 3.8 of the White Paper made it clear that the assembly would assume responsibility for funding Welsh local authorities, and that was to be put into effect by clause 22 and schedule 2 which, taken together, require the Secretary of State to transfer functions relating to local government in Wales.

The amount of revenue support grant awarded to a council is not specified in law and will be totally at the assembly's discretion. Furthermore, the Government are committed, as paragraph 3.9 of the White Paper says, to removing "crude and universal capping". Indeed, the Secretary of State said:

"Certainly I want to get away from the capping regime. I think that it is unhealthy . . . as a Government we are opposed to the crude and universal system of capping, introduced by the last Government, which we have inherited."—[Official Report, 11 February 1998; Vol. 305, c. 385-87.]

As we have consistently said, the assembly could introduce its own tax-raising power through the back door, by deliberately holding back funds from the unitary authorities, safe in the knowledge that they would then raise council tax. The new clause would stop the assembly forcing local authorities to raise their council tax without Treasury approval.

We have consistently warned that the assembly will effectively possess an indirect tax-raising power. The new clause is designed to prevent that.

Mr. Win Griffiths: The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) displays entirely unnecessary caution and fear, as I hope to be able to show. It must be realised that funding for local government—the hon. Gentleman specifically referred to that point—represents nearly half of the total Welsh block. New clause 31 would fundamentally affect the way in which the assembly would discharge its responsibilities for funding local government in Wales.

We must be clear about the effect of the new clause. It would provide for a Government Department in Whitehall to second-guess decisions of an elected assembly based in Wales. The assembly will be directly accountable to the people of Wales for its decisions, but that is not to say that, under devolution, the United Kingdom Government will have no interest in the level of local government expenditure in Wales. The block principles that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary published before Christmas made it clear that financial arrangements would be made to safeguard the United Kingdom taxpayer from the effects of decisions taken by the assembly. That is why, for example, the cost of council tax benefit in Wales is to be brought within the block. The assembly will not be able to pass on the benefit costs of its decisions to the Department of Social Security.

We have also recognised that, at the moment, local authority self-financed expenditure, including council tax income, forms part of the Government's control total. Council tax levels are controlled by capping. As the hon. Member for North Essex rightly pointed out, the Government are committed to abolishing crude, universal capping, but we are reviewing the capping powers as part of our review of local government finance. Consultation on those issues will be carried out later this year in England and Wales. We shall decide, in the light of the review, what powers the assembly should have. The block principles cater for that.

[Mr. Win Griffiths]

If local authority self-financed expenditure in Wales grows more rapidly than the equivalent expenditure in England and in such a way as to threaten targets set for public expenditure as part of the management of the UK economy, it will be open to the Government to take the excess into account when considering the level of the Welsh block. That safety provision is written in. Therefore, appropriate safeguards will be put in place to protect the UK taxpayer. The Government's view is that those safeguards are best delivered through the flexible administrative arrangements in the block rules, instead of the straitjacket that would be introduced by new clause 31.

Under the new clause, a decision to give £1,000 more to local government would require the assembly to go, cap in hand, to the Treasury for permission. That cannot be an appropriate way to treat a mature, elected body. I hope that the hon. Member for North Essex will accept that protection for the UK taxpayer is provided in the block principles that we have already set out. A serious side effect of the new clause would be to make it impossible for the assembly to make even small changes in the provision for local government in Wales. Therefore, I hope that he will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. He gave the answer that I expected. Will it be less inflammatory for the future relations between the Treasury and the assembly for a behind-the-scenes, arm-twisting policy to be the way in which the Treasury controls the withdrawal of grant from local authorities, instead of clear and unequivocal consents being required by the Bill? I ask that question as a warning. We believe that misunderstandings on that issue are likely to lead to friction between the Westminster Parliament and the Welsh assembly in the future.

Mr. Win Griffiths: There is nothing behind-closed-doors about this. I have explained clearly how the principle will work, and it is open for everyone to see.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but there will be private discussions between representatives of the Welsh assembly and the Treasury, behind closed doors, where the issue of how much revenue support grant settlement is doled out to local authorities will have to be agreed, so that the assembly should know that what it is agreeing will not result in a withdrawal of grant by the Treasury.

That is the use of Executive power, instead of the use of simple expedients in the Bill, to try to control local authority spending. I can appreciate why, sitting in his position, the Minister would prefer everything to be done at the discretion of Ministers, but that approach carries with it dangers. The dangers are that, when the arm twisting becomes serious, the assembly will feel that its legitimate rights are being thwarted because no restriction that would otherwise contain its action has been put in the Bill.

To achieve what we should prefer to achieve by legislation, the Minister will have to rely on back-room pressure, and back-room pressure is less satisfactory than an open agreement set down in the Bill. However, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 32

ASSEMBLY TO BE SUBJECT TO INVESTIGATION BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMISSIONER

'In Schedule 2 to the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967 at the appropriate place insert:—

"The National Assembly for Wales".'.—[Mr. Jenkin.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.30 pm

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 33—Assembly to be subject to investigation by Commission for Local Administration—

'In section 25(1) of the Local Government Act 1974 at the end insert:—

"(e) the National Assembly for Wales".'.

New clause 41—Ombudsman for Wales—

'.—(1) The Assembly shall make provision for the investigation of relevant complaints made to its members in respect of any action taken by or on behalf of a member of the executive committee in the exercise of functions conferred on the members of the executive committee.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a complaint is a relevant complaint if it is a complaint of a kind which could be investigated under the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967 if it were made to a member of the House of Commons in respect of a Government department or other authority to which that Act applies.

(3) In making provision of the kind required by subsection (1), the Assembly shall have regard to (among other things) the Act of 1967.

(4) The provision required by subsection (1) shall include the appointment by the Assembly of a National Assembly for Wales Commissioner for Administration.

(5) In this section, "action" includes failure to act (and related expressions shall be read accordingly); and the references to the Act of 1967 are to that Act as it has effect on the commencement of this section.'.

Mr. Jenkin: I shall be very brief because I should be grateful to the Minister for an answer.

There is no provision in the Bill for an ombudsman to investigate complaints of maladministration by the assembly or those bodies for which it has responsibility. We could give many examples of where an ombudsman would be an appropriate port of last call for members of the public with grievances. The House has an ombudsman; local government has an ombudsman. Is there an ombudsman to whom people could apply in this case?

Mr. Wigley: I wish to speak to new clause 41, which proposes an ombudsman for Wales, making slightly different provision from that suggested by the Conservative new clauses 32 and 33, which give that responsibility either to the parliamentary ombudsman or to the local government ombudsman. Our new clause provides the facility for a specific ombudsman for the National Assembly for Wales. Whichever course is chosen, it is essential that there is recourse to an ombudsman.

Mr. Livsey: Liberal Democrat Members agree with what the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) has just said, but if what he proposes is not possible, we propose that the assembly be subject to investigation by the parliamentary commissioner. We do not believe that investigation by the commissioner for local administration in Wales, as is suggested in new clause 33, is appropriate.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I was fully prepared to take short speeches from all the Opposition parties because we believe—as we have shown in our actions—that an important part of the process of passing the Bill is to listen to what people have to say.

The House may recall that, in the White Paper, we said that we would wish to extend the jurisdiction of the parliamentary commissioner to cover the work of the assembly. However, after considering the matter, and at the suggestion of the parliamentary commissioner, Michael Buckley, we felt that it would be better to create a separate office of the assembly ombudsman. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State informed the House of that on Second Reading.

It is our intention to create a new office of the assembly ombudsman. We would expect constituents to bring their appeals to the ombudsman through their Member of the Assembly, as constituents bring appeals to the parliamentary commissioner through their Member of Parliament. It would be up to the assembly to decide whether it wanted its own free-standing ombudsman or whether it would place itself at the disposal of the parliamentary ombudsman. However, we shall table an amendment, and when we do so there will be an opportunity to discuss the detail. Therefore, I hope that the motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. Jenkin: It has been drawn to my attention that, in view of our previous debates, it might be more appropriate to call the person an ombudsperson rather than an ombudsman, because I believe that we want gender-neutral language in the Welsh assembly. That rather underlines the pointlessness of the exercise. I am grateful to the Minister for his comments. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 35

CANDIDATURES

'(1) No party may submit a list of candidates to be Assembly members for an Assembly electoral region unless there is a candidate of that party in at least one-half of the Assembly constituencies included in that Assembly electoral region.

(2) Where a party has candidates in at least one half of the Assembly constituencies included in an Assembly electoral region they shall submit a list of candidates to be Assembly members for that Assembly electoral region.'.—[Mr. Ancram.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This is a somewhat unusual new clause that deals with an important point. As I have only a short time to deploy the argument, I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not take interventions. I hope that the Government will be able to respond.

To understand the argument, it is necessary to revisit the proposed system of elections to the assembly, which we discussed earlier in Committee—the two-vote additional member system known as AMS, with the distribution of list seats contingent on the outcome of the constituency contests in the individual constituencies in each region.

For various reasons, largely in relation to the Scotland Bill, it has become clear that the AMS as at present provided could be open to legal but undesirable manipulation, which would effectively go far towards negating the purpose of achieving a more proportional result.

As hon. Members will recall, I made clear my dislike of the AMS at an earlier stage. I want to make it clear at the outset that the new clause does not seek to wreck the proposed system. In reluctantly accepting the system, I am trying to mitigate the effects of the damaging manipulation which, it appears, could currently arise and which, without some adjustment to the Bill, is quite likely to arise.

The potential for manipulation arises from what could loosely be called ticket splitting. In a region where one party is likely to score heavily on the first-past-the-post constituency contests, the AMS by way of the d'Hondt divisor, which is the one built into the Bill, applied under clause 6(1)(b), would on straight party tickets militate strongly against that party on the electoral region lists. Indeed, the required proportionality is achieved through the so-called adjustment seats, which is the purpose of the d'Hondt system that the Government have adopted and by which they set great store, as they have told us repeatedly.

The potential, however, arises for the party in question to decide not to contest the list seats at all, but instead to throw its weight behind another party in order to deny other parties additional members through the adjustment seats. This other party could be, as is happening increasingly in Germany, a potential coalition partner that would then owe loyalty in return for the benefit of the split ticket. Although that is undesirable and undermines proportionality, I fear that that is probably unavoidable within the system.

The most unacceptable manipulation can occur in a slightly different way. The dominant party in terms of the constituency elections could decide not to contest the list seats, and could instead form an understanding with another party, probably one that might be termed an alter ego party, which had been registered for that purpose—a party that either had not stood in the constituency seats, or had received no votes there.

Mr. Ron Davies: Or presumably that could be done with independent candidates.

Mr. Ancram: Indeed, but the mathematics become more fierce when they involve a registered party on the list system. The alter ego party could stand in the regional lists, and if there was an effective straight replication of votes across from the constituency to the regional lists, the effect would be dramatic in the overall increase of seats that those combined parties could achieve. The alter ego party would avoid the constituency strike-rate element of the divisor, and would be subjected to the divisor only under the list system itself.

A party could stand, for example, as Plaid Cymru in the constituencies and register its alter ego as the Party of Wales for the regional list. Conservatives could become Unionists for the same purpose. Labour could become Co-operative, as has been mooted in the west of Scotland, or resurrect the Independent Labour party.

Mr. Wigley: Or become socialist.

Mr. Ancram: Or even become socialist. Liberal Democrats, as we know, would probably become whatever suited them at the time.

It all sounds complicated, but in essence it is not. A split-ticket campaign would not be difficult where the split between the two parts of the system was total. If, however, there is any cross-over, split-ticket voting is by no means impossible, but it becomes much harder to manage. I shall return to that.

I shall try to exemplify. I am sorry that I have not been able to produce any figures for Wales, but some work has been done in Scotland. I refer with appreciation to the initial work of Dr. Michael Dyer of the department of politics and international relations at Aberdeen university. On the basis of the electoral results of 1 May last year applied equally to both ballots within the AMS in Scotland, it is calculated that Labour would have returned 64 out of 129 Members of the Scottish Parliament—which is only one short of an overall majority. However, if there had been a clear split-ticket arrangement in place using an alter ego party, the combined total would have been 91—a clear majority and an increase from just under 50 per cent. to just over 70 per cent. of the seats. While that might be attractive in political terms, it would comprehensively defeat the purpose of the AMS system: proportionality would be side-stepped and the basis of the new political arrangements would be undermined. On that basis, I hope that the Secretary of State will share my concern about that problem.

That brings me to the solution. Clearly the key will be the provisions for the registration of parties. The worst of the effects that I have mentioned would be avoided if there were provisions to prevent the registration of what I have termed alter ego parties. However, at present, we do not know what the provisions will be. It is quite extraordinary, if not unacceptable, that we have reached this stage in considering the legislation—alongside the Scotland Bill and the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, which are also affected—without sight of the terms of the enactment referred to in clause 4(8) and having achieved nothing more than the earliest stages of inter-party consultation about what they might be.

So central is the question of registration to the proper working of the electoral system that it is unconscionable that the legislation could complete its passage through this place without full sight of, and discussion about, the statutory criteria by which registration will operate and clear indications that alter ego parties will not be permitted. I make that point very seriously at this stage in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take steps to ensure that, when we return to the Bill on Report on the Floor of the House in due course, we shall be fully apprised of the details of the forthcoming legislation regarding registration. It cannot be right that important democratic systems are created in legislation with a vital component such as this left unrevealed. We need to see the registration Bill—and soon.

In the meantime, our new clause—which does not and cannot deal with registration—seeks to mitigate the worst effects of such manipulation. It seeks to prevent the optimum split-ticket arrangement where the split between the two parts of the system is total. It is in two connected parts: the first requires a party to put up candidates in one half of the constituencies in an electoral region if it wants to nominate a list; and the second requires a party to nominate a list if it has candidates in one half of the constituencies in an electoral region. I must admit that that does not resolve the problem, but it makes the potential abuse more difficult to achieve. It is certainly better than nothing—which I fear is what the Bill at present provides.

I hope that this suggestion will appeal to anyone who genuinely wants a fair and balanced system of elections to the assembly—and I hope that that includes the Government Front Bench. In any event, I commend new clause 35 to the House.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I thank the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) for advancing new clause 35 and the reasoning behind it. We acknowledge the points that he has made and I concede that there may be scope for collusion between and within parties to exploit the two-ballot structure of the additional member system in the manner that he described. Such cynical manipulation of the system would be an affront to the electorate and would undermine the democratic credibility of the elected body.

However, it is not easy to deal with this problem as a matter of law—the proposed new clause would have some undesirable consequences, as I shall explain in a moment. I am not aware that there is any provision in existing electoral law that would provide the answer. A rather similar circumstance prevails in certain parts of Wales that has a different effect. Known members of political parties often stand in local government elections as independents, even though they are nothing of the kind. They do not wear their political colours because they fear that that might reduce their chances of election. Nothing in the law prevents that practice, and it is left to the good sense of electors to figure out who is who.

One of the unfortunate side effects of the new clause is that it could—without going into all the details—have a severe effect on many of the smaller parties in the electoral regions. It would sometimes be difficult for them to offer a sufficiently large number of candidates for the list. The new clause could damage the interests of smaller parties. We want to be inclusive in the assembly. We want to try to take account of the fears of people throughout Wales. That is why we are a bit hesitant.

I return to the issue of collusion. The collusion mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman will require the vigilance of other political parties and the media to expose it. There is evidence to show that, in New Zealand and Germany, where efforts have been made to use collusion, it has been exposed and it has not done the parties involved any good. If that were to happen in Wales, it would not reflect well on the guilty parties. That would be a real deterrent. That said, we take on board the serious concerns the right hon. Gentleman has raised.

I am not in a position to give a guarantee about when the details on registration will emerge. I can assure Opposition Members that we want to see whether it will deal with these issues. I am not entirely sure that it will. We do not want to dismiss the matter as of no importance. We shall examine it with our colleagues in Scotland and the Home Office to try to prevent collusion in the additional member system in Wales.

I hope that, with those assurances, the right hon. Gentleman will be prepared to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the Minister for the concern that he has shown towards the new clause and, indeed, for the way in which he responded to it. He, like me, realises that whatever our views on a particular electoral system, it is important that it is seen to work fairly if it is not to undermine the democratic institution at which it is directed.

I am worried not just about collusion, which might be regarded as underhand and when exposed cause a public reaction, but about the open manipulation of the system, as happens in certain parallel systems where having an alter ego party is a purely political manoeuvre to allow the d'Hondt divisor to be avoided in the second list, which means that in the first calculation no account is taken of the constituencies that are won on the direct list. The system can be abused not just in an underhand way but in a legitimate and legal way, which would avoid the intentions behind the system. I hope that that can be looked at.

I am a little cautious about using Germany as a parallel. The areas there are much bigger and there is not the tendency, except in a few areas, towards a preponderance of one-party votes that could create the problems in an area such as this.

Finally, I return to the registration of political parties. Important issues arise and I stress that I shall be making the same point in relation to the Scotland Bill. I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), the shadow Home Secretary, made the same point when the House of Commons was discussing the European Parliamentary Elections Bill last Thursday. If we are to have confidence in going along with what is proposed, we must know the criterion on which legislation is to be based. I understand that consultation has begun, but it is at an early stage and fairly vague.

As for the propensity for alter ego parties to get through the system, I should be grateful for detailed information, if that is possible, on Report. Indeed, it would be difficult for us to take a sanguine attitude to these matters if that information was not available. I realise that that is not entirely in the hands of the Minister or the Secretary of State, but is a matter for the Home Secretary. However, I hope that my views and representations will be made known strongly and clearly.

In the light of what the Minister has said, and given his undertaking to take the new clause away and consider it carefully, I am prepared to withdraw the new clause. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 36

RIGHTS OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS REPRESENTING PARLIAMENTARY CONSTITUENCIES IN WALES

'(1) Members of the House of Commons representing a constituency in Wales shall be entitled to attend and participate in any proceedings of the Assembly.

(2) Subsection (1) does not confer on any such Member of the House of Commons—

(a) any right to vote, or

(b) any right to attend or participate in the proceedings of a committee of the Assembly or any sub-committee of such a committee.

(3) The standing orders must include provision for any documents which—

(a) contain material relating to any business which has been, or is to be, transacted by the Assembly itself, and

(b) are made available to all Assembly members, to be available to such Members of the House of Commons no later than the time when they are made available to Assembly members who are not members of the executive committee.'.—[Mr. Jenkin.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Under clause 75, the Secretary of State for Wales is entitled to attend and participate in any proceedings of the assembly, although that right would neither give the Secretary of State a vote nor would it extend to Committees. The Secretary of State would also receive any relevant documents at the same time as Members of the Assembly. The new clause would give Members representing Welsh constituencies similar privileges. We think that that is only right as they have responsibilities for representing the electors of Wales as much as Members of the Assembly.

Mr. Syms: I support my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin). One of the key points will be how the relationship between the House of Commons and the Welsh assembly develops. The new clause provides a mechanism whereby Members of this place may at least be able to attend, talk and participate but not vote in the assembly's deliberations. That would be useful for an understanding of the perspective from the point of view of us in the United Kingdom Parliament and of Members of Parliament, of what is happening and of the issues that are current within the assembly.

Almost of more importance is the last part of the new clause, which provides that documents should "be available to such Members of the House of Commons no later than the time when they are made available to Assembly members who are not members of the executive committee."

It is important that if decisions are made in the assembly that have an impact on parliamentary constituencies, Members who represent those constituencies should at least have the full information available to them relatively quickly so that when they are dealing with correspondence or local problems they are aware of the advice that was given to assembly Members by their officers and aware also of the information that has been available to those who have taken decisions.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I oppose the new clause because it would confuse the roles of elected representatives of the assembly and elected representatives at Westminster. They should work in partnership, but to allow representatives from Westminster to attend the assembly, even if they do not have the right to vote in debates at the assembly, would create confusion and would undermine the principle of accountability. It would also eat into debating time within the assembly.

I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say in reply. I am sure that I am not the only Member of this place who, while supportive of the principle of devolution and congratulatory of the Government on their valiant efforts to produce workable legislation, wants to hear what my hon. Friend has to say about how he and the Government generally intend to foster a workable relationship between Members of Parliament in Westminster and elected Members of the Assembly. Given the devolved nature of powers, that is particularly significant, and it will be interesting to see whether the Government start a debate about how that partnership should be engendered. That important point exercises the minds of hon. Members on both sides of the Committee.

There would have to be a partnership. It is not beyond the wit of man or woman to realise that assembly Members and Westminster Members of Parliament must respect each other's functions. Westminster will retain primary legislative power, and Welsh Members of Parliament will continue to play an important part in the legislative process.

I oppose the new clause because, although it raises an issue that should be addressed, it confuses the roles of the representatives at Westminster and in the assembly.

Mr. Livsey: Liberal Democrat Members believe that the new clause would subordinate the Welsh assembly to the views of Westminster Members of Parliament, which is not the correct way to proceed. Westminster Members should have the right to observe the assembly's proceedings and to receive documentation on its workings. Beyond that, a line should be drawn.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) made interesting points, but I shall explain why the anxieties that he expressed do not add up.

The assembly will regulate its own proceedings. I should be surprised if Westminster Members who wanted to attend were given priority over Members of the Assembly to participate in debates, but the new clause addresses the anxieties that the hon. Member for Clwyd, West rightly expressed. There must be a good working relationship between Members of Parliament representing Welsh constituencies and the assembly if the assembly is to do its work successfully.

The assembly will deal with secondary legislation—we shall consider statutory instruments later in the debate—and good channels of communication with those who represent Welsh interests when primary legislation is considered at Westminster are essential. There will be the danger of a breakdown in communications if Westminster Members of Parliament are not invited to attend the assembly's debates. Members of Parliament will not want to attend as observers unless their views can be heard.

The new clause is designed to deal with precisely that point, and would not subordinate the assembly to the will of Members of Parliament. The reverse is true: the assembly will have the power to regulate its own proceedings under the Bill, and the new clause would allow Members of Parliament to be fully briefed on assembly issues. For that reason, I support the new clause.

Mr. Letwin: I see the new clause as a cry for help. We have frequently examined the tissue of the conflicts to which the Bill gives rise, and the Secretary of State and his colleagues on the Treasury Bench have assured us on numerous occasions that our fears will be resolved by a new spirit of amity and co-operation. Those Ministers have often told us that our fears are based on a reactionary view of the likelihood of constitutional conflict. They have said—the Secretary of State is nodding helpfully—that, if only we understood the new spirit in which the House of Commons, the other place and the Welsh assembly would proceed, we would realise that our fears were groundless.

If that is true, it falls to the Secretary of State and his Ministers to tell us how, mechanically, such an entirely new constitutional spirit will arise. Close to me sit the highly articulate and noble representatives of a political party represented—at the moment—by the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). Unlike the Government, they have an entirely clear view of what the assembly is, where it is headed and what is to be made of it. They have taken great heart from the Secretary of State's observation on repeated occasions—I think I quote him exactly—that this is a process rather than a resting point. As they see it, the process is not one to which new clause 36 would give rise, nor is it in a spirit of amity and co-operation. On the contrary, like many parts of the Bill—to which, admirably, the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and others have drawn our attention—it allows, in great measure, for a spirit of litigation.

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Gentleman has tempted me to intervene. I know that my reaction is delayed; it is the shock.

Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the process—although it is a process—can go no faster or further than the people of Wales want, or even than the House permits? The long stop, in terms of legislation, rests with the House.

Mr. Letwin: That is an interesting point, which the Committee ought to ponder.

I entirely accept that it will not be possible to go further or faster than the Welsh assembly desires, and, to the extent that the assembly reflects opinion in Wales, I suppose that it must be true that it will not be possible to go further or faster than the majority opinion in Wales wishes. However, once a constitutional muddle is established as the Bill establishes it, in the absence of a measure such as new clause 36, the natural means by which that muddle will be resolved is one for which the Bill provides: litigation before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and, in some cases, lower courts leading to that.

I think that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that there is no knowing where that process will lead. It will be taken out of the hands of elected representatives, Welsh or otherwise, and placed in the hands of judges—on the whole, English judges—who will decide most of the important issues. New clause 36—I refer to it before the Secretary of State tries to get the Chair to call me to order—tries to deal with that.

The new clause may well be described as insufficient, inadequate and inelegant. On behalf of Front Benchers, I think that I can accept all those accolades. The important point that it raises, however, is undeniable. It seeks to establish some mechanism to make a reality of the rhetoric that the Secretary of State and his Ministers have repeatedly given the Committee, in the absence of the slightest substance in the Bill.

Nowhere, other than in new clause 36, do we see even an attempt to create the mechanics for co-operation. That is extraordinary. We have been told repeatedly that well-documented causes of litigation and strife will be avoided simply through a new spirit, without being vouchsafed a single set of mechanics for that new spirit save a mysterious entity called "the concordat". That is not provided for in any way in the Bill.

There is every reason for the Committee to look at new clause 36 as a probing measure, which is how our friends in Plaid Cymru once described another new clause. It seeks to elicit from the Government the slightest concrete example of how they will engender this supposed spirit of amity and avoid what, despite the evident smiles of Government Front-Bench spokesmen, I confidently predict will lead to the Government's misery in the years ahead. That will happen as the predictions of litigation are seen to be true rather than merely hypothetical, and as the Government find themselves unable to deal with that because the courts have taken over from elected representatives.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I oppose the new clause. The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is quite wrong. The functions of the National Assembly for Wales will be entirely different from the functions of this place. The assembly will operate on a committee system and everybody will have an important role in executing the functions that the assembly decides. In this place there is much hot air and very little else.

How many amendments have been accepted by the Government? There might have been one or two but, generally, decisions are made not in the Chamber but in the ministerial corridors or across the road in Whitehall. This is the place for talk and the hon. Member for West Dorset seeks to transfer talking to the assembly. I do not think that we want too much of that in Wales. We can certainly talk, but we want decisions as well.

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Marek: I intend to be brief, so I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman and then quickly finish my speech.

Mr. Letwin: Was the hon. Gentleman here when we conclusively showed, and I think that the Secretary of State admitted, that it was within the scope of the powers of each of the Committees to which the hon. Gentleman so lovingly refers, to delegate its entire power to a Secretary who would be a de facto member of the Cabinet? If that is the case, does the hon. Gentleman think that there will be the slightest difference between this place and the assembly to the extent to which this Chamber is a talking shop? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Secretaries would be able to wage war on this place and on the Government through the courts?

Dr. Marek: They may wish to wage war, and rightly so, but I do not think that that is the issue. It would be wrong for all the functions of a Committee to be delegated to a Secretary. I have reasonable confidence that that will not happen because of the committee system that is envisaged for the assembly.

Mr. Letwin: I do not know why the hon. Gentleman has that confidence. If he reads Hansard he will see that the Secretary of State admitted that the Bill contains powers for each Committee to do precisely what I have described.

Dr. Marek: I have lived in Wales for a long time and I understand what will happen. The hon. Gentleman can take it from me that there will be far more co-operation and committee work in the assembly than there is here because there is none in this place. That is the problem. I accept that what the hon. Gentleman outlines may happen to some degree, although I hope that it will not. If it does, the new clause would simply add to the problem. The last thing that anybody in Wales and many hon. Members with a different rigour about them and a different purpose in life want to see is time wasting, talking for hours on end in an assembly that ought to be deciding important matters for the Welsh people. I hope that the Minister, although perhaps not for the reasons that I have enunciated, does not give way on the new clause.

Mr. Win Griffiths: This has been an interesting debate and I thank the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) for moving the new clause. Under clause 32 of the Bill, the Secretary of State has to consult the assembly on the Government's legislative programme. Clause 75 entitles the Secretary of State to attend and participate in the assembly's debates. The new clause goes much wider than that because it seeks to create a sort of Welsh assembly grand committee in which anyone who has been elected to the assembly or to this place can join in the fun. It takes only two or three seconds to realise that such a proposal is totally impractical. We would have to ensure, first, that we virtually doubled the size of the assembly's chamber, because it would be disastrous—we would never hear the end of it—if 40 Members of the Assembly turned up and there were no places for them.

We must realise also that hon. Members and Members of the Assembly will have completely different responsibilities. As an hon. Member who does not intend to be a Member of the Assembly, I foresee no good purpose being served by my trying to rush between London and south Wales to participate in assembly debates on matters in which Welsh hon. Members will have a full role in this place.

[Mr. Win Griffiths]

The assembly could perhaps pass on to hon. Members its papers and proceedings. If hon. Members want to spend time dealing with those, it will be up to them. However, I do not think that the new clause would assist in helping the assembly to perform its job effectively.

The directly elected Members of the Assembly and hon. Members will also return to the same constituency parties. I am quite sure that that is the place where co-operative relations might develop. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for North Essex will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Evans: I am rather disappointed by that reply. Although new clause 36 is only a probing measure, we tabled it not only because it mirrors clause 75 but because it would include our desire to provide Welsh hon. Members with the same opportunities as the Secretary of State for Wales to attend the assembly's main proceedings and functions—although not to attend its Committees or sub-committees. The new clause certainly does not propose that Welsh hon. Members should be allowed a vote in the assembly's proceedings.

We thought that the new clause would be an ideal opportunity to provide an assembly that will shortly be born with the wealth of experience of Members of Parliament representing Welsh constituencies, some of whom have served well the House for many years.

Mr. Ron Davies: Name them.

Mr. Evans: I am too embarrassed to name them, because of those I would exclude rather than those I might include.

Some very experienced hon. Members represent Welsh constituencies. The Minister said—it was almost a criticism—that hon. Members, unless they represent regions, would serve exactly the same constituencies as Members of the Assembly. That is absolutely correct. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) said, the new clause would allow a dialogue between hon. Members—with their knowledge and insight of what is happening in this place—and Members of the Assembly, and would allow Welsh hon. Members to participate fully in the assembly's major debates, thereby enriching and enlightening those debates.

Mr. Öpik: In the spirit of what the hon. Gentleman is trying to achieve, would it not be more sensible to invite Members of the Assembly to Westminster when we are debating Welsh issues—rather than to clog up the assembly's business with lots of questions from hon. Members?

Mr. Evans: It would be a fine thing if, as we look forward to our St. David's day debate, we could debate Welsh issues the day after St. David's day. However, I think that we will all have to travel to Cardiff or to Swansea or to wherever the Welsh assembly will be sited to participate in Welsh affairs.

Hon. Members would not attend the assembly's debates on a daily basis. They have work and functions at Westminster, for which they will have to prepare. They will also have their constituency work, and want to participate in our debates in the Chamber and in Committees at Westminster. However, on some occasions they may want to participate, particularly in debates involving their constituencies. They would not have the opportunity to vote or to participate in the Committee or Sub-Committee stage. I was rather hoping that the Minister might have been as generous as he was in respect of a previous new clause, but I understand that that is not to be, so I leave it to my hon. Friend formally to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 39

ROLE OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

'(1).— The subordinate legislation procedures must include provision for ensuring that, before a draft of a statutory instrument containing Assembly general subordinate legislation is laid before the Assembly, the draft is—

(a) submitted to the parliamentary Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments ("the Committee"), and

(b) approved by the Committee without adverse comment.

(2) When any draft is submitted to the Committee under this section, the Committee shall report within a reasonable period as to whether it approves the draft without adverse comment.

(3) Adverse comment on a draft shall only be made by the Committee on any of the grounds (so far as applicable) on which the Committee is empowered to draw a statutory instrument to the special attention of either House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Jenkin.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

10.15 pm

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

All statutory instruments laid before Parliament are considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, composed of Members of both Houses and usually chaired by an Opposition Member. Its remit is to focus upon technical rather than policy matters and to ensure that draft subordinate legislation conforms with the primary legislation from which it derives. It might ask, for instance, whether the Minister who made the order was acting within his powers or whether the drafting was defective. It is not a political Committee and it does not consider political issues; it performs a valuable task in scrutinising the thousands of pieces of legislation that Ministers produce and that never cross the consciousness of the vast majority of right hon. and hon. Members.

The new clause would require the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments to consider any draft subordinate legislation before it was considered by the assembly simply for the purpose of ensuring that the legislation was technically appropriate and would achieve what Ministers had intended. If the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments reported adversely, the draft could not become law. It would then be a simple matter of the statutory instrument in question being amended or revised so that it could be passed by the Committee and the assembly. It could then become law.

The new clause is not designed to limit the political powers of the assembly; it is simply a safeguard to ensure that the statutory instruments that it considers conform with the primary Acts of Parliament from which they derive so that the scope for getting into a muddle about legislation is considerably reduced.

Mr. Livsey: I am sure that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) is proposing the new clause from the best possible motives, but we see certain disadvantages stemming from it. In spite of what the hon. Gentleman said, it would certainly create more bureaucracy that would slow up decision making and reduce the effectiveness of the assembly. We believe that it takes away some of what little power the assembly will have.

We should like to know the definition of "a reasonable period". The Conservative interpretation of the word "reasonable" has not always inspired confidence—and I am putting that gently. The new clause opens up a number of ways by which statutory instruments could be delayed and in the process it would tend to reduce the powers of the assembly.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am grateful for the opportunity to address the issue. I welcome the new clause tabled by my hon. Friends on the Front Bench, as I recognise that there are still many grey areas in the likely relationship between the Welsh assembly and Westminster on the scrutiny of statutory instruments. The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, which I chair, has raised the issue with the Leader of the House. I am grateful for the reply that I received today, which says that the issue is still under consideration and that a full response will be forthcoming as soon as possible. We hope that the memorandum that the Leader of the House has promised to issue with the Welsh Office will set out the Government's position in detail. They have not done so to date.

The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has three main concerns: first, arrangements for co-operation between it and its counterpart in the Welsh assembly, particularly over joint instruments, which, under the Bill as drafted, will be made jointly by Ministers of the Crown and the assembly; secondly, the potential for conflict between the two Committees over similar instruments laid before the assembly and Parliament; and thirdly, the scrutiny of instruments derived from European obligations.

The new clause would give the JCSI more powers over Welsh legislation than it currently has over United Kingdom instruments. Many hon. Members have argued for a long time that it should have more powers. In a sense, the new clause is a step in the right direction. However, the Government are not currently required to act if the Committee criticises an instrument. Making our adverse comment on an instrument sufficient to stop it in its tracks would be a major change. That is not the only solution, but it would be one way to focus attention on the scrutiny of delegated legislation, which is too often neglected.

That illustrates how the role of the JCSI must be considered when planning arrangements for the scrutiny of secondary legislation in the context of the Welsh assembly and the Scottish Parliament. It cannot be left to chance after the assembly has begun to work. If it is, the situation will be chaotic. That will be in the interests neither of Wales nor of the United Kingdom Parliament. I am pleased to see the Secretary of State nodding about that. Potential areas of confusion and difficulty must be identified and solutions found. The JCSI will continue to press on that, but it will also co-operate in any way that it can with the assembly, once established.

I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply. It is a great pity that the Government have not been able to address the issue earlier in the passage of the Bill. It touches on many vital issues. The Committee checks the legality of a good deal of legislation. It is a pity that the House has not been able to look in detail at the Government's proposals. In fact, it has not had any proposals to look at.

I exhort the Secretary of State to talk to the Leader of the House and to give us the Government's position face up, so that we can consider it. That must happen before the Bill goes to another place.

Mr. Grieve: I join my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) in his comments on the new clause and the way in which statutory instruments are subjected to scrutiny. I also have the pleasure of serving on the Joint Committee.

The issue is not a tug of war for power between the House of Commons and the assembly. It is a question of the absolute necessity of maintaining a degree of conformity of practice and drafting in the way in which statutory instruments are dealt with, whether in Wales or England.

Scotland has a separate legal system and it will have a separate Parliament. I accept that the situation there is bound to be different, even though there will clearly also have to be considerable co-ordination. None the less, we are to continue to have a common legal system in this country—which is England and Wales. As long as that is so, it is essential that subordinate legislation, whether created in Cardiff or wherever else the assembly may sit, or in this place, should be drafted in a way that does not give rise to problems.

We also ought to bear in mind that we in this House are privileged to have a body of expertise in the Speaker's Counsel and assistants to the Speaker's Counsel on the way in which subordinate legislation is drafted.

I endorse every word that my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth said about the fact that the role of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments is insufficient to meet the amount of legislation that is coming through by statutory instrument. It is also insufficient to scrutinise and check as one would wish some of the gobbledegook to which we are subjected. The new clause provides an opportunity to put our house in order on the way in which both the Welsh assembly and the House proceed with statutory instruments.

I hope that the Minister and the Secretary of State will bear those points in mind. This is really a non-partisan issue. It is a question of ensuring that, when the assembly is introducing statutory instruments in 10 years' time in order to achieve exactly the same effect as those being introduced here, we do not end up with the ludicrous situation of such statutory instruments being different in content and legal interpretation. That could happen; there is no adequate mechanism to prevent it.

Regardless of whether the Government are prepared to accept new clause 39, I ask that we are given some adequate replies on the way in which the matter will be dealt with. It will be interesting to know where, for instance, expertise will be found immediately to provide advice to the assembly when it is set up.

Mr. Ron Davies: In Wales.

Mr. Grieve: It may be in Wales, but it will still have to be found. It is likely that a degree of co-ordination with expertise available in the House will be required.

Mr. Letwin: At the risk of sending the Secretary of State to sleep—he is clearly near to the point of quiescence—I should like to go slightly beyond what my hon. Friends have said.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Not beyond the new clause.

Mr. Letwin: Certainly not.

What is proposed in new clause 39 is not in any way surprising. What is surprising is that there is no clause equivalent to its effect in the Bill. Clauses 59 and 60 set up a system which, in the absence of new clause 39, yet further intensifies—the Secretary of State and his colleagues may by now have noticed that this has been a theme of mine in this Committee—the potential for litigation. That goes to the heart of the Bill; new clause 39 is profound in its implications.

Surprisingly, there is no check other than that proposed by new clause 39 or some substitute for it on the Welsh assembly's interpretation of its own powers to engage in subordinate legislation—other than, of course, the courts and ultimately the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Clauses 59 and 60 are so structured as precisely to permit a majority of the assembly to constitute a majority of the statutory instruments Committees, which could decide to legitimate, or appear to legitimate, as a piece of subordinate legislation an action that was entirely ultra vires. If new clause 39 is not accepted, the Bill will contain no limit on that.

Ministers have assured us—indeed, it is part of the essence of their argument—that they are establishing a structure that permits the Welsh assembly to engage only in subordinate legislation. That is a fine phrase, but if it is rendered meaningless by repeated decisions of the relevant Committee of the Welsh assembly that items that are clearly primary in intent and would not, in this House, qualify as subordinate are nevertheless subordinate, that can be challenged within the structure of the Bill without new clause 39 only through the courts and ultimately in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. New clause 39 would rescue the Secretary of State and his colleagues from a manifest lacuna in the Bill and I should have thought that, far from giggling themselves into a pleasant pre-nuptial sleep with the Bill—[Interruption.]—I stress, with the Bill, they should be grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends for tabling an amendment that rescues them from that lacuna and fills it so admirably.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I cannot go for a pre-nuptial sleep, but I have been looking forward to sleeping and I have to admit that the debate was pushing me towards that state, but occasionally awaking me with horror at what I was hearing.

Paragraphs 4.22 and 4.27 of the White Paper made it clear that the assembly would have its own procedures for formulating and approving subordinate legislation. Those are set out in part III of the Bill. Following the precedent of section 75 of the Wales Act 1978, clause 43—I am surprised no one referred to this—provides for parliamentary procedures generally to cease to apply to subordinate legislation made by the assembly. The assembly will be an elected body able to make its own subordinate legislation and it will be directly accountable to the people of Wales for its actions.

In the Government's view it would be inappropriate for all the assembly's subordinate legislation to have to be referred to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. Clause 59 establishes a subordinate legislation Scrutiny Committee whose role will be analogous to that of the Joint Committee, but there is one major and important difference and I hope that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) will accept that it is an improvement. Whereas the Joint Committee's evaluation of a statutory instrument often takes place after the instrument has been made and laid before Parliament, the assembly's Scrutiny Committee will perform its functions before the formal making of the instrument. Indeed, the effect of clause 65(5)(a), subject to clause 66, is that the assembly may not make any general subordinate legislation without having before it a report on the draft from its Scrutiny Committee.

Mr. Grieve: I do not disagree with any of that—it is an improvement on the House's procedure for the scrutiny of subordinate legislation—but the key question is whether the Minister agrees that a great deal of the subordinate legislation will, of necessity, be identical in intent to that which will be passed by the House. How, for the sake of legal clarity and the maintenance of conformity, are we to retain parity of wording? If that is not regarded as important, will the Minister explain why it is not?

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman may be getting rather exercised because of the desperation he has felt in meetings of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. He needs to bear in mind that the National Assembly for Wales will be serviced by civil servants currently in the Welsh Office and from other parts of the United Kingdom who want to be a part of this exciting new project. When scrutinising statutory instruments, a wealth of experience will be available to help Members of the Assembly judge what the best wording will be. I do not think that we need to get over-worried about that, although I can see why the hon. Gentleman finds it easy to become exercised about such matters when serving on the Joint Committee deep in the bowels of this place.

Mr. Tredinnick: My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) has raised a valid point. I want to draw to the Committee's attention a problem that it has not addressed—European legislation. Although a number of learned counsel advise the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, it is difficult to ensure that the instruments conform to the requirements of the European Parliament and European legislation. Having scrutinised these instruments for some time, I am worried about how we can ensure a proper interface between legislative bodies so that there is no difference in the legality of instruments in England and in Wales.

Mr. Griffiths: I think that I have got the drift of the hon. Gentleman's argument. I appreciate that, as Chairman of the Joint Committee, he has particular concerns and is deeply enmeshed in all the difficulties that that Committee faces, but he should remember that Members of the Welsh assembly will be served by civil servants. If Members feel that there is a tricky problem with European legislation or something else, they may ask how the issue is dealt with in the House of Commons. I am confident that people will apply their common sense to all these issues, about which we can become far too worried.

Clause 60 provides for the assembly's Scrutiny Committee to be chaired by a member of a minority party and prevents the assembly Secretaries from being members of it. We believe that that gives us good internal audit—the assembly's secondary legislation will be properly scrutinised.

The memorandums to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments about the assembly's subordinate legislation procedures will be forthcoming shortly and I hope that they will allay all the fears that have been expressed. Given that, I hope that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to the Minister for the trouble he has taken in responding to the motion. I was interested to hear that my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), as Chairman of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, has discussed these matters with the Leader of the House and others.

I do not want to sound a sour note, but it is rather typical of our proceedings that information has trickled out, sometimes even after the event. It would have been nice to have such a memorandum before this debate. I accept that the debate started 20 minutes early, but I do not expect that we shall see the memorandum tonight. Will the Minister assure us that the Leader of the House will issue the memorandum before Report so that we can debate the issues that arise if we so choose?

Mr. Win Griffiths: I understand that the memorandum is close to completion. We shall certainly make it available to hon. Members as soon as possible. I cannot make an absolute commitment on timing, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that it will be available very soon.

Mr. Jenkin: I wonder whether the Minister could make representations to the Leader of the House about the memorandum. In the spirit of the age and of the new politics, which the Minister clearly espouses for the assembly, I take him to mean that we will see the memorandum as soon as possible and probably before Report. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Schedule 1

Forestry Commissioners

Separate exercise of functions in relation to Wales

1.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order make provision for securing—

(a) the separate exercise in relation to Wales of functions of the Forestry Commissioners, and

(b) the exercise of functions by the Forestry Commissioners in relation to Wales free from so much of any requirements as would oblige them to have regard to circumstances outside Wales or to interests other than those of Wales.

(2) An order under this paragraph may include provisions in the form of amendments or repeals of the Forestry Act 1967 or any other enactment.

(3) The functions of the Forestry Commissioners—

(a) may be exercised in relation to Wales whether or not they are exercised in relation to England or Scotland, and

(b) may be exercised differently in relation to Wales on the one hand and England or Scotland on the other.

2.—(1) This paragraph applies where a function of the Forestry Commissioners to make any subordinate legislation is exercised by the making of a statutory instrument containing only provision relating to Wales.

(2) Any relevant Parliamentary procedural provision within section 43(3)(a), (b) or (c) which relates to the function shall not have effect in relation to the exercise of the function.

(3) Instead (but subject to sub-paragraph (4)), the subordinate legislation shall not be made unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing it has been laid before and approved by the Assembly.

(4) But the subordinate legislation may be made without compliance with sub-paragraph (3) if the Forestry Commissioners determine that, in the particular circumstances, it is not reasonably practicable to comply with that sub-paragraph.

(5) If the subordinate legislation is made without compliance with sub-paragraph (3)—

(a) the statutory instrument containing it shall be laid before the Assembly after it is made, and

(b) any Assembly member shall be entitled to move, within the period of forty working days (construed in accordance with section 66(7)) beginning with the day on which the instrument is laid before the Assembly, that the subordinate legislation be revoked.

(6) If, pursuant to a motion made within that period, the Assembly resolves that the subordinate legislation be revoked, the resolution revokes it.

(7) The provision imposing or conferring the function of making the subordinate legislation includes power to make any provision which appears appropriate in consequence of its revocation by the resolution.

(8) Neither the passing of a resolution under sub-paragraph (6) revoking any subordinate legislation nor the making of an order under sub-paragraph (7) in consequence of the revocation—

(a) affects the validity of anything done under the subordinate legislation before its revocation, or

(b) prevents the making of new subordinate legislation.

Status of Commissioners and staff

3. Nothing in section (Forestry Commissioners' finances) or this Schedule affects the status of the Forestry Commissioners as a government department or the status of the officers and servants appointed or employed by them.

Receipts

4.—(1) Any sums received by the Forestry Commissioners—

(a) under section (Forestry Commissioners' finances), or

(b) (subject to sub-paragraphs (2) and (3)) in respect of any transactions carried out by them in the exercise of any of their functions in relation to Wales, shall be applied by them towards meeting their expenditure on the exercise of their functions in relation to Wales.

(2) The Treasury may direct that any sums within sub-paragraph (1)(b) which are, or are of a description, specified in the direction shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

(3) The Assembly may direct that any sums within sub-paragraph (1)(b) which are, or are of a description, specified in the direction shall be paid to the Assembly.

(4) A direction under sub-paragraph (3) may be varied or revoked by a direction under sub-paragraph (2) (as well as by another direction under sub-paragraph (3)).

Accounts

5.—(1) The Forestry Commissioners shall keep proper accounting records relating to their Welsh finances.

(2) In this Schedule references to the Welsh finances of the Forestry Commissioners are to—

(a) sums within paragraph 4(1) received by them, and

(b) expenditure by them on the exercise of their functions in relation to Wales.

(3) The Forestry Commissioners shall, for each financial year of the Assembly, prepare accounts relating to their Welsh finances in accordance with directions given to them by the Treasury.

(4) The directions which the Treasury may give under sub-paragraph (3) include, in particular, directions as to—

(a) the information to be contained in the accounts and the manner in which it is to be presented,

(b) the methods and principles in accordance with which the accounts are to be prepared, and

(c) the additional information (if any) that is to accompany the accounts.

Audit

6.—(1) The accounts prepared by the Forestry Commissioners under paragraph 5 for any financial year of the Assembly shall be submitted by them to the Auditor General for Wales no later than five months after the end of that financial year.

(2) The Auditor General for Wales shall—

(a) examine and certify any accounts submitted to him under this paragraph, and

(b) no later than four months after the accounts are submitted to him, lay before the Assembly a copy of them as certified by him together with his report on them.

(3) In examining any accounts submitted to him under this paragraph, the Auditor General for Wales shall, in particular, satisfy himself that the expenditure to which the accounts relate has been incurred lawfully and in accordance with the authority which governs it.

Accounting officer

7.—(1) The Treasury shall designate one of the Forestry Commissioners or an officer of the Forestry Commissioners as the Forestry Commissioners' accounting officer for Wales.

(2) The person designated as the Forestry Commissioners' accounting officer for Wales shall have, in relation to the Welsh finances of the Forestry Commissioners and to accounts relating to the Welsh finances of the Forestry Commissioners, the responsibilities which are from time to time specified by the Treasury.

(3) In this paragraph references to responsibilities include in particular—

(a) responsibilities in relation to the signing of accounts,

(b) responsibilities for the propriety and regularity of finances, and

(c) responsibilities for the economy, efficiency and effectiveness with which the resources of the Forestry Commissioners are used in discharging their functions in relation to Wales.

(4) The responsibilities which may be specified under this paragraph include responsibilities owed to—

(a) the Assembly or the Audit Committee, or

(b) the House of Commons or its Committee of Public Accounts.

Examinations into use of resources

8.—(1) The Auditor General for Wales may carry out examinations into the economy, efficiency and effectiveness with which the Forestry Commissioners have used their resources in discharging their functions in relation to Wales.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) shall not be construed as entitling the Auditor General for Wales to question the merits of the policy objectives of the Forestry Commissioners.

(3) In determining how to exercise his functions under this paragraph, the Auditor General for Wales shall take into account the views of the Audit Committee as to the examinations which he should carry out under this paragraph.

(4) The Auditor General for Wales may lay before the Assembly a report of the results of any examination carried out by him under this paragraph.

(5) The Auditor General for Wales and the Comptroller and Auditor General may co-operate with, and give assistance to, each other in connection with the carrying out of examinations in respect of the Forestry Commissioners under this paragraph or section 6 of the National Audit Act 1983 (economy etc. examinations).

Examinations by the Comptroller and Auditor General

9.—(1) For the purpose of enabling him to carry out examinations into, and report to Parliament on, the Welsh finances of the Forestry Commissioners, the Comptroller and Auditor General—

(a) shall have a right of access at all reasonable times to all such documents in the custody or under the control of the Forestry Commissioners, or of the Auditor General for Wales, as he may reasonably require for that purpose, and

(b) shall be entitled to require from any person holding or accountable for any of those documents any assistance, information or explanation which he reasonably thinks necessary for that purpose.

(2) The Comptroller and Auditor General shall—

(a) consult the Auditor General for Wales, and

(b) take into account any relevant work done or being done by the Auditor General for Wales, before he acts in reliance on sub-paragraph (1) or carries out an examination in respect of the Forestry Commissioners under section 6 of the National Audit Act 1983 (economy etc. examinations).

Reports

10.—(1) The Forestry Commissioners shall, no later than such time after the end of each financial year of the Assembly as the Assembly directs, make a report in such form as the Assembly directs about the exercise of the Forestry Commissioners' functions in relation to Wales during that financial year.

(2) The Forestry Commissioners shall lay before the Assembly any report made under sub-paragraph (1) and the Assembly shall publish it.

Interpretation

11. References in this Schedule to the Welsh finances of the Forestry Commissioners shall be construed in accordance with paragraph 5(2).'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Clause 144

ORDERS AND DIRECTIONS

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move amendment No. 513, in page 67, line 6, leave out from 'applies' to end of line 27 and insert

'to all orders under this Act.'.

The amendment is essentially probing; it is designed to give the Government the opportunity to explain the purpose of the clause. We have already heard that the Government are most unhappy that this Parliament should have any scrutiny over anything that has been devolved to the Welsh assembly. The clause says:

"No order . . . shall be made unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing it has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament."

The clause then lists a large number of exceptions. By deleting the exceptions, the amendment would obviously act as a sledgehammer, but it is designed to elicit a response from the Minister. Will he illuminate the Committee on the mechanics and purpose of the clause?

Mr. Collins: The amendment deals with some extremely important matters. As the clause stands, Parliament would not debate, other than in special circumstances, matters relating to the date of the elections; payment under certain circumstances to Members of the Assembly; transfers of property; the role of the Auditor General for Wales; the staff of the Development Board for Rural Wales; and the role of the Welsh Development Agency. Those are important matters. [Interruption.]

The Secretary of State may say that that is devolution—

Mr. Ron Davies: It was not me.

Mr. Collins: Well, another hon. Member must have said—

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. It would help very much if we did not have sedentary interventions, and also if hon. Members did not respond to them.

Mr. Collins: I shall make a point of not doing so, Mr. Lord.

It is important for the Government to put it on the record why they do not intend to permit Parliament to have proper scrutiny of such legislation. It is not good enough to say that it is all a matter of devolution, as if the United Kingdom Parliament no longer had any role. Such important matters need to be discussed in the future, as today.

Mr. Letwin: I have no hesitation in depriving the Secretary of State of his beauty sleep for a little longer to discuss amendment No. 513, which—if anything—my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) undersold. His brilliance in drafting it exceeds his rhetoric. I hope that the Minister who responds to the debate will answer some serious questions about what clause 144, in the absence of the amendment, would achieve.

I wish to direct the Minister's attention to the powers that the Bill will give the Secretary of State to make orders, including those powers in clause 22, which the Secretary of State clearly believes—judging from a remark he made earlier—are qualified by the restrictions in clause 23. However, on Report, we may raise our doubts about whether that clause is sufficiently tightly drafted to have such restrictive effects.

In the absence of amendment No. 513, would clause 144 have the effect that orders transferring additional powers to the Welsh assembly could be passed by the House of Commons by negative resolution, without even 90 minutes of debate? If so, that is a remarkable constitutional departure, which should have been included in the White Paper but was not and should have been described by the Secretary of State but has not been. Clause 144 is a case either of bad drafting—as we have experienced frequently with the Bill—or of intent. I may have mistaken the purport of the clause, but it would be helpful if the Minister elucidated it for the Committee.

How will clause 144 operate in the absence of amendment No. 513? Is not the amendment necessary to force orders made under clause 22, as possibly restricted by clause 23, to be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure? That is the minimum that the House could demand of further transfers of its powers to the Welsh assembly. It is the most extraordinary feature of an ill-conceived Bill that the House should be asked to allow the Secretary of State to transfer its powers to another body by order instead of by primary legislation. That is an aberration.

However, we have passed that point in the Bill and we are considering the effects of clause 144. The very least that any responsible House of Commons could demand of the Secretary of State is that further transfers of its powers should be by affirmative resolution. If I have misunderstood the purport of clause 144, the Minister should explain the situation. If I have correctly understood it, the Minister has not a leg to stand on unless he is willing to accept amendment No. 513.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Clause 144 seems to have exercised the minds of Conservative Members; they have tabled the Little Big Horn amendment in a desperate last stand, to prevent the whole purpose of the Bill from being achieved. The Bill is about the government of Wales and the devolution of powers to the national assembly. Clause 144 provides that all powers to make orders are to be exercisable by statutory instrument and sets out the required parliamentary procedures for the Secretary of State's order-making powers. Orders in Council are already required to be exercised by statutory instrument under the Statutory Instruments Act 1946.

Clause 144 sets out the parliamentary procedures that will apply to orders made under the Bill. More significant orders, especially those exercising the so-called Henry VIII powers, are to be subject to laying in draft and affirmative resolution. More technical matters are to be subject only to the negative resolution process. That approach is in accordance with long-standing practice under other statutes, and I am surprised that Conservative Members object in this instance.

Mr. Letwin: The Minister may implicitly have admitted what I was asking about, but will he clarify the matter? Is he therefore agreeing that, under clause 144 as it stands, in the absence of amendment No. 513, it would be possible to make orders under clause 22, by negative resolution?

Mr. Griffiths: Clause 22(4)(a) provides that the affirmative resolution procedure will apply to all Orders in Council under clause 22. If the hon. Gentleman looks at clause 22, he will see that all Orders in Council will go through the affirmative resolution procedure.

Mr. Letwin: That is the issue that led me to the conclusion that there must be a failure of drafting; will the Minister comment? Clause 22(4)(a) does not appear to have the effect that he described. It appears directly to contradict clause 144. Which will prevail, and why does he imagine that clause 22(4)(a) will prevail?

Mr. Griffiths: I do not believe that there is any contradiction, because this part of the Bill refers to an order made by the Secretary of State, to which clause 144 applies; and clause 22 refers to an Order in Council. The two are different. Given the time of the night, and as there are other things to do before we conclude our proceedings, perhaps we should conduct some correspondence to settle the matter if there is any need to do so.

Mr. Jenkin: May I clarify that the Minister is saying that there is a difference between "make an order" under clause 144(1), where it says,

"Any power of the Secretary of State or the Assembly under this Act to make an order", and an Order in Council, and that therefore he is satisfied that an Order in Council would not be covered by clause 144? I believe that that would answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin).

Mr. Griffiths: I am satisfied that the two are mutually exclusive and deal with separate issues, but as these are difficult and complex technical matters, I am fully prepared to look at the matter again and let hon. Members know well before Report, so that we may return to it if there is a problem. However, I am pretty confident that it is as I have said.

As amendment No. 513 is phrased, it would require us to debate in the House and approve the transfer to the assembly of specific property, rights or liabilities; the purposes for which the office of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools in Wales is to be treated as a Government Department; and the transfer of staff to the new Welsh Development Agency. A load of technical things would be caught by the amendment, so I hope that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) will withdraw it.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who extended the debate in a most interesting and informative fashion, and I am grateful to the Minister for replying. I look forward to the correspondence to which the Minister refers, if there is a need for it.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 145

INTERPRETATION

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move amendment No. 516, in page 67, line 41, after 'Treasury', insert—

' "Secretary of State" means the Secretary of State for Wales.'.

This is a short amendment, but no less important for that. The amendment seeks, where the words "Secretary of State" appear in the Bill—as they do frequently—to substitute the words "Secretary of State for Wales". That arises from several questions that have been asked in these proceedings, to which we have not received totally satisfactory answers.

I may say that I am not seeking at this stage to find out from the Secretary of State by way of the amendment whether he intends to be that Secretary of State or whether he will have moved on to other matters in Cardiff, Swansea or wherever it might be. He has shown an unnatural and unaccustomed coyness on the matter, and he has been sufficiently embarrassed today for me not to press him further.

The Under-Secretary has just said that this is the Government of Wales Bill and that the Government are seeking devolution. It seems extraordinary, therefore, that we should leave in the Bill a provision that could suggest that what had been done by the Secretary of State for Wales in the past could be done in future by any Secretary of State.

My understanding is that the term Secretary of State can be applied to anybody who carries that title in the Government. Fifteen members of the Cabinet are described as Secretaries of State. Each of them would fit the nomenclature in the Bill and would be able to exercise the powers given to the Secretary of State. Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer also a Secretary of State for these purposes, and is that true also of the Chief Secretary, the President of the Council and the Lord Privy Seal?

Under the Bill, various powers are to be exercised by the Secretary of State. Under clause 3, he deals with elections; under clause 16, he makes the early determinations in relation to allowances for Members of the Assembly; under clause 22, he lays the draft transfer of functions order; under clause 32, consultations on legislation are to take place under the auspices of the Secretary of State; under clause 80, which is extremely important, he determines the sums paid to the assembly for it to spend; and under clause 141 he has the draconian power to amend primary legislation by order.

If that is all in the hands of the Secretary of State for Wales, we can understand the position, but my fear is that—

Mr. Collins: My right hon. Friend has skipped one clause that immensely strengthens his case: clause 75, which states that "The Secretary of State for Wales shall be entitled to attend and participate in any proceedings of the Assembly."

If other references to the Secretary of State mean the Secretary of State for Wales, why does clause 75 contain that specific reference?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. It underlines the fact that my anxieties are well founded. We might well find that no Secretary of State for Wales is involved in determining the sums to be given to the assembly, and that that will be decided by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I want to clarify the matter by inserting the words

"Secretary of State for Wales".

If that is what is meant, there can be no harm in doing that. If that is not what is meant, we must fear for the position of the Secretary of State.

I recall that under the Stormont provisions relating to Northern Ireland, there was no Secretary of State. The duties of the Secretary of State were handled by a Minister of State in the Home Office as one of three portfolios. It would not be in the interests of Wales if that happened in this case, and if all the business was conducted by other Secretaries of State.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman, who has had considerable experience in government, should have bothered to move the amendment. As the Committee knows, the Bill confers many functions and duties on the Secretary of State, rather than on a named office holder. That simply reflects the modern parliamentary drafting practice of not naming the individual ministerial offices in statute unless absolutely necessary.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) drew attention to the fact that clause 75 refers specifically to the Secretary of State for Wales. Among all the Ministers of the Crown, only the Secretary of State for Wales will have the right to attend and participate in the debates of the National Assembly for Wales. In all other references, it is assumed, as in all other legislation, that the matter involves the Department of which that person is head.

I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not refer, for example, to clauses 23 and 87. That would have spoilt his argument. Those clauses refer to the Minister of the Crown when the intended meaning is not the Secretary of State. I hope that, after that brief explanation, it is clear that, when the term "Secretary of State" is used on its own, it means the Secretary of State for Wales. When we need to, we make it clear that it is only the Secretary of State for Wales. When the legislation applies to any other Minister, it is a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. Ancram: When we argued about devolution some months ago, we made it clear that we feared that the role of the Secretary of State for Wales would become so otiose that the position would disappear. Judging from the Minister's comments tonight, it is clear that the Secretary of State for Wales will have very limited functions, which will be designated in the Bill. I do not think that that bodes well for Wales. However, I do not think that I shall succeed in having the amendment accepted at this stage. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Community Hospitals

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Clelland.]

11.1 pm

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): I am grateful for this opportunity to introduce a short debate on the very important subject of community hospitals. Community hospitals, as against local general district hospitals, have in recent years developed their own distinct role, ethos and dynamic. Linked to general practitioners' services and to other local health and social services, they provide a clear, specific and well-defined pattern of hospital services throughout the country. It is therefore all the more strange that their future should now be under threat.

There are 457 community hospitals in the United Kingdom, which provide approximately 10,000 beds—and several of my hon. Friends who are in the Chamber represent those hospitals. I am informed by the Association of Community Hospitals that 16 of those hospitals are now directly threatened with closure—as it happens, four of them are in Cornwall and four are in Norfolk—and that the continued existence of many others is under serious review.

Both the challenges and problems facing community hospitals are in no way specific to Worcestershire. However, there are reasons—not simply because I am the Member of Parliament for West Worcestershire—for using the case of the Worcestershire hospitals as an example of a more general problem.

Evesham hospital—which used to be in my constituency, but, following boundary changes, is now in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), who has been most assiduous in espousing its cause—is one of half a dozen or so community hospitals listed as nationally recognised models of good practice. While in the marginal seat of Worcester during the general election campaign, the Prime Minister promised to speed up the building of a new acute Worcester infirmary, and so put into question the future existence of the satellite community hospitals, two of which—Pershore and Malvern—are in my constituency.

Although the health authority has recently announced that closure of the Worcestershire community hospitals is not an option, the strains on the funding of the county's hospital services has left question marks, and a good deal of scepticism surrounds the announcement. Any cutting back of the support services on which community hospitals depend, or of the number of beds and services provided by hospitals, will threaten the viability of hospitals, especially the smaller ones, such as Malvern and Pershore. It is in that context that I raise points about community hospitals in general.

Community hospitals exist essentially for two purposes: first, to allow patients to recover from traumatic surgery and medical treatment near their homes and local services, such as those provided by their GPs and physio and occupational therapy, as well as social services, in some cases; and secondly, to provide palliative care for the terminally ill. The ever-present context to all this is a rapidly aging population.

Alongside the need for community-based medical support have been the explosive financial requirements of the high-technology acute specialist hospitals. As life-saving medicine has become more advanced and successful, so in general it has become more expensive. The average bed cost per week in Worcestershire health authority is £2,500 to £3,000. The comparable figure for community hospitals is between £800 and £1,000—roughly a third of the acute hospital costs. Equivalent figures exist throughout the country.

These figures are, of course, non-comparable. High-technology medicine is bound to be much more expensive than recuperative nursing. The problem is that in-patient bed audits show that a large proportion of patients occupying beds in expensive specialist hospitals could easily be transferred more swiftly to the more appropriate community-based hospital.

A recent analysis in Worcestershire revealed that up to 42 per cent. of patients currently occupying an acute hospital bed could be nursed at an alternative health facility. In other words, if patients were sent back to community hospitals in Worcestershire more rapidly than they are at present following major surgery or medical treatment, there could be considerable savings. That is particularly germane in Worcestershire, where the hospital system is running a rapidly growing overdraft, currently standing at some £15 million, with a recurring deficit on present budgets of £8.8 million.

The case for the community hospital is only in part financial. The core philosophy and ethos is rightly different in community and acute hospitals. The acute hospital is primarily concerned with the saving of lives in a medical crisis. Rehabilitation and palliative care, especially for the elderly, are different roles altogether. They are best performed alongside local health and social services.

The danger, and the reason for the debate, is that, in the nature of things, community hospitals throughout the land will be squeezed out by the inexorable, high-profile but expensive onward march of breakthrough technology in life-saving developments in acute hospitals.

No one would argue against pushing out the frontiers of applied medical knowledge. What is true is that, the more successful the advance in medicine, the greater the need for the recuperative work of the GP-led community hospital. As people live longer, due in some measure to the wonders of new technology, so the requirement will grow for nursing care for those who are terminally ill at one end of the spectrum, and for those who are recovering from traumatic medical experiences at the other.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): As my hon. Friend knows, one of the hospitals administered by the Worcestershire health authority is sited in my constituency, in Burford, near Tenbury Wells. In respect of that hospital, the health authority is saying that it believes that there are opportunities to develop Pershore and Tenbury community hospitals in partnership with GPs.

In another part of my constituency, a community hospital has been run in conjunction with fundholding general practitioners. That has led to a vast improvement in the range and quality of services for the local community. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise how important the link is between GPs and community hospitals, and how the advent of fundholding gave an enormous impetus to the improvement in primary health care within local communities.

Sir Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One of the definitions of community hospitals is that they are GP-led. The reforms that the Conservative Government introduced gave a boost to the entire community hospital movement. We are not sure what will emerge in terms of GP practice. We do not know whether they will fund-hold, and what other arrangements will be made. It will be a terrible shame if whatever emerges undermines the community-based, recuperative GP-led service, which the Conservative Government did so much to foster.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): My hon. Friend may be aware that, in my constituency in west Oxfordshire, the Burford community hospital is faced with the threat of imminent closure. I wonder whether my hon. Friend would agree with me that nothing so sadly illustrates the Government's lack of concern for rural communities as the prospect of closure of hospitals such as the Burford community hospital, which play such an important role in rural communities. I shall find only words that express deep regret if the Government do not, as they are proposing to do with village schools, take urgent action to redress the prospect of closures.

Sir Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point, in two respects. First, he has identified yet another community hospital of which I was not aware which is under threat. Secondly, he makes the link between, especially, the smaller community hospitals and rural communities. Both those factors are extremely valuable additions to the case that I am trying to deploy.

Two functions are best provided locally—the palliative and the recuperative. These functions are best provided at the places where people live and where they have ready access to the services of their family doctors and the appropriate complementary rehabilitation services. My hon. Friend makes the strong point that that is especially true of rural areas such as his constituency and mine. The smaller rural hospitals are particularly under threat, where any cut and any removal of beds will make them less viable.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid–Worcestershire): Does my hon. Friend agree that small community hospitals such as the one at Evesham, about which he has spoken, are contributing enormously to the local communities they serve and are capable of developing remarkable expertise of their own? I think especially of the stroke rehabilitative work that is done at Evesham, which is testimony to what community hospitals can achieve. It is a potent example of why they must be saved at all costs.

Sir Michael Spicer: I must not delay the House for too long, but I know the Evesham community hospital well, because it was in the constituency that I represented for 23 years.

My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. If we start cutting, in the case of Evesham, for example, the Macmillan unit would be involved. Such units are funded with voluntary assistance. The moment we start pulling out some of the plugs, the entire edifice is in danger of collapse. Since so much outrage has been expressed by the Conservative party about these matters, there is the worry that the authorities will not confront the problem directly. Instead, they may salami-slice some of the hospitals. That will be particularly serious if small hospitals are involved.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in Worcestershire, the root of the problems and the possibility of cuts, against which he rails, derive from an £8 million overspend that occurred substantially through mismanagement when the Conservative Government were in power, and when the people they appointed to the health authority were not managing it properly? So we now have substantial overspend, and a substantial accumulated deficit. That is the mess that the Government and the people they are appointing are having to sort out.

Sir Michael Spicer: We are rapidly running out of time when that argument can continue to be used. The countryside march yesterday showed that things are changing. We did not have these problems, and we did not have this debate, under the Conservative Administration. The Prime Minister, when he was Leader of the Opposition, came to Worcester for electoral reasons.

Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael Spicer: I shall not give way, as the hon. Gentleman did not give way to me in the debate on fox hunting—that issue has become his trade mark.

Without having thought through the funding implications, the Prime Minister said when he came to Worcester that he would accelerate the building of a new acute hospital. Anyone who has examined the figures will know that that is what has brought this matter to a head, and is the reason why I secured this debate.

Mr. Gill: It may interest my hon. Friend to know that, when the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock) was a parliamentary candidate, he did not blame the health authority. He said that there was a lack of money, and that money was the answer to the problem.

Sir Michael Spicer: That is what Labour Members always say; there is nothing new about that. Labour local authorities also say that more money will do the trick, whereas what is often needed is better management. Most of the problems that are emerging under Labour did not exist under the Conservative Government.

The case for the relatively low-cost community hospital as distinct from the all-purpose, local general hospital, whose days may be numbered, may go by default. It needs to restated, and I am grateful for this opportunity to do so.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) on securing this debate. This is an important issue. Community hospitals excite much local concern in many parts of the country, and have a great deal of local support. It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman has not read the White Paper "The New NHS", which deals with some of these issues in detail.

The hon. Gentleman asked for a clear steer on the direction of Government policy. Community hospitals are valued parts of the local health service in many areas. Patients value them because they tend to deliver services in a friendly and homely way. Our White Paper "The New NHS" sets out a vision of a service in which swift advice and treatment is available as close to home as possible. Community hospitals will be part of that vision in some places.

Dartford is different from Darlington, and it is the job of health authorities to ensure that local services are matched to local need. I thought that the Conservative Government supported that principle. If there has been a dramatic U-turn, I am happy to take an intervention on the issue; otherwise, I shall continue.

The hon. Gentleman is a strong supporter of Malvern community hospital in his constituency, and I understand his concerns. Public consultation on the future of health services across Worcestershire was launched last Monday by Worcestershire health authority with the document "Investing In Excellence". While that public consultation is taking place, it would be wrong for me to either endorse or oppose the preferred option of the Worcestershire health authority.

Different views and different options on the overall strategy for Worcestershire have been appraised by the health authority against a range of criteria, including clinical quality and accessibility. The preferred option is to centralise specialist services on one site—either Worcester or Bromsgrove depending on the specialism—with local access to diagnostic services, out-patient appointments and post-operative rehabilitation. Emergency services would also be available locally, with major trauma cases going to Worcester.

There are, of course, a number of options that the health authority must consider. One of those options—I think it was option seven, which is of most concern to the hon. Gentleman and, perhaps, other hon. Members—would involve integrating acute and community services across the county, with the closure of all community hospitals. Again, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the pros and cons of that wide variety of options while the consultation is in progress. The point is that it illustrates just how difficult the decision will be.

Clearly, only one option will finally be approved, and the criteria that we shall use to assess the issue—if it comes to Ministers—will relate to what is in the best interests of patients.

Mr. Woodward: The Minister makes much of the importance of public consultation. In Oxfordshire, the community health trust has presented two options for the future of community hospitals. Option one is the closure of Burford community hospital; option two is the closure of Burford community hospital. Will the Minister explain just what public consultation means, when both options mean that the hospital is faced with closure?

Mr. Milburn: I will not be drawn into a detailed commentary on each and every consultation that is going on. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well why that is the case. If a local community health council objects to any of the proposals, the objection will end up on my desk, but until it ends up on my desk I must retain a sense of objectivity and impartiality.

Mr. Lock: Community hospitals are important, but in many areas—such as Kidderminster, in my constituency—people are desperate for their general hospitals not to be downgraded to the status of community hospital. Does my hon. Friend understand the strong feelings in Kidderminster about the proposal for the hospital—just before receiving its charter mark—to be reduced to a hospital of 35 beds, one for every 2,600 people, as opposed to the one bed for every 160 people that there is in Evesham? Will he assure the House that, as far as he is concerned, all options will remain open until and unless the matter comes to his desk?

Mr. Milburn: Of course I am aware of my hon. Friend's concerns. He and his colleagues have been to see me about the health authority's consultation proposals. During any consultation, I shall expect to see a full appraisal of the preferred option of the health authority, but it will be open to local communities and their representatives to make representations to the health authority about other options. The health authority will be expected to examine those options—as, indeed, I would, if they came to me.

Mr. Luff: The Minister, who is taking a very fair approach, will recognise that Evesham community hospital serves not just Evesham, but the whole of south Worcestershire. Many people from Worcester, for example, go into Evesham for rehabilitation.

Mr. Milburn: I am aware of the local position. I know that a number of community hospitals serve a number of communities in the Worcestershire health authority area. I also know of the concern in the areas that could be affected if option seven were given the go-ahead. Equally, I am concerned about the anxieties that have been expressed to me by those in Kidderminster and other parts of the county.

These are clearly difficult issues, which will need to be considered carefully. That is why it is important for the health authority to do everything in its power to ensure that there is a full and open debate about the issues during the next few months. I know that the health authority is promoting that consultation through a number of public meetings. I understand that it has also established a freephone helpline and a website. Moreover, views can be sent to the health authority by freepost.

Let me tell hon. Members on both sides of the House that, when difficult decisions must be made, it is important for those representing local communities in all parts of the area covered by the Worcestershire health authority to submit their views. I assure hon. Members that their views will be properly considered by health authorities. Views that are brought to me will also be properly considered.

Sir Michael Spicer: Do the Government have a policy on distinguishing between community hospitals and their development and the old-fashioned district general hospitals?

Mr. Milburn: I am coming to that, and trying to go beyond the boundaries of Worcestershire.

Mr. Michael J. Foster: Before my hon. Friend leaves Worcestershire, perhaps I could ask whether he agrees that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, when Leader of the Opposition, at no time visited Worcester to make the great electoral pledge that we have heard about. Does he further agree that the new hospital that is planned for Worcester springs from medical necessity, and is not the result of some sort of electoral deal?

Mr. Milburn: One of my most pleasing actions as a Health Minister was to give the go-ahead to some new hospitals. I am surprised that some Opposition Members seem to oppose that. I thought that new hospitals were welcome in the national health service. That is certainly what some Opposition Members call for.

The value of community hospitals was recently emphasised in the White Paper that sets out how new primary care trusts will be able to take over the running of community hospitals and other community services to provide a broad range of treatment and care. Precise arrangements will depend on local circumstances, but it is envisaged that, in time, the primary care trust will employ all relevant community health staff and run community hospitals and other community facilities to provide an integrated system of primary and community care. That will allow patients access to an integrated service.

Under the White Paper proposals, primary care groups and trusts will be a focus for better integrating primary and community care services. Clinicians in primary and secondary care will together be able to set quality standards and service protocols so that the patient receives properly integrated programmes of care. By integrating primary care and community health care, we shall bring together health care professionals with many and varied complementary skills. The sharing of skills and expertise in that way will create greater flexibility in the provision of health care services, and will allow general practitioners to use their time more effectively to provide a better service to patients.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Are the Government considering changing the appeals procedure for rural community hospitals to match the one that was announced on Friday for rural primary schools, so that there will be a presumption against closure, and a decision to close will have to be referred to the Secretary of State?

Mr. Milburn: I assure the hon. Gentleman that, in some parts of the country—in rural areas, for example—community hospitals may have an important future role. It is a question of horses for courses. We certainly do not have a single national blueprint that can be applied to all areas. There are differences between rural and urban areas, but not all rural areas are the same. We must have a system that allows proper inspection and an analysis of what is needed in each area.

I hope that all hon. Members share our aim of achieving services that are better attuned to local health needs. The consultations that are going on in Worcestershire and in other areas will allow us to do precisely that.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): In south Lincolnshire, where we face problems similar to those that have been mentioned, the issue is sparsity. The Minister says that different solutions must be applied to different areas. Can he assure us that sparsity will be fully taken into account? It may not always have been fully considered in the past—I do not seek to make a party political point—but can he assure the House and those in rural areas, many of which are represented in the Chamber for the debate, that it will be considered in future?

Mr. Milburn: We must take into account whether any change in local health services will improve care for patients—that is the bottom line, the barometer and the yardstick against which any change or reconfiguration proposal should be judged. There is no exception for community hospitals.

As the hon. Member for West Worcestershire rightly said, with such wide variations in the types of service provided by community hospitals, it would be wrong to attempt to impose a national blueprint from the centre. The centre's role is not to be prescriptive, but to establish clear national standards to help local planners develop services that best meet local needs. As I have said several times, all districts are different, and all have differing needs. The range of services they commission and the various unit types must be determined locally, and by much more than only physical environments.

We want—more importantly, local people in all parts of the United Kingdom want—local services that best meet their local health needs. As I said, there are many possible models for community hospitals, and a variety of factors will determine the right model to suit local circumstances.

A modern national health service—which is what we want—is one that provides high-quality and appropriate services, and has a capital and staff infrastructure that is capable of delivering those services to meet patients' needs in the 21st century. However, no part of health care stands alone: it is an interconnected system, between primary, community and acute services. It simply is not possible artificially to separate one service from another. In all parts of the United Kingdom, we need to give proper consideration to ensuring that the nature of local health services in totality better meets local health needs.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Regional Regeneration

1. Mr. Ian Bruce: If he will make a statement on the closure of the South Dorset economic partnership and the implications of this for the Government's regional regeneration policies. [30620]

The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning (Mr. Richard Caborn): The South Dorset economic partnership is a local delivery organisation. How it operates and decisions about its future are matters for the local partners.

Mr. Bruce: I am sad that the Minister has not thought to acquaint himself with exactly what is happening at the delivery points of Government policy. The Government have expressed their intention to regenerate jobs, particularly where defence jobs are being lost. Surely the South Dorset economic partnership demonstrates that Government policy is not working and that, because the regional development agencies are not providing funds, and the local authorities are not being given sufficient resources to assist, the excellent delivery of the South Dorset economic partnership is failing. Will the Minister please take some action and find out what is happening on the ground floor? By the time that the regional development agency is up and running, there will be no means left to deliver his policies.

Mr. Caborn: We are keeping close contact with Dorset, where I understand that the three local authorities have withdrawn funding from the scheme. They plan to create a new organisation with a wider remit.

Local Government Finance

2. Mr. Gray: What representations he has received on the 1998–99 local government financial settlement. [30622]

The Minister for Local Government and Housing (Ms Hilary Armstrong): The Department received 406 written representations within the deadline for responses. I and other Ministers at the Department also met the Local Government Association and the Association of London Government, delegations from 95 local authorities, and one special interest group during the consultation period.

Mr. Gray: Is the Minister aware that, after the correction of an arithmetical error in the announcement of the revenue support grant for Wiltshire, this year's settlement represents a real cut of 7.2 per cent. which has meant for Chippenham an increase of £75.49 in band D council tax? Are the Government to blame for that increase, or is it the fault of the county council, in which case, will the Minister join me in calling on the four Labour councillors who keep the incompetent Liberal authority in place to withdraw their support?

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman clearly still has the blame mentality. He will know that the previous Government wanted to shift the balance between central and local funding. We have continued that, but it is up to local government to make decisions about the balance between central funding and local taxation.

Mr. Bill O'Brien: Has my hon. Friend received representations from Wakefield—my local authority—about the way in which the formula has reacted against it? Has she also received representations from the West Yorkshire police, who are now saying that there is a deficit in their income from the formula that has been set by council tax funding? As band D properties in West Yorkshire have received a 75p reduction in council tax, there will be a knock-on effect in all other bands and therefore a substantial reduction in revenue for the West Yorkshire police. Will she address that point and investigate the problems?

Ms Armstrong: I am always interested in hearing from colleagues about how the settlement is working in their area. My hon. Friend will know that consultation on this year's settlement has finished, and the House has made a decision. The authorities that he mentioned will have an opportunity to make representations on how we decide on the standard spending assessments for next year. We intend to achieve a more just settlement.

Sir Norman Fowler: May I ask about the position in London? Will the Minister acknowledge that, even after all the changes to distribution that the Government have made, Wandsworth's band D charge next year will be £319 and Westminster's will be £325, while Camden's will be £879 and Greenwich's will be £883? Why, even under this Government's system, do Labour councils come out so expensive?

Ms Armstrong: I am sure that the House will note the difference between that contribution and what the right hon. Gentleman said during the debate on the settlement. We have begun the fairness exercise, but we have not yet completed it.

Mr. Skinner: To ensure fairness, will my hon. Friend take particular note of the fact that, during the 18 years when the Tories were in power, many Tory Members from Derbyshire used to tell Ministers in the House to cut the grant for Derbyshire? They did that for 12 consecutive years. The net result is that we now need a little extra help to achieve fairness. I am being consistent. I called for extra money when the Tories were in power. I do the same now. Will my hon. Friend ensure that help is received?

Ms Armstrong: My hon. Friend reminds us of the comments of the Conservatives during debates on settlements. We have not yet received representations from Derbyshire. When we do, we shall consider them fairly.

Water Treatment Works

3. Mr. Sanders: If he will introduce measures to allow independent public monitoring organisations to gain automatic entry to water treatment works. [30623]

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott) rose—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): I see no reason to provide for additional organisations to monitor water treatment works. Standards of water treatment are extremely high. Water companies must, by law, check that drinking water meets 55 separate standards. It is the job of the drinking water inspectorate to check that companies carry out their quality checks properly.

Mr. Sanders: I thank the Minister for that reply, but it does not answer the question. Private companies are able to stop public bodies, such as the drinking water inspectorate and the Environment Agency, from gaining access to water works. There were problems with the cryptosporidium bug in my constituency in 1995 and more recently in London. Will the Minister look closely at the rights and duties of the public bodies that exist to protect the public's drinking water so as to enable them to inspect water works without prior appointment?

Angela Eagle: We are looking carefully at the fallout from the outbreak of cryptosporidium and the health problems caused in Torbay in 1995, particularly in the light of the subsequent attempt to prosecute the water authority, which failed because the court did not allow as evidence the report of the outbreak control team. We hope to be able to make a statement about that shortly.

Local Government (Best Value)

4. Jane Griffiths: When he expects to publish his consultation document on best value in local government; and if he will make a statement. [30624]

Mr. Prescott: At last; I was so keen to get in.

Today, my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing launched the consultation paper on best value in local services. It takes forward our commitment to introduce a comprehensive regime, which will empower local people and ensure continuous improvement in the performance of local services. The proposals were discussed with local government at the central-local partnership meeting, which I chaired this morning, along with nine members of the Cabinet and Ministers.

Jane Griffiths: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer and welcome the publication of the consultation document. Will he confirm that the purpose of best value is that councils should provide services at the level that residents have the right to expect, and at a price that residents can afford? Does he agree that Reading's Labour council, with its partnership-focused approach, is very well placed to meet the challenge posed by best value?

Mr. Prescott: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. Our approach is about better value and fairer employment.

Mrs. Ballard: The majority of councils are run by the Labour party. The Government, in their White Paper, are rightly wary of councils with large single-party majorities. Does the Secretary of State agree that the best way in which to achieve best value and truly accountable local government is by a fair system of local elections?

Mr. Prescott: Although I am not surprised that the hon. Lady equates everything with a fairer voting system, I think that our proposals for best value are the best way of dealing with the issue.

Mr. Tipping: Will the Deputy Prime Minister ensure that all councils benefit from the experience of best value councils and that good practice is promoted by the Audit Commission and other bodies? Will he particularly consider Newark and Sherwood district council's excellent record of energy efficiency and conservation?

Mr. Prescott: Yes, the Audit Commission has looked at the matters and reported very favourably on local authorities. I endorse a great deal of what it says. We have made it clear in our approach to best value that we want better value and fairer employment. The pilot schemes, of which there are about 40, are under way. The reports from them will make a major contribution to improving standards of service and gaining better value in our local authorities.

Sir Norman Fowler: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that competitive tendering achieved hundreds of millions of pounds of savings to the benefit of the council tax payer? Is not the danger with the new system that has been set out today that it is too bureaucratic, will allow reluctant councils to continue to resist change, and will therefore work directly against the interests of the council tax payer?

Mr. Prescott: It has been acknowledged by all parties that have studied the matter that competitive tendering cost the taxpayer considerably more, as the system was reduced to least cost, least value. The cost to the taxpayer, either through family income supplements or as a result of the resources that were needed, was considerable. Even the private sector, in partnership with local authorities and trade unions, came to the conclusion that the previous system was over-bureaucratic and, in some cases, denied equality of employment in the contracts. That was the result of compulsory competitive tendering. We are seeking to change it.

Regional Development Agencies

5. Mrs. Spelman: What representations he has received from local authorities over the accountability of regional development agencies. [30625]

Mr. Caborn: We received a number of representations from local government about the accountability of regional development agencies. RDAs will be non-departmental public bodies; as such, they will be accountable to Ministers. They will also be required to consult the designated regional chamber, and account for their activities to the chamber.

Mrs. Spelman: Will the Minister assure the House that the new regional development agencies will not remove powers from local government, especially the planning powers envisaged in clauses that were withdrawn in consideration in Committee of the Regional Development Agencies Bill?

Mr. Caborn: The hon. Lady knows that, in Committee, we said that we should look at certain clauses and come back to the House on Report.

Mr. Blizzard: Will not people judge the accountability of a regional development agency by how successful it is in tackling a region's problems? For example, in Lowestoft in my constituency, where unemployment is 9.2 per cent., against a regional average of 3.6 per cent., people are looking forward to the RDA tackling the disparity, which was left unattended for 18 years by the Conservative party. Will my hon. Friend confirm that addressing such disparities will be one of the priorities of RDAs?

Mr. Caborn: My hon. Friend is right. Apart from the Opposition, everybody accepts that there is a need to address the serious structural weaknesses in our eight English regions. To that extent, all the major stakeholders involved in the RDAs will address the issues and will try to bring more employment back to those regions than ever before.

Mr. Yeo: As the Minister will appoint every single member of the RDA boards and will also choose the organisations that are to be designated as the regional chamber, is there not clearly a serious lack of accountability in the structure proposed? Against that background, is it not absolutely extraordinary that every one of the Opposition amendments, which would have required the Minister to consult local authorities about the activities of RDAs, were voted down by the Government?

Mr. Caborn: The Opposition should be the last people to start lecturing the Government about quangos and accountability. We well know that the Conservatives took more powers from local authorities than any other Government in history. We want no lectures from the Opposition on this issue.

Madam Speaker: Mr. Boswell.

Mr. Boswell: Number seven, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Prescott: I think that it is number eight. At least I am right on this one.

Air Quality

8. Mr. Boswell: What plans he has to introduce measures to improve air quality. [30628]

Mr. Prescott: The Government are taking action to improve air quality through the implementation of the national air quality strategy. On 12 February, we announced our plans to take forward an immediate review of the strategy, during which we shall look at all options for delivering improved air quality more quickly.

Mr. Boswell: While that is welcome, will the Deputy Prime Minister take a particularly close look at the Environmental Agency's recent proposals in connection with sulphur dioxide emissions from power stations, which do not seem to be well founded in the facts and go well beyond our current international obligations? Incidentally, the proposals would have the serious effect of virtually wiping out the economics and the potential of the British coal mining industry overnight.

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that this strategy was begun by the previous Administration and that that is one of the gases under consideration in the review. We shall take into account the points that he has made.

Dr. Lynne Jones: I understand that the planting of trees can have beneficial effects on air quality. However, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will not encourage the planting of leylandii trees and hedges in residential areas? On the contrary, will he consider introducing measures to curb the activities of those who insist on growing those hedges to monstrous proportions, thus inflicting considerable misery on their neighbours?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Lady's question is vaguely related.

Mr. Prescott: It will be vaguely replied to, Madam Speaker.

I can confirm that we are considering some form of Government intervention in relation to those hedges if necessary.

House Building (Rendering)

9. Mr. Collins: What representations he has received about legislation governing the use of rendering in newly built housing; and if he will make a statement. [30629]

The Minister for London and Construction (Mr. Nick Raynsford): Apart from the hon. Gentleman's letter of 24 February to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on this subject, the Government have received no representations regarding legislation concerning the use of rendering to newly built houses.

Mr. Collins: The Minister will know from my letter that I have laid before the Department the concerns of my constituents living in the Helme View estate, built by Barratt Homes, in Kendal. Will he consider legislation to require the minimum specified standards of rendering set out by the manufacturers of those materials, to be used by private sector builders? Will he also consider replacing the National House-Building Council with something that is rather less of a toothless watchdog?

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for providing me with some detailed background information about the case of Helme View. On the strength of his representations, I have seen that there is some evidence that the rendering may have been put on in a way that did not comply with the specification contained in the British Board of Agrément recommendations. If that is the case, there would certainly be grounds for the home owners concerned to seek redress through the NHBC, which has provided the insurance back warranty on the scheme. We have had general discussions with the NHBC about the performance of its obligations, and I have twice met its chief executive. I am expecting a report on the progress that it is making in the review of its service to ensure that it provides effective warranties to the public.

Local Government Finance

10. Dr. Cable: What plans he has to reduce local authorities' reliance on central Government funding. [30630]

Ms Armstrong: We shall shortly be consulting on possible changes to the system of local government finance.

Dr. Cable: Does the Minister recall that the Government have signed the European charter of local self-government? Is she willing to tell the vast majority of councils—of all parties—which are well run, what time scale the Government now envisage to allow councils to raise their own revenue to meet local needs free of central Government capping and other centralised controls?

Ms Armstrong: We have said that we shall consult shortly. The consultation document will be going out in the next two to three weeks. Councils will then be able to respond. We shall be able to deal with the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised in that process. We then hope to bring a White Paper to the House. He will then see precisely how the Government intend to proceed.

Dr. Ladyman: When the Minister is looking into how to reduce local government reliance on central Government funding, will she also look into those ways in which local government is bailing out central Government? I am thinking of the burden of housing benefit payments on district councils. When the Conservative party passed the responsibility for such payments to local government, it promised that not a penny of that expenditure would fall on the council tax payer. In my district of Thanet, £3 million out of £15 million goes on covering the cost of housing benefit payments. Will my hon. Friend take that into consideration when considering how local government finance is to be reorganised?

Ms Armstrong: That is part of the present review of housing finance. I met the Local Government Association to discuss issues associated with that last week. It is one of the areas that we are reviewing and I look forward to reporting back on the results at some stage in the future.

Local Government

11. Mr. Bob Russell: If he will reduce central Government intervention in local government. [30631]

Ms Armstrong: We are committed to making local decision making less constrained by central Government and more accountable to local people. However, there will remain a need for reserve powers for Government to act if and when councils fall seriously short of what people are entitled to expect.

Mr. Russell: While I acknowledge the Minister's response, does she agree that, after 18 years of relentless attacks on local government by the former Government, Britain now has the most centralised local government system anywhere in the democratic world—even more centralised than the system that Stalin achieved in the former Soviet Union? Is it not time that the Government started to roll back central Government control and get rid of the quangos? In short, is it not time that central Government got off local government's back?

Ms Armstrong: I certainly accept and agree that we have ended up with the most centralised system in Europe. Indeed, the number of Acts that the previous Government passed to try to neuter and devalue local government was almost more than the number of Conservative representatives on the Opposition Benches at the moment. We are determined to change the situation, but we want to do so in partnership with local government. That means that we are working with local government to plan the way forward and to do that in partnership. We shall not take decisions on our own without recognising the valuable contribution that local government has to make to the way forward.

Mr. Rammell: All of us would want to see an end to crude and universal capping as soon as possible, but does the Minister agree that political consistency is necessary on those issues? While in the House the Liberals argue for extra powers, extra expenditure and extra taxation at a local level by local councils, in my constituency and, I imagine, in others they criticise the fact that council taxes are increasing to fund reasonable increases in expenditure. Do we not need some consistency on those matters and does not that problem undermine the credibility that the Liberals might otherwise have on such issues?

Ms Armstrong: I think that both Opposition parties have some difficulties in consistency in their local government policy. Of course we need consistency, but, more than anything else, if we are to get a proper democratic balance in this country, we need a rejuvenated local government. We need that rejuvenation and diversity properly to express the will of local people and to ensure that they really are in the driving seat and we get a democracy worthy of its name.

Mr. Pickles: One of the principal worries of local councils about Government intervention concerns the planning powers of the regional development agencies. There is confusion on that. The Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and the Regions was told that there were no plans to take away powers from local authorities. The Regional Development Agencies Bill originally proposed to give the agencies such planning powers, but those proposals were then withdrawn. I accept that there may have been drafting problems, but my question is wholly reasonable—what powers does the Minister believe that the RDAs should have on planning?

Ms Armstrong: I am staggered by the hon. Gentleman. Year after year, he supported measures that gave central Government greater powers of intervention in local government. He knows that the issue will be dealt with properly on the Floor of the House on Report.

Parish Councils

12. Mr. Burns: If he will extend the powers of the local government ombudsman to cover parish councils. [30632]

Mr. Raynsford: We have no plans to extend the powers of the local government ombudsman to cover parish councils. Individual electors can raise complaints directly at meetings of the parish council.

Mr. Burns: Why not?

Mr. Raynsford: Quite simply because, even though there are some 17,000 parish councillors and some 8,000 parish councils in England, the Department has received fewer than 10 representations suggesting such an extension.

Local Government Reform

13. Mr. McNulty: What progress he is making in his consultation on the reform of local government. [30633]

Ms Armstrong: On 9 February, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister launched a wide-ranging consultation paper, "Local Democracy and Community Leadership", on modernising local government. A second paper, "Local Services Under Best Value", was published today. Further papers on the new ethical framework and on aspects of local government finance will be published shortly. Following consultation, the Government will set out their firm proposals in a White Paper this summer.

Mr. McNulty: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does she agree that the apparent conversion of the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) to the value of local government is far too little, far too late? No one will be convinced by Mickey Mouse conversions by the Opposition on that, the countryside or any other issue.

Ms Armstrong: We are determined to rejuvenate local government. The Conservative Government left local government demoralised and in a mess. They believed that they knew best about everything, but they had their answer on 1 May and they will receive similar answers in the future.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Does the Minister accept that there was no countryside rally or countryside march against the last Government? The reason why more than 100,000 people rallied in Hyde park last year and more than 250,000 people marched through London at the weekend is the Government's meddling attitude to rural affairs.

Ms Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman needs to learn a little history. People in the countryside are not obsessed by one issue; they want a Government who listen to them on the whole range of issues. That is precisely why I am consulting them on the future of housing opportunities in the countryside, and why we are ensuring that brown-field sites in the countryside are properly used for social housing. Moreover, we are considering transport opportunities to ensure that there is decent public transport in areas where few people have had access to it. People in the countryside are anxious—and angry—about those issues because, for the past 18 years, they have been absolutely neglected.

Mr. Soley: Has my hon. Friend seen Hammersmith and Fulham council's proposals for improving the representation of councillors and reinforcing their role, while subjecting them to closer scrutiny? In anticipation of the Local Government (Experimental Arrangements) Bill, may I ask whether that is not the way in which the Conservative party, and all parties, should encourage local authorities to develop the local democracy that will strengthen the bond between elected councillors and the electorate? Is not that where the real argument lies?

Ms Armstrong: Of course it is where the real argument lies. We want to ensure that local councils take responsibility for thinking about how they can be as responsive and as open as possible to local people. Those ideas are expressed in the Local Government (Experimental Arrangements) Bill, which has recently been considered in the House of Lords. That private Member's Bill arose from a House of Lords Select Committee; it had all-party support in the House of Lords, as well as the strong support of local government. I hope that the House of Commons will treat it seriously.

Sir Norman Fowler: It needs debate.

Ms Armstrong: It certainly needs debate and, if Opposition Members are co-operative, it will get debate. We are determined to ensure that it is debated properly. If Opposition Members agree with that, they will ensure that the Bill gets into Committee, so that we can give local government the chance to develop its own way of working.

Dorchester Relief Road

28. Mr. Ian Bruce: When he will make a decision on the financing of the Dorchester relief road in Weymouth; and if he will make a statement. [30649]

The Minister of Transport (Dr. Gavin Strang): The Government's priorities for investment in local road schemes, including the Dorchester relief road, will be decided in the context of the new appraisal framework that we are developing in the trunk roads review.

Mr. Bruce: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his non-answer. I approached the Government about the scheme, which was waiting for them on 1 May. They decided that they wanted an integrated transport solution to be proposed by Dorset county council. The council rewrote its bid and submitted it to the Government on a tight deadline, spending probably tens of thousands of pounds, but the Minister's Department did not even send it to the Treasury task force for private finance initiative bids, further delaying the scheme. What is the reason for that prevarication; for the extra money being spent by local government; and for the lack of a decision from the Government?

Dr. Strang: Surely the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Government are implementing the manifesto commitment to conduct a fundamental review of our roads programme; to decide what role roads play in an integrated transport policy; and to determine what criteria should be taken into account in choosing which roads to give priority to. In the business plan for its proposed PFI scheme, Dorset county council envisages signing the contract in 1999–2000.

Driving Test Centre, Chelmsford

29. Mr. Burns: If he will make a statement on the progress being made in moving the driving test centre in Beeches road, Chelmsford, to another site in the Chelmsford area. [30650]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): A planning application for the Chelmer business park, which includes plans for a purpose-built driving test centre, is due to be considered by Chelmsford borough council planning committee on 6 April. Assuming that the application is successful, building work should start this summer and driver testing operations could move there from Beeches road by the end of the year.

Mr. Burns: Many of my constituents in the Waterhouse Farm area of Chelmsford will be extremely heartened and gladdened to hear what the Minister says, and I am grateful to her. Will she keep a watching brief to ensure that there is no slippage? As she will be aware, the problem has been rolling along for at least eight years and has been the subject of an adverse report by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. There was a problem earlier this year when the ownership of the land on which the centre is to be built changed hands. My constituents would appreciate it if the Minister could ensure that the deadline that she has given today is honoured.

Ms Jackson: I can well understand the hon. Gentleman's constituents' concern. The issue has indeed dragged on since 1989. I am pleased to note that, since the Labour Government came to power on 1 May, there seems to have been a move in the right direction. We want the centre to be retained at Chelmsford, but the decision rests with the local authority, and we are hopeful that planning permission will be granted.

Road Traffic Reduction

30. Mr. Dobbin: What guidance has been issued to local authorities under the Road Traffic Reduction Act 1997. [30652]

Mr. Prescott: Guidance to local authorities on meeting their obligations under the Road Traffic Reduction Act 1997 was issued in draft on 15 January in order to allow local authorities and other interested parties to comment on its contents.

Mr. Dobbin: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the growing concern about ill health caused by pollution from road traffic? Does he agree that the Road Traffic Reduction Act 1997 will provide an important framework for local authorities to tackle the problem of traffic congestion? I welcome the guidance that has been issued under the Act and I congratulate the Government on their support for the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill.

Mr. Prescott: My hon. Friend has established a reputation for campaigning hard on this matter. Air pollution from traffic is a serious problem and we hope to tackle it through our national air quality strategy and the integrated transport White Paper that we will publish shortly. The Road Traffic Reduction Act 1997 provides an important framework for local authorities to take action, and the Government are committed to tackling the harmful effects of the growth in road traffic. It is estimated that up to 24,000 people die prematurely each year because of exposure to such air pollution.

Mr. Brake: Will the Secretary of State add up the reductions contained in all the local authority plans so that we can assess the contribution that local authorities will make to reducing road traffic? Will he also introduce a national target for the Government so that local authorities do not have to take sole responsibility for reducing traffic?

Mr. Prescott: Those matters are very much in our mind and are being considered for the White Paper, which will be published in May.

Mr. Ottaway: Does the Secretary of State agree that, whatever their good intentions, local authorities can do little in practice to reduce traffic levels, and that the way forward is to encourage people on to public transport? With that in mind, will he give a warm welcome to Virgin's announcement today of a

£1.8 million order for rolling stock for the west coast main line, which demonstrates the long-term benefits of rail privatisation?

Mr. Prescott: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's conversion to the need to give public transport priority over private transport. Whether the privatised rail system will contribute to that, we wait to see, although the signs are not good. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that, in the past 20 years, the costs of car transport have increased by 8 per cent. while the costs of public transport have increased by 30 per cent., and that that happened because the previous Government pursued a different policy.

New Roads

31. Mr. Mullin: How many miles of new road he has (a) approved and (b) declined to approve since he took office; and if he will make a statement. [30653]

Dr. Strang: Last July, I approved three schemes, which included 36 miles of road on new alignments. At the same time, I declined to approve 22 schemes, which would have included 85 miles of road on new alignments.

Mr. Mullin: I welcome that reply. Is the Department still under the control of the road lobby or has word reached the civil servants that the days of bigger and better roads are over and that the future lies with better public transport? I know that Ministers have grasped that point, but is my right hon. Friend satisfied that word has reached all concerned?

Dr. Strang: I assure my hon. Friend that, under this Government, the days of predict and provide are over. We recognise that we cannot build our way out of our transport problems and that is why we will publish a White Paper on an integrated transport policy in a few months' time.

Mr. Chope: Is not the Government's record, albeit short, deplorable? In 18 years, the Conservatives built or upgraded 1,300 miles of motorway and trunk road. That investment is a vital ingredient in the nation's prosperity and in regional competitiveness. Does the Minister agree that further extra taxes on motorists in the Budget before the publication of the White Paper would be unacceptable?

Dr. Strang: The hon. Gentleman is surely aware that the Government no longer regard building a new road as the first option for tackling a transport problem. We have to consider a range of options, although we will, of course, always have to build some new roads. One of the biggest problems that we inherited was the previous Government's complete failure adequately to maintain the existing roads network. That is why we have provided for such a large increase in expenditure on maintenance of our trunk roads and motorways in the next financial year.

Roads (Noise Pollution)

32. Mr. Randall: If he will make a statement on his Department's plans to limit noise pollution on major trunk roads. [30654]

Dr. Strang: Noise pollution is being addressed in the review of the role of trunk roads in England and is being considered with other matters in the preparation of the White Paper on integrated transport.

Mr. Randall: I thank the Minister for his reply. What assurances can he give my constituents, particularly those living in Ickenham close to the A40, about measures to alleviate the misery of noise pollution there?

Dr. Strang: The hon. Gentleman is right to focus attention on that. I know how important the issue is for many of his constituents. Under the policy of previous Governments, there has been no specific provision for tackling the problem once a road has been constructed. We are considering the matter, and we will announce our decision when we publish our White Paper on integrated transport.

Fiona Mactaggart: I am glad that the matter will be covered in the White Paper. Is there any prospect that the paper will include proposals to protect people who live near existing roads, such as the A40 and M4, that have had increasing traffic in recent years and become very noisy for people nearby? If there were to be some alleviation, it would be for the first time for many years, which would be welcome to those of us who have campaigned on the matter for a long time.

Dr. Strang: My hon. Friend is right to point up the problem. As she knows, there is an excellent chapter on the subject in the report on transport of the royal commission on environmental protection. It is an issue of growing importance for many people and we intend to address it.

A5

33. Mr. Paterson: What plans he has to dual the A5 north of Shrewsbury. [30655]

Dr. Strang: We are considering that proposal as part of our review of the roads programme.

Mr. Paterson: Twenty-five people have been killed between Shrewsbury and Ruabon over the past five years. The project has the full support of all the neighbouring local authorities and the Government office of the west midlands. It is the last link in the trans-European network route between Felixstowe and Holyhead that has not been dualled. When will the Minister be able to give a clear idea of when a final decision will be made?

Dr. Strang: We will take decisions on such roads in the context of our roads review. The hon. Gentleman is right, and makes a strong case for the road. New roads can save lives, and safety is a factor in this case.

Traffic-Calming Measures

34. Mr. Bob Russell: What action the Government are proposing to take to encourage councils to introduce further traffic-calming measures; and if he will make more financial resources available. [30656]

Dr. Strang: I recently announced the Government's intention to remove the requirement for local highway authorities to obtain the Secretary of State's consent to making 20 mph speed limits. That should encourage the creation of more 20 mph zones, particularly where children and vulnerable road users are most at risk. The Department will continue to provide local authorities with guidance on traffic-calming measures. We are currently considering what resources can be made available for 1999–2000.

Mr. Russell: I am grateful both to this Government for what they are doing on road safety—and, in fairness, to the previous Government, who pioneered traffic calming. I regard road safety as a non-party issue. However, more money is needed because road safety is in the national interest. I draw the Minister's attention to the high street scheme in my constituency, which has been funded by Government, past and present; the county council, past and present; and the borough council. It has led to a reduction of almost 50 per cent. in the number of accidents. Given that the Department's figures show that a fatal accident costs £1 million, a serious injury accident £110,000 and a slight injury accident about £10,000, the introduction of that traffic-calming system across the country would save hundreds of lives, prevent thousands of injuries and save the country money. Can we have more resources for more traffic-calming schemes?

Dr. Strang: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is right to commend so strongly the Colchester transport package, which this Government, like the previous Government, support. It contains a number of positive elements such as the provision of bus priority measures at key points and the development of cycle networks. As he rightly said, it has a strong emphasis on safety, traffic-calming measures and 20 mph zones. It is because of the merits of those schemes that I recently announced that local highway authorities will no longer have to approach the Government to create new 20 mph zones.

Ms Southworth: Will my right hon. Friend work with local authorities and public and private sector partnerships that are working to create sustainable town centres that are safe, environmentally friendly and accessible to everyone in the local community? In particular, will he give consideration to the unfair competition from out-of-town shopping centres that provide free car parking?

Dr. Strang: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. Most hon. Members would accept that when the former Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), announced that he was changing the planning legislation in relation to the development of out-of-town centres, it was a case of shutting the stable door after the horse had bolted. Far too many out-of-town centres have developed. We must now cope with that situation. Clearly, the encouragement of greater use of public transport and the promotion of an integrated transport policy are made so much harder by the development of out-of-town schemes.

Mr. Dafis: Do not reductions in the roads budget—which are reasonable enough for the purpose of discouraging unsustainable traffic growth—sometimes lead to cuts in the resources available for traffic-calming measures? That is an ironic outcome. What can the Government do to ensure that, while the roads budget may be reduced for good reasons, that other aspect of investment in roads is encouraged and enhanced?

Dr. Strang: I would be keen to examine any examples of that. We are, as the hon. Gentleman knows, very much in the business of encouraging more investment in traffic-calming measures and more emphasis on safety. However, he is right to point out that we cannot continue a policy of building more and more roads. It is important that transport packages are designed to put the emphasis on safety.

Road Fatalities (Drugs)

35. Mr. Flynn: What is his estimate of the numbers of road fatalities that result from the use of medicinal drugs. [30657]

Ms Glenda Jackson: No such estimate is available. A survey that my Department is conducting found medicinal drugs present in 6 per cent. of road user fatalities—only 4 per cent. in the case of drivers—but their presence does not necessarily mean that they were a factor in causing the fatality.

Mr. Flynn: The Government are to be congratulated on being the first Government to take practical steps to deal with the dangers of drug driving. As my hon. Friend knows, the trial can identify only a small number of problems involving medicinal drugs. As she is aware, 100 million prescriptions are issued every year for medicines which, if taken according to instructions, will leave drivers' reactions as impaired as if they had drunk an equivalent quantity of alcohol. Will my hon. Friend give more attention to the matter, as medicinal drugs are the major drugs that cause accidents?

Ms Jackson: I believe that my hon. Friend is confusing the incidence of drugs in road fatalities and the cause of such accidents. In our survey to date, 16 per cent. of the fatalities—drivers, passengers, pedestrians and cyclists—had evidence of an illicit drug in their bodies. The incidence for drivers was 18 per cent. Six per cent. had evidence of medicinal drugs. For drivers, the incidence was 4 per cent. Compared to a survey 10 years ago, that represents a fourfold increase in the incidence of illicit drugs, but very little change in the incidence of prescription drugs. However, road fatalities and serious casualties overall have fallen by more than a third during those 10 years, so it is extremely difficult to judge the road safety implications of drug use.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Minister's statement. Does she share the concern of diabetic people who feel that they are discriminated against by the new regulations coming out of Europe?

Ms Jackson: I should be extremely sorry if there were a sense of discrimination with regard to insulin-treated diabetics. Since 1991, they have been prohibited from holding licences to drive large goods vehicles and buses, and, as a consequence of the United Kingdom's implementation of the second EC driving licence directive, the prohibition extends to licences to drive lorries between 3.5 and 7.5 tonnes and minibuses with nine to 16 seats. Licences to drive cars, restricted to a maximum of three years at a time, continue to be granted to insulin-treated diabetics, subject to satisfactory health checks at each renewal. The road safety dangers associated with drivers treated with insulin have been recognised for many years—it can lead to hypoglycaemia, which in turn can result in loss of consciousness, in some cases without warning.

Fuel Duties

36. Mr. Gray: What assessment his Department has made of the impact of increasing fuel duties by 6 per cent. a year in real terms on road traffic levels. [30658]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Department's national road traffic forecasts assume that fuel duties will increase by 6 per cent. per annum until 2002. Those forecasts predict that the level of road traffic will increase by 11 per cent. between 1996 and 2002.

Mr. Gray: Is the Minister aware of the disproportionately harsh effect that an increase in road fuel duties will have on rural motorists, many of whom rely exclusively on private motor cars to get about? Will she consult her right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to find ways of deterring the city driver—and particularly the company car driver—while safeguarding the interests of the rural motorist?

Ms Jackson: That question comes ill from a party which inflicted enormous damage on rural transport through its policies of rail privatisation and bus deregulation. In the past two decades, rail fares have risen by 75 per cent. and bus fares have risen by 60 per cent. above inflation, yet overall car costs are 6.5 per cent. below inflation. Central to this Government's policies for rural communities is the restoration of real integrated public transport in order to begin to make some sort of inroad into the isolation in many rural communities that is a direct result of the policies of the former Conservative Administration.

Mr. Baker: Given that the real cost of motoring has decreased by 6.5 per cent. since 1974, and that rail fares have increased by 75 per cent. or 78 per cent., are the Government prepared to consider in their transport White Paper not simply increasing costs for motorists but using funds to decrease costs for rail and bus users?

Ms Jackson: We are reviewing every possible lever of government to ensure that, when we produce our integrated transport policy, it will be clear to the whole country that we are taking a long-term view. This is our window of opportunity to create an integrated transport policy based on an integrated public transport system and to reduce the huge costs that this country has suffered through 18 years of neglect by the previous Administration.

Sir Norman Fowler: But my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) was asking about the position of motorists. Will the Minister acknowledge that the car is an absolute necessity for millions of people in rural areas and elsewhere? Will she acknowledge also that hundreds of thousands of people work in the motor industry in areas such as mine in the west midlands—which used to be a rather important consideration as regards industrial policy? Will the Minister recognise that there is no justification for introducing swingeing increases in motor taxation that will simply penalise many millions of ordinary people?

Ms Jackson: I repeat that the greatest damage was inflicted on the rural communities by the previous Government's policies of rail privatisation and bus deregulation. I repeat that the issue of rural communities is central to this Government's policies. The rural communities' need for a properly integrated transport policy, which is essential for regeneration in those areas that the former Conservative Government neglected for 20 years, will be central to the Government's policies.

Workplace Parking

37. Mr. Swayne: What assessment has been made of the cost of enforcing proposals to limit the availability of workplace parking. [30659]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government are currently looking at the potential costs and benefits of a levy on non-residential parking places. Administration and enforcement arrangements are of course an important element in that.

Mr. Swayne: I find that most regrettable. Does the hon. Lady agree that, given the Government's aspirations to reducing congestion, this is a daft idea that will increase congestion by 20 per cent. and load new costs on to small businesses, many of which will be rural?

Ms Jackson: No—and anything that causes the hon. Gentleman regret is music to my ears.

Rail Passenger Satisfaction Surveys

38. Mr. Cranston: If he will make a statement on the publication of rail passenger satisfaction surveys. [30660]

Mr. Prescott: The Government welcome the customer satisfaction surveys, which the franchising director has required to be published. They show that a significant proportion of privatised train companies are offering a worse service and an overall reduction in the standard and quality of service. That is unacceptable.

Last November, I gave the franchising director new objectives, requiring him to change his priorities. He must now put the interests of passengers first. Concerns continue to be expressed about safety and the excessive profits that are being made by individual directors as a result of the privatisation of the railways. Furthermore, the franchising director and the regulator think that their powers are inadequate. Our White Paper will address that.

Mr. Cranston: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that under the previous Government there was no obligation on many train operating companies to publish these surveys and, where they were obliged to do so under some of the contracts, they had a free choice as to what they could publish? Does he agree that such information is vital? I welcome what he has done in the past month or so to ensure that survey results are published.

Mr. Prescott: That is correct. I increased the franchising director's powers to achieve those objectives. Indeed, I made it clear to him that his primary objective is not to secure maximised profit and privatisation but to put customer satisfaction first.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Obviously, you are not responsible for the contents of Ministers' written answers, but, on behalf of hon. Members, I ask whether there is anything that you can do to protect hon. Members who table questions for written answer, only to have them blocked.

As you are aware, last Wednesday I tabled a question to the Department of Social Security, asking for the raw numbers on the lone parent scheme. It now turns out that those numbers are somewhat embarrassing to the Government. On Friday, to forestall my question, the Department of Social Security got the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) to place a planted question asking for the proportions, not the numbers, on the lone parent scheme.

Yesterday, shortly after 3.30 pm, the hon. Member for Gravesham received his answer, saying that the Secretary of State for Social Security had published a press release, which appeared on the tapes. In my answer, I was referred to that given to the hon. Member for Gravesham, but mine was not the same question as his, so I never got an answer on the raw figures. To my mind, the Government are abusing their position by failing to answer questions that are embarrassing.

Is there anything that you can do to try to stop that practice?

Madam Speaker: I can make no comment on the hon. Gentleman's first point, which is far too general and is unacceptable to me. I quite understand his frustration. He was good enough to give me the information—which is rather convoluted—that he expressed at the Dispatch Box. He is quite right that the contents of answers are not a matter for me. It is for Ministers to take responsibility for the replies that they give. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced Member of the House, and I am sure that he can find further parliamentary means of following up the matter. If hon. Members are dissatisfied with replies that they receive, they might in the first instance consult the Table Office, which is extremely helpful in these matters. I would prefer the hon. Gentleman to do just that.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No. There is no further point of order; I have made a ruling. I have seen the answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), and all the answers that he has received. If he consults the Table Office, he can table a question that will get the answer that he wants. That is the point that I am making. What is the further point of order?

Mr. Forth: You mentioned the Table Office, and that is helpful, but are you aware that in its efforts to be helpful, it has on occasion said to me, and, I am sure, to others, "This matter has been blocked by the Department"? It would appear that a trend is emerging, whereby Government Departments are able to place an arbitrary block on questions tabled by hon. Members, which, apparently, the Table Office has to respect. I should have thought that the Table Office was responsible to you and the House, not Government Departments. Therefore, are you satisfied that the House can be treated in that way by Government Departments?

Madam Speaker: I am satisfied because, as Speaker under the previous Government, I am well aware of the number of questions that were blocked then. I must be frank and tell the House that. In this case, a question could be tabled to elicit the information that the hon. Member for West Chelmsford requires.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This point of order has the attraction of being not at all generalised but very particular.

On the radio this morning, the Foreign Secretary said that it was his understanding—he was doubtless speaking for the Government—that the agreement reached by the United Nations went along with previous agreements, in that it allowed military action to take place under existing United Nations charter resolutions on Iraq.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Thank God for that.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend says thank God for that; some of us take a different view.

Later on the same programme, the Chinese ambassador, representing some of the permanent members of the Security Council, made it abundantly and unambiguously clear that their interpretation was diametrically opposite—that there could be no military action until the powers had gone back to the Security Council. They cannot both be right. My point of order is simply to ask you, Madam Speaker, whether you have had a request from the Foreign Office or the Law Officers to explain precisely what the legal position is in this crucial matter.

Madam Speaker: No. I have not been informed that a Minister will make a statement to the House. Foreign Affairs questions come before us next week, when the hon. Gentleman may seek to catch my eye on those matters.

Religious Discrimination and Remedies

3.36 pm

Mr. John Austin (Erith and Thamesmead): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to render unlawful religious discrimination in employment and in the provision of certain types of goods, facilities and services and to make provision for appropriate enforcement; to create new offences relating to incitement to religious hatred; and for related purposes.

In a submission to the United Nations in 1995, the previous Government stated succinctly and boldly their vision of an inclusive society. The submission said:

"It is a fundamental objective of the United Kingdom Government to enable members of ethnic minorities to participate freely and fully in the economic, social and public life of the nation, with all the benefits and responsibilities which that entails, while still being able to maintain their own culture, traditions, language and values. Government action is directed towards addressing problems of discrimination and disadvantage which prevent members of ethnic minorities from fulfilling their potential as full members of British society."

The twin aims of public policy are social inclusion and participation by all in a shared civic culture, combined with cultural pluralism. The achievement of that requires issues of discrimination and disadvantage to be addressed. Racial abuse and racial harassment are a fact of life for many of our citizens. Racial harassment occurs when someone abuses or assaults someone else because of his or her colour, race, nationality, or ethnic or national origin. Incitement to racial hatred is a criminal offence, but what if the harassment, abuse or incitement is based not on one's colour, race, nationality, or ethnic or national origin, but on one's religion?

The National Secular Society and others have expressed concern that the Bill may limit freedom of speech and expression. I do not intend to make it more difficult for the religious beliefs and practices of any group to be open to critical scrutiny or rational discussion. The Bill does not intend to extend the blasphemy laws; nor would it suppress the legitimate reporting of atrocities or gross violations of human rights carried out in the name of religion. Freedom of speech and of expression, and freedom of the press and other media, are the sinews of our democracy, but they are not an absolute right without limits.

Some have argued that the existing laws are adequate to deal with the problem, but evidence published by the Runnymede Trust in its report, "Islamophobia—a challenge for us all" clearly shows that the law is inadequate to secure the objective of an inclusive and pluralist society, as set out in the previous Government's submission to the United Nations.

The Commission for Racial Equality has recommended changes in the law in respect of discrimination on grounds of religion and incitement to religious hatred. The previous Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), said in response to the Commission for Racial Equality:

"I have yet to be convinced that legislation could be justified. So far, there is little hard evidence of discrimination against individuals on religious rather than racial grounds, but I can assure you that the Home Office remains ready to look at any other evidence."

I hope that the new Home Secretary will examine that evidence, which is clearly stated in the Runnymede Trust's report on Islamophobia.

Since that time, various faith communities have become more concerned, particularly about the extent and nature of discrimination in this country against Muslims and the lack of legal remedies that would allow those problems to be tackled. The Runnymede report refers to the prejudice and discrimination that Muslims experience in their everyday lives and describes Islamophobia as "an ugly word for an ugly reality" and as a growing phenomenon.

Hatred of Islam has existed in western cultures for several centuries, but it has become more explicit, extreme and dangerous. It is an ingredient of all sections of our media, which means that many Muslims are frequently excluded from the economic, social and public life of the nation.

The Runnymede report goes further than the Bill and makes wide-ranging recommendations. The Bill addresses only the issues of discrimination in employment and the provision of goods and services, and incitement to hatred. Estimates of the Muslim population in Britain vary, but the community is reliably thought to number between 1.2 million and 1.4 million. Whatever the correct figure, for the sake of members of that community and society as a whole, we cannot afford to allow Muslims to feel isolated and excluded from society.

The argument for legislation outlawing religious discrimination is broadly the same as that for legislation outlawing racial discrimination. First, a religious discrimination law would be a powerful symbol of public policy and would convey the important message that religious identities are valued and respected throughout society.

Secondly, there must be consistency. The Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Acts have created an anomaly: religious discrimination in employment is unlawful in one part of the United Kingdom, but not in Great Britain. A further anomaly has been thrown up by the House of Lords decision that Sikhs constitute a racial group and are entitled to protection under the Race Relations Act 1976. Similarly, Jews can rely on that Act, because, like Sikhs, they can be defined by their ethnic as well as their religious identity. No such protection is afforded to other religious groups, such as Hindus or Muslims.

Yet another anomaly has been thrown up by the Crime and Disorder Bill, which addresses racially aggravated behaviour. In a civilised society, criminal law must be operated even-handedly. An attack carried out on a Sikh or a Jew because of his religion could be classified as racially aggravated assault, but an attack on a Hindu or a Muslim could not. In employment, except in Northern Ireland, an employer is free to discriminate against an employee on the ground of religion, which is often used as a cover for racial discrimination.

The Government have always maintained that equality of opportunity in employment is economically desirable: discrimination is an inefficient business practice which results in talent being wasted, to the detriment of the public at large. Discrimination also creates alienation and frustration among those who feel that the law does not provide them with redress. My Bill would contribute in no small measure to the elimination of such alienation and frustration.

The adherents of some faiths could make a discrimination claim under the Race Relations Act 1976 on the basis of their membership of an ethnic group. Hindus might do so as Indians, or Muslims as Arabs or Pakistanis, under the indirect discrimination clauses of that Act, but a white or Afro-Caribbean British citizen who had converted to Hinduism or Islam could not. Nor could groups such as Rastafarians, who are a minority within their own racial or national group. The 1976 Act deals with indirect religious discrimination, but financial compensation is not available unless the discrimination can be shown to be intentional. I accept that defining religion is difficult, but difficulties are no argument for not acting in the interests of harmony in our society.

The Bill does not deal with the issue of blasphemy. I would prefer the current law to be rescinded rather than extended, but there is a difference between the offences of blasphemy and incitement. Blasphemy outrages people's sensibilities, whereas incitement endangers their material and physical well-being. Currently, incitement to racial hatred is an offence under the Public Order Act 1986; inciting others to hate Muslims, however, is not a crime—the 1986 Act does not deal with the stirring up of religious hatred.

It has been suggested that the Bill limits freedom of speech, but the current law acknowledges that it is legitimate, in a democratic society, to interfere with freedom of expression if the publication of threatening, abusive or insulting material may not only offend people's sensitivities, but have a direct and harmful effect on their lives. An extension of the law to cover religious groups, as well as racial or ethnic groups, would give Muslims treatment equal to that of Jews and Sikhs, and would reassure them that their interests were respected sufficiently to warrant their protection from religious hatred.

The international covenant on civil and political rights declares that "any advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence shall be prohibited."

We are not legally bound to introduce legislation to implement the provision, but I think that it is essential if we are serious about human rights, and about building a society in which all our citizens can participate freely and fully in the economic, social and public life of the nation—with all the benefits and responsibilities that that entails—while maintaining their own culture, traditions, language and values.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Austin, Mr. David Atkinson, Mr. Simon Hughes, Fiona Mactaggart, Mr. Terry Rooney and Mr. Marsha Singh.

RELIGIOUS DISCRIMINATION AND REMEDIES

Mr. John Austin accordingly presented a Bill to render unlawful religious discrimination in employment and in the provision of certain types of goods, facilities and services and to make provision for appropriate enforcement; to create new offences relating to incitement to religious hatred; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 3 July, and to be printed [Bill 133].

Opposition Day

ISAs, TESSAs and PEPs

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.46 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the success of TESSAs and PEPs in extending popular saving and deplores the Government's proposal to abolish them and replace them with Individual Savings Accounts (ISAs); condemns the retrospective taxation of the most prudent savers who have accumulated more than £50,000; believes that ISAs will involve high administrative costs, especially because of the unnecessary and unfair lifetime limit on tax-free saving; and urges the Government to bring forward new proposals that would not involve retrospective taxation, would build on PEPs and TESSAs, would reduce the costs of administering the schemes and would not involve a lifetime limit on the amount that may be invested.

This is the first opportunity that we have had to debate an issue that is of great and growing concern to our constituents since the Paymaster General shook millions of people by announcing that he planned to abolish personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts. People were shaken because they could not have guessed from what Labour had said before the election just what would hit them.

Last spring, the Labour party told us—and told the British people—that it had changed. This was new Labour: the people's party. Middle Britain was safe with new Labour, and so were its savings. It was the Prime Minister—"Trust Me Tony" himself—who said:

"We want to extend the scope of PEPs and TESSAs, so the idea that the Labour party is going to take action against those is completely absurd."

Labour's manifesto reaffirmed that, stating:

"We will . . . extend the principle of Tessas and Peps to promote long-term saving."

And it was the current Chief Secretary to the Treasury who was reported by the Investors' Chronicle as saying:

"The party has pledged that anyone who invests in a PEP or TESSA before the general election . . . would not be penalised under a Labour Government."

The article went on to say that the Chief Secretary had reiterated Labour's promise that it would not retrospectively abolish tax incentives on PEPs or TESSAs.

"It doesn't matter what the issue is with tax,"

he said.

"People are entitled to certainty."

If that did not reflect the Chief Secretary's remarks accurately, he could have written to deny it. Actually, he did write a letter to the Investors' Chronicle, in which he said:

"You correctly quote me as saying, 'We support Peps and Tessas but we want to build on that.'

However the assertion in the article that 'Labour is examining proposals to abolish PEPs and TESSAs' is not true."

[Mr. Peter Lilley]

That was the height of deception. The Chief Secretary chose to deny the one assertion in the article that has since proved to be true, that Labour would abolish PEPs; but he chose not to qualify his clear assurances—which have since proved bogus—that Labour would do nothing retrospectively, that there would be no penalty for those with existing PEPs or TESSAs and that there would be no uncertainty in the tax regime.

It is the betrayal of those pledges which has caused so much fury among our constituents. That betrayal is why this debate is being held today, and why we have dragged back the Paymaster General from Guernsey. People had been reassured by Labour's pledges; now they are angry, and rightly so. We will hound the Government until they honour their pledges to savers.

People with longer memories might have known how little Labour cares for their savings. They will remember the deadly combination of socialism and inflation, which destroyed Britain's savings habit in the 1970s.

Conservative Members are proud to have rebuilt savings in the 1980s and early 1990s. We did it, first, by building up pension funds, to the point at which the United Kingdom has more money invested in pension funds than does all the rest of the European Community put together. We introduced PEPs and TESSAs, and now 3 million people have PEPs and 4.5 million people have TESSAs. Those schemes have massively extended popular saving.

We realise, of course, that more people need to save, and that many of those who already have savings need to save more. The Government would therefore have enjoyed our support if they had built on the success of our schemes. However, far from building on those schemes—building them up—the Government's proposals will mean cutting them back. Individual savings accounts will take away relief from those who have saved most prudently, giving less help, for less time, for less saving.

The only silver lining in the Government's proposals is that they have decided to open up the proposals for consultation. Ministers may rather regret that decision, because the reaction of savers, savings providers and expert advisers has been universally critical. It is not only that the plans were announced by Geoffrey Robinson; they were designed by Heath Robinson.

People's criticisms go to the heart of the Government's proposals. The best advice that Ministers could take would therefore be to listen to the thousands of small savers who are telling them, "Go back to the drawing board, and build on PEPs. In fact, do exactly what the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary promised they would do. They should simply honour their pledges."

The public have been most infuriated by the retrospective impact of the Government's plans. My postbag is full of letters from aggrieved savers, who thought that they were safe and trusted Labour. I do not know whether the Paymaster General reads such letters, but he certainly does not reply to them. Perhaps we should forward them to him in Guernsey. Nevertheless, he will have to listen to one or two of them today.

A typical example is a letter from a pensioner in Abergavenny, who writes:

"This punitive tax proposal, in my view, breaks a contract which we established with a previous Government and it is neither just nor defensible."

A gentleman from Chester sent me a copy of his letter to the Prime Minister. He wrote:

"We have worked hard, saved and planned for our retirement on the assumption that whatever steps we have taken would be honoured by whichever party was in power at the time. We have paid our taxes and behaved as responsible citizens and now your Government—the one we were asked to trust remember—has broken the contract between the state and those people who have more than £50,000 in PEPs."

The Government said that education was to be their passion. Some teachers in Birmingham disagree. They write:

"We are retired teachers who thoroughly enjoyed our chosen profession and who, during the later years of employment, made a conscious decision to save as much as we could from our salaries through PEPs and TESSAs towards our old age. Unlike the Paymaster General, we do not have a large offshore trust, a mansion in Surrey, a residence in Godalming or a villa in Tuscany.

We are just very ordinary members of the public who welcomed the opportunity by the Conservative Government to invest for our futures. Through careful planning and by putting prudence before pleasure we have been able to save in excess of the £50,000 limit now being proposed by Mr. Robinson."

I could go on. We have all received heaps of such letters.

Even if the Government will not listen, they must realise that to withdraw tax relief from savings that people made in good faith is not only wrong, but undermines the credibility of any future system. People will fear that if ISAs are successful, that regime too, could be changed. The Government must honour their contract with people who have saved in good faith.

Even if the £50,000 lifetime limit is not applied retrospectively, it remains the biggest problem in the ISA plan. There is no need for a lifetime limit, given that the annual limit on the amount that people can invest has been reduced, but if the Paymaster General insists on a lifetime limit, £50,000 is simply too low. The Paymaster General may consider it more than enough for humble folk not used to his style of life, but it is not a huge sum.

Another saver from Peterborough wrote:

"I may have to spend the final years of my life in a nursing home where fees are approximately £20,000 per annum, so £50,000 will last just two and a half years."

The Paymaster General himself admitted in reply to my right hon. Friend the shadow Chief Secretary that £50,000 invested in equities yields an annum income of less than £1,500 after tax. The Lord Chancellor would not get many rolls of wallpaper for that.

We do not know how many hundreds of thousands of savers have already accumulated more than £50,000. The Government did not even bother to find out before launching the new scheme, but it is not just those who have already reached the limit who will be hit. We should be encouraging those with £30,000 or £40,000 to continue building up their savings, yet the Government's plans mean that after a few more years, they, too, will lose the incentive to save. Will the Government publish an estimate not just of how many people have already reached the £50,000 limit, but of how many will reach it over the next few years?

It is not just the public who oppose the scheme. The experts are virtually unanimous in giving it the thumbs down. That is not my assessment. A survey of finance directors carried out by the company of one of Labour's most prominent business supporters, Alec Reed, found that more than 70 per cent. were opposed to ISAs.

The scheme is half-baked, ill thought out, unnecessarily complex and unlikely to achieve its stated objectives—in short, very new Labour.

Criticisms come from people who are well disposed to the Government. Richard Branson condemned it as "retrospective". The Financial Times said that it was "unfair . . . unattractive . . . and bureaucracy gone mad".

The Sunday Times said:

"ISAs will be the most complex instant access accounts ever."

The Consumers Association said:

"We are struggling to see the point of ISAs. We see no real advantages but a lot of problems."

The only possible justification for persisting with the reform would be if it generated more saving. The National Institute of Economic and Social Research is unequivocal about that, saying:

"The Government's proposed replacement of PEPs and TESSAs by Individual Savings Accounts would reduce the pool of savings available to finance investment in Britain."

and speculates

"that this could result in a reduction in the overall level of national wealth by as much as 4 per cent. of GDP".

ISAs could hope to attract extra savings, particularly from the less well-off, only if they offered either lower costs or better incentives, but far from reducing costs, the new rules will add to them. According to the management consultants OSI, setting up new systems to replace PEPs and TESSAs will cost nearly £1 billion. That is equivalent to an extra £30 a year for every ISA for the next five years. Running costs would also be higher than for PEPs and TESSAs because the lifetime limit is very costly to monitor, the profusion of annual limits adds to the costs and the absurd raffle will also cost money to run.

At the same time as driving up costs, the Government are reducing the tax relief in ISAs, particularly for small savers on the basic rate, whom they are supposed to attract. For such savers, relief from capital gains tax is likely to be of no importance, because they are unlikely to have capital gains greater than the £6,500 annual CGT exemption that they get outside an ISA. The tax relief that really matters to them is that on dividends.

Under the Conservatives' tax regime, for every £80 of net dividends, the fund manager could reclaim an additional £20 of tax credits. That was more than enough to cover the typical management charge. Under the ISA tax regime, the same dividends will give a credit of only £8.90. That is insufficient to cover the current costs of PEPs, let alone the higher costs of ISAs. Moreover, that tax credit will disappear after five years. I am glad to see that the Paymaster General is briefing the Chief Secretary, who was clearly unaware of the point. We know that he has been cut out of the circulation on welfare to work. He has clearly also been cut of the circulation of information on the debate that he is about to speak in.

The absurdity is that, whereas the majority of those with PEPs were basic rate taxpayers, ISAs will be attractive only to higher rate taxpayers. Does the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) realise that the scheme that his Government are proposing will shut out from equity investment anyone on the basic rate of tax or paying no tax and that the scheme will be worth while only for those paying 40 per cent. tax?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose—

Mr. Lilley: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's support.

Mr. Skinner: I shall tell the right hon. Gentleman, a previous Tory Minister, what I think. The issue is marginal in the extreme. However, I remember that every pensioner in Britain—10 million of them, including some who were able to find money to put in PEPs or TESSAs—lost £20 a week because of the Tory Government's decision to change the method of calculation for the old-age pension, linking it to prices instead of wages. The result was that every one of them constantly told me about the rotten, lousy Tory Government. What the right hon. Gentleman is saying today is just a bout of hypocrisy. Why does he not get back to his chateau in France?

Mr. Lilley: As I said, I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support. He says that a limit of £50,000 on tax relief is trivial. It is to him. He entered the House in 1970. I have had distinguished accountants calculate the cost of purchasing the pension that he is entitled to from the House of Commons. It would cost £356,000. He is worth even more than the pension scheme of the Paymaster General, and considerably more than the Chief Secretary, who is languishing at a mere £140,000, excluding his ministerial pension.

Mr. Skinner: I never realised that it was that much. If someone has been advising me wrongly, I shall go to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who is dealing with the mis-selling of pensions, to ensure that it is put right. I come here every day to earn my money, unlike many Tories, who, not content with their £40,000 salary as a Member of Parliament, are lining their pockets with moonlighting jobs, directorships and consultancies, picking up as much as £200,000 or £300,000 a year. Why does the right hon. Gentleman not direct his attacks on them?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman is worth every penny, and we wish him a very happy retirement.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lilley: I am going to make some progress. I have not made an estimate of the hon. Gentleman's pension, so he will have to apply for one.

Mr. Gardiner rose—

Mr. Lilley: I am not giving way.

I was pointing out that there will not be any incentive in five years' time, when it is planned that the tax credits in the scheme will disappear entirely. Can the Chief Secretary or the Paymaster General put their hands on their hearts and advise any basic rate taxpayer to invest in shares via an ISA? They will not. The Paymaster General is right not to, because he is sitting next to the

[Mr. Lilley]

Economic Secretary, who is in charge of pensions mis-selling. The Paymaster General knows that, if anybody gave such advice professionally, they would be guilty of mis-selling.

Where are the 6 million extra savers whom the Prime Minister tells us will be attracted to the scheme? The Prime Minister says that he sees them queueing up in Tesco, buying their corporate bonds with their Brooke Bond and getting their share tips with their PG Tips. The truth is that they are a phantom army. They do not exist; they had to be invented to pretend that tax relief was going to be spread more widely. In fact, tax relief under the scheme is being withdrawn wholesale. The effect of the scheme will be simply to raise extra tax revenue from savers. The Government's plans amount to a savings tax, to add to their pensions tax.

Do the Government accept that, as a very minimum, they must come up with a radically redrawn plan? Will they ensure that their final version fully respects those who have saved in good faith? There must be no retrospective taxation. There must be no lifetime limit—or at least a limit much higher than £50,000. The system must be simpler and have lower costs. Can the Minister give a guarantee today that those elements will be included in the final scheme?

If there is one characteristic that is starting to define this Government, it is that they practise the opposite of what they preach. When they say one thing, one can be sure that they will do another. They said that they wanted investment for the long term, so they introduced a £5 billion-a-year tax on pension funds—the country's main source of long-term investment. They said that they were pro-business, so they have imposed a £22 billion extra tax burden on the corporate sector in this Parliament. They said that they would stamp out abuse of offshore trusts, so they put in charge of the policy a Minister who has millions salted away in an offshore tax haven. When Labour spokesmen said before the election that they would not harm PEPs and TESSAs, the alarm bells should have started sounding for small savers. Under this Government, black is white, higher tax is a boost to investment, and the abolition of PEPs and TESSAs is to be sold as an opportunity for more people to save.

Whoever had announced this misbegotten plan, it would have provoked anger, but for it to come from the Paymaster General added insult to injury. The Chancellor has extraordinary insensitivity and arrogance. It was a cheek to put the Economic Secretary, Robert Maxwell's public relations spokesmistress, in charge of pensions mis-selling. It was brazen to put the Financial Secretary, who was taken to court for failing to pay her poll tax, in charge of tax collection. But it was an insult to put the tax-dodger general, with £12 million in an offshore tax haven, in charge of taking away tax relief from middle Britain. Power has simply gone to the Government's head.

I assure the House that we will not abandon this issue until the Government recognise that their scheme is mean, costly, complex, retrospective and a breach of trust. We will defend the savers of middle Britain.

4.9 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government's commitment, set out in the pre-Budget report, to consult on tax proposals, including the proposed ISA; believes that the ISA will extend the opportunity to save and invest and that the Government's proposals will ensure a stable and fair savings environment; commends the Government for its commitment to long-term economic stability and low inflation which is good for savers; and rejects any return to the boom and bust policies of the past which were so damaging to those on low incomes, savers and investors.".

I wondered why so many Tories were here this afternoon; I suspect that it has not much to do with small savers, or any other sort of saver. In looking at the record of the previous Tory Government, we remember what they did to all those on low incomes and those who endeavoured to save, despite the difficulties visited upon them.

The Government have been consulting over the past few months on the new individual savings account. In the pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it clear that it is this Government's intention—unlike what happened in the past—to consult, particularly where there are tax measures with long-term consequences. It is important to get the proposals right so that they endure in the long term. For that reason, we are happy to consult as many people as possible. The consultation period ended in January, and the Government will shortly set out our conclusions as part of the Budget process.

When the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the shadow Chancellor, said that this was the first opportunity the Opposition had to debate this matter, he was not quite right. It was up to the Opposition to use any of their Supply days to discuss this matter far earlier than just two weeks before the Budget.

I am sure that the House will understand that it is necessary for me to confine my remarks to some fairly general principles, rather than pre-empting anything that may be part of the Budget process. If anyone has come to the House today expecting specific announcements—or if anyone is following our proceedings elsewhere—I advise them to switch off or to leave now, because I intend to make a short series of remarks, setting out the principles that underpin the Government's approach to the savings process.

The Tory party's claim to be the friend of small savers and those on low incomes simply does not add up. The shadow Chancellor referred to pensions and the mis-selling of pensions. The House and the country will recall that more than 600,000 people have cause to regret the day the previous Government took office, as many believe that their pensions were mis-sold. People remember the previous Government's advertisements—paid for by the public—showing a man in a straitjacket breaking free from his occupational pension into which he and his employers paid, as if the very act of going private and getting a personal pension was enriching, both in the spiritual and material sense.

We remember that many were mis-sold pensions and may have lost thousands of pounds. Yet there was not a word of apology from the Tory party. The Tories were responsible for one of the biggest financial scandals this country has ever seen. They are in no position to lecture anyone on the plight of those who have suffered.

During the 1980s—to which the shadow Chancellor referred—inflation at one point hit 18 per cent. The Tory party ran economic affairs in such a way that many people who tried to save and to make provision for themselves found that what they had saved had been eaten up by inflation. The Tories are in no position whatever to talk about probity, or to lecture this or any other Government on helping those on low incomes.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): Does the Chief Secretary agree that the Government's proposal to limit to £50,000 what an ordinary saver can shelter from tax, while Ministers are sheltering millions in the Channel Islands, is the height of hypocrisy?

Mr. Darling: The Government's proposals are designed to ensure that more people have the opportunity to save than in the past. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, before the election, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden proposed a reform to the pensions system that would have cost this country £7 billion a year at its peak—money that would have had to be provided by increased tax on the very people for whom the right hon. Gentleman says he wants to speak.

The Government have two key objectives, which are both set out in the consultation document. First, we want to develop and extend the savings culture, because that is good for individuals and for the country. More than half the population have less than £200 each in savings, which is less than half the average weekly wage, and just over a quarter have no savings at all. Indeed, 60 per cent. of those who save have less than £500 in savings.

It must be in the interests of the country and of everyone that we extend the savings principle to encourage people to save as much as they can. If we are to do so, three things are necessary. First, we have to get the right economic framework—macro-economic stability. Secondly, we must have a regulatory system that commands the confidence of individuals and industry alike—something which the Conservative party does not begin to understand. Thirdly, we must have specific measures, such as those canvassed in the consultation document, to encourage individuals to save.

The second objective is to ensure that where we are giving tax relief, it is fairly distributed. The problem is that we are spending about £1.5 billion in tax relief on PEPs and TESSAs. On present trends, by 2007 that amount would rise to more than £2 billion, which is the equivalent of 1p on the basic rate of income tax. We must ensure that that tax relief does what it is supposed to do, which is to encourage people who do not save to save in the future. There is no point in continuing to give tax relief to people who can already afford to have significant sums locked up for long periods.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall give way soon to all hon. Members who are showing an interest. It is important to ensure that tax relief is focused in such a way as to help people who do not save to become savers and, once they become savers, to encourage them to continue saving. That is in their interests and those of everyone else in the country.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: First, I will give way to the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), but I will give way to all the other hon. Gentlemen who are trying to intervene.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): Will the Chief Secretary confirm whether more, less or the same amount of tax relief will be available under the projected new scheme as could be available under the existing scheme?

Mr. Darling: I repeat what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said. We believe that broadly the same amount of money forgone in tax relief under the present system will be forgone in tax relief under the new system. Encouraging people to save—people who do not save at the moment—is a useful application of the tax system.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): While I accept the objective of trying to broaden the scope of the schemes and to get more people in, does the Chief Secretary accept that some people decided not to go for a personal pension but to invest in PEPs and TESSAs because of the old tax regime, and it is too late for many of them to revert and get a personal pension plan? Will that not put some people in an invidious position?

Mr. Darling: I am aware that many people have taken advantage of PEPs and TESSAs with a view to providing for their pensions and elsewhere. That is one of the measures of which we are well aware, and we want to encourage people to save to complement their pensions, although I regard the future individual savings accounts and the present PEPs and TESSAs as complementary to anything an individual might be doing as regards his or her pension. We ought to encourage people to make long-term arrangements for their pension, because that is the best form of security for the future.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way to one more Conservative Member—the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), as he has been standing the longest.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Given that most lower and basic rate taxpayers are unlikely to generate gains that would exceed their capital gains tax exemption every year, and given that management charges for individual savings accounts are likely to exceed the 10 per cent. tax credit paid into ISAs, what are the advantages for those taxpayers in holding their equities through an ISA?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman raises a number of matters. On management charges, he is right to highlight that, under the present PEP systems, there have been cases of people's management charges being rather more than the tax relief they were getting. The hon. Gentleman cannot be held to blame, because he was not here at the time, but the previous Government did nothing about that.

[Mr. Darling]

That is one of the reasons why we want a robust regulatory system that will ensure that people are charged fairly.

Under the existing system, many basic or lower-rate taxpayers do not have gains that exceed their personal allowance, whereas, under the new system, holders of the individual savings account will enjoy tax relief—not only the tax credit for five years of 10p, but a general tax exemption.

Mr. Gibb indicated dissent.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but many providers and many objective observers have welcomed our proposals. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] Conservative Members shout, "Name them." Let me quote from a representation that we received:

> "There is much that we welcome within the ISA . . . We agree with features such as flexibility, no minimum level of saving, reducing the restrictions on the equity element and no 'lock in' . . . they are all welcome and we consider that there has been much careful thought given to the design of the ISA".

Conservative Members sneer, but, less than a year ago, they sat on the same Benches as the person who gave the proposals such a warm welcome—the former Economic Secretary to the Treasury, Angela Knight.

Virgin has welcomed the individual savings account, and the Halifax building society said that it saw a bright future for it. ProShare, an organisation dedicated to share-based investment, said that the Government had achieved the right balance in their aim to reach investors on low income, many of whom do not currently save, as well as others on higher income. Many people have examined the consultation document and praised the Government's objective of extending the base of savers to include those people about whom the previous Government did not care one jot—the Conservatives have never bothered about people on low incomes or people of modest means.

On those key objectives, it is worth reminding the House that one of the most fundamental prerequisites of generating a savings culture is to ensure long-term economic stability and low inflation. If there is high inflation or instability, any benefits that a saver may accrue will disappear.

The House should note two interesting phenomena that occurred when the shadow Chancellor was a Treasury Minister. First, during the Lawson boom in the mid-1980s, not only were people encouraged to spend as much as they had, then to borrow and to spend again, but the amount of money that people saved was reduced—there was a negative savings ratio. Secondly, because of the Conservative Government's failure to keep control of what was happening during the late 1980s, the inflation rate rose from nearly 5 per cent. to almost 10 per cent. between 1988 and 1990—in the space of two years. Interest rates also rose dramatically, which affected mortgages and the very people whom the Conservatives pretend to support.

Unless people can plan against a stable economic background, they will not be encouraged to save. If there is instability, any benefits from saving will be eaten up. We believe that economic stability is of fundamental importance if we are to encourage people to save—they must know the background against which they will plan and save over the ensuing few years.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, although administrative charges are important to all investors, they are particularly crucial to small investors, whom Labour has chosen to target? In devising a scheme that, by its nature, is much more expensive than existing schemes to administer, the Government have undermined their objective.

Mr. Darling: I dealt with that point when I said that one of the problems with PEPs, particularly in the early days, was the high administrative charges. The transparency that we believe to be necessary did not exist then, so many individual savers did not know how much they were paying in administrative charges. The hon. Gentleman's point would have had far more force if he had raised it during the many years when, as a Conservative Back Bencher, he supported the Conservative Government.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, whatever the charges, people will know, in a stable situation, what they are buying into, unlike in the boom and bust years of the past? Every saver will benefit from the opportunity, sneered at by the shadow Chancellor, to enter the draw and get £1,000.

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right. People well remember what happened in the late 1980s: the Conservative Government managed to create an unsustainable boom which culminated in one of the deepest recessions this country has ever known. The people who lost their jobs and their homes will remember that very well.

The shadow Chancellor was a Treasury Minister throughout that period. I commend to him another excellent document, "Fiscal policy: lessons from the last economic cycle", published at the time of the pre-Budget report, which draws on the lessons to be learnt from what the Conservatives did in the late 1980s when, through their economic incompetence, they completely misread the economic signals and took all the wrong decisions, with the result that millions of people suffered a great deal.

The first precondition to encouraging people to save is to ensure that we have economic stability, and the Government are absolutely committed to that. The second necessary condition is to ensure that we have a regulatory regime that enjoys the confidence of savers and investors alike, and we have delivered that already.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I agree that good regulation is essential, so why do regulation and compliance occupy only one line on page 17 of the Green Paper?

Mr. Darling: In the consultation document, we make it clear that it is necessary to have an appropriate and robust regulatory regime. [Interruption.] If Opposition Members care to look, they will find many references to what we propose to do to ensure that the regime will maintain the interests of those investing in individual savings accounts and elsewhere.

The Conservative party showed scant interest in reforming and improving the regulatory system over the past 18 years, despite all the problems with pensions mis-selling, in the City and elsewhere. We, by contrast, have made clear our determination to reform the system, not only making it more robust and putting an end to the nonsense of self-regulation, which was too often more a matter of self-interest than of the public interest, but—and this is an important point—ensuring that it is at an appropriate level for the savings or investments that it is supposed to be looking after.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Darling: No.

We are very conscious of the fact that, in the past, the regulatory system became so expensive that the relationship between cost and benefit was completely lost. We are determined never again to return to the situation in which so much rampant mis-selling of pensions could take place.

My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has shown what a difference a change of Government can make. Since she took up her post and the Government made it clear to the pensions industry that we would not tolerate a situation in which absolutely nothing was being done to remedy the plight of those who had been mis-sold pensions, there has been a dramatic improvement in the clear-up rate, so many people now have the reassurance that they would never have had under the Tory Government.

The third element needed to ensure that people save is to have the appropriate incentives in place. We have taken a number of steps, on which we have held consultations, that I believe will help people on low incomes. Conservative Members, when they were not shouting and bawling, tried to persuade us that they were interested in the plight of those on low incomes.

All the evidence is that one of the biggest obstacles to people on low incomes saving, especially under the current regime, is the necessity to lock up money for a considerable period. People on low incomes, who may have unexpected and unwelcome demands on their savings, have not been prepared to take that risk.

We want the system to be more accessible, with no "lock-in" period or minimum investment, partly because we want to encourage many people to save who would not dream of doing so under the current system. We want a flexible system which people feel they can use as confidently as they do banks and building societies. We also want to extend the variety of outlets from which the individual savings account can be bought, including supermarkets, friendly societies, national savings, banks and building societies. That will make it easier for people to access the individual savings account and will provide flexibility and a wide choice of tax-free products that are not available under the present system.

I thought that Conservative Members might have shown a little more practical interest in the measures that can be taken to encourage saving. However, their conduct this afternoon suggests that they are still not bothered about people on low incomes, any more than they were when they were in government.

Mr. Bercow: Given that the Chief Secretary is in listening mode, will he give a specific response to the criticisms made in the green budget published by the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which stated that the proposal for a cumulative contribution limit of £50,000 will impose substantial compliance costs, is unlikely to raise much revenue, and sits uneasily with a commitment to increase self-reliance in welfare provision?

Mr. Darling: The £50,000 limit was not meant to raise revenue. The hon. Gentleman is right, and we have made it clear that one of our objectives—and one of the reasons for a £50,000 limit—is to ensure that the amount of tax forgone is manageable. The amount of tax forgone would have to be examined, whichever Government were in power. Had the Conservatives won the election in May, they would have had to consider how tax relief was being focused. Our intention is that broadly the same amount currently spent, in terms of tax forgone, will be applied to the new scheme, but we are rebalancing it, to ensure that people who do not save now are encouraged to save in the future. That is a useful and worthwhile objective.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe): The Chief Secretary has evaded the question by speculating on what the previous Government might have done, but we were committed to PEPs and TESSAs. How does he reconcile what he has just said with the quotations put to him in which, on behalf of the Labour party, he pledged that it was not considering the abolition of PEPs and TESSAs? He also told savers that there was no threat to the continuation of the tax relief that the previous Government gave them.

Mr. Darling: I said on several occasions that we were committed to building on the principle established by PEPs and TESSAs. The individual savings account will do that. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman reads the consultation document—I know that he has a reputation for not always reading everything that is put in front of him—he will see that TESSAs will run their course. He is right to say that we will never know what the previous Government would have done had they been re-elected, but perhaps he will one day shed some light on the subject. I repeat the point, which he, as a former Chancellor, will acknowledge: every Chancellor has to keep the level of tax reliefs granted under review from one year to the next. It would be madness not to do so.

We want to ensure that the substantial amounts given in tax relief are directed to helping those people who do not currently save, but whom we want to save in the future. Helping more and more people to save is an objective of this Government, just as it was of the previous Government.

The House will understand that there is a limit to what any Treasury Minister can say only two weeks before the Budget, but I repeat the fundamental and important objectives set out in the consultation document. First, we want to extend the savings culture so that more and more people save and make provision for themselves. To achieve that, we need economic stability, the right regulatory framework, and specific measures to help people to save. That is the direction of the Government's thinking, and it has been broadly welcomed.

The second objective is to ensure that the scheme is affordable and sustainable, to give people the certainty referred to earlier. The proposals, on which we have consulted, are a useful contribution to encouraging people to save. It is in the interests of everyone in this country, and of the country as a whole, that as many people save as possible. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have more to say about that in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Lilley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It has been suggested to me that my description of the Paymaster General as the tax-dodger general may be out of order, in which case I withdraw it unreservedly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The House will be grateful for that.

4.34 pm

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): I declare an interest as a director of the London and Manchester Group, which specialises in encouraging people on low incomes to save. I make that declaration not only because it is necessary because of the Register of Members' Interests but because I believe that, on top of my lifelong interest in the issue, it has given me further insight into the problems that we are discussing. I therefore speak with considerable practical experience. I want to make a constructive contribution, but, given what the Chief Secretary said at the start of his speech, I must respond in a partisan way first.

It was outrageous for the Chief Secretary to suggest that pension mis-selling concerned only the Conservatives. We know that some took place, but many thousands, if not millions, more people benefited from personal pensions than suffered. It was a major contribution. He also ignored the fact that the major pensions scandal of the period was the work of a former Labour Member, for whom other Labour Members worked. It was outrageous that the Chief Secretary made such attacks.

The Chief Secretary accused us of having had a short period of high inflation. He forgets that under the previous Labour Government—I remember it well, because I served on every Finance Bill Committee—the average level of inflation was 15 per cent. We never in all our 18 years in government breached that average. For him to talk as though we were the party that did not understand the importance of a positive return on savings is nonsense. There was a negative return on savings throughout the time of the previous Labour Government, which was the biggest disincentive to save of all time.

For the Chief Secretary to suggest that we show no interest in low-income groups was a travesty of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), which was a devastating critique. We have not heard an answer to any of his criticisms. I want to turn to that now. The House agrees about the importance of savings, especially long-term savings. The key question is how to go about it. That is why it was disappointing that the Chief Secretary did not answer any of the points that were made, although I understand why.

I have four main points. The first concerns the £50,000 limit on existing PEPs and TESSAs. My right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden made many criticisms on that, all of which I agree with, and some of which I want to reinforce. I agree that it is insulting that the Minister who introduced this ceiling has done well in many ways through tax avoidance, and so on. That is so well documented that I shall not repeat it.

I shall comment on the key points, starting with the retrospective nature of the proposals. The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) put it well in his question. People who entered into PEPs—this is not so much true of TESSAs—thought that the tax regime would last. They were reassured by the Chief Secretary before the general election that it would. They invested year after year, often, as the right hon. Member for Caernarfon said, not only for short to mid-term savings but to pay for mortgages. More important, many people chose them as their form of pension, rather than taking personal pensions if they did not have occupational schemes, or as a supplement to their pensions. They now find a change in tax legislation which, in many cases, will severely reduce the benefit that they were getting from those savings. For someone who started saving in 1987, £50,000 is not a huge sum today, given the improvements in the stock markets. The first point is that the Government's proposal is retrospective legislation.

The second point is the volatility of the issue. We do not know what the position will be next year in relation to PEPs. The stock market may not continue as it is at present. Some people will find themselves unexpectedly above or below that £50,000 line, and they will do so thereafter.

Thirdly, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden made clear, £50,000 is not a substantial sum in terms of the income produced, particularly after retirement. It will produce nothing like what most personal pensions and certainly occupational pensions will produce. To cut the sum off at £50,000 when so many people are relying on it is the exact reverse of what the Government said that they were about—encouraging people to save for their retirement.

That leads me to my final point on the £50,000 limit. I plead with the right hon. Gentleman to think seriously about this. How will people enter into future savings schemes with tax incentives, if they see that there has been such a dramatic change in these? The right hon. Gentleman said that some parts of the ISAs are meant to be short term, but if these are fundamentally meant to be long-term saving schemes, and if the Government, who said before the election that they would not make such a move, now do so, who will believe that they or a future Government will not change again?

That is one of my most fundamental worries, linked to the retrospective aspect. I entirely agree that tax incentives are an important way of encouraging long-term savings. If we reduce the credibility of tax incentives by making this move, we will have undermined the specific long-term objective that we are all seeking to achieve. I plead with the Chief Secretary to think seriously about the limit.

The simple answer is to say that all schemes up to now should remain within the tax net in which everyone expected them to remain. As we know, TESSAs will drop out, by their very nature. Everyone knew that they entered that scheme for a five-year period. No one can complain about TESSAs dropping out, because when people entered the contract, they knew the terms.

However, PEPs are different. The Government ought to have said that, as from a given date, there will be no further opportunities to engage in TESSAs and PEPs, but that all those who already have them should be allowed to continue with them and to come out of them when they wish to do so. That is the simple answer, which deals with all the arguments that I have advanced, but, above all, with the point that it is essential to maintain belief and credibility among the population at large that tax incentives given for long-term savings are maintained.

My second general point is that the Government are in a muddle about the relationship between ISAs and the stakeholder pension. I believe that it is important to encourage many more people, especially at a younger age, to save for their retirement. I think that that is also the Government's objective.

The House is aware of the issues—the fact that the state pension will no longer provide enough. All public opinion surveys show that the public have at last got that message, although they have not sufficiently grasped the importance of their doing something about it. We know about the problem of retirement in nursing homes. We know that people live longer. All those factors mean that we must build on the already considerable success that we have achieved, especially in relation to the rest of the European Union and most other countries, to encourage occupational and personal pensions.

We all agree that that should be the main objective. I am in total sympathy with the Government about the need to find a way of enabling those who do not have personal or occupational pensions to have them. I therefore look forward to the stakeholder pension document. I put a much higher priority on that than on the ISAs, but the Government have presented a proposal first for ISAs, which are apparently designed for the same low-income groups as the stakeholder pensions will be. I cannot see the attraction of an ISA to those lower-income groups.

Let me elaborate. I have read all the responses to the consultation document, and many of them argue that we should have a compulsory third pension—we already have a compulsory second pension. If that is the direction in which we move, and I am reluctantly beginning to come to the view that that must be done, low-income groups will not have any extra income to put into an ISA, on top of the compulsory second or third pension, however one wishes to describe it. They will move into the pension area, which some of them will find difficult enough, and they will have very little to contribute to ISAs.

Secondly, ISAs will provide only limited benefits to lower-income groups. They would do worse on equities than they would under the existing PEP regime. Supposing people put up to £1,000, as they will be allowed to do in the existing ISA, into a deposit scheme, I calculate that the benefit to an individual from going into an ISA through cash will be under £5 a year. That is not a big attraction for going into an ISA: £5 a year for five years and that is it—no more after that.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be wrong for someone in that income group to put the money in an ISA? It would be far better to put it in a pension, so that the money is there for the future. The Government's proposal creates a temptation that is all wrong in public policy terms.

Mr. MacGregor: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. If the second—or third—pension is compulsory, that is what people will have to do anyway. We are setting up elaborate machinery, designed apparently for the low-income groups, which will be of little interest to them. Given the likely charges and costs, which I shall deal with later, that would probably be the wrong thing for them to do as a means of efficient saving. I would not quite call it a fraud, but it is a pretty poor prospectus—a con—for the low-income groups. The proposals for ISAs and stakeholder pensions should have been considered together. If they had been, the Government might have come to a different view.

I am all in favour of savings regimes with tax incentives for the middle and upper-income groups, for whom PEPs have largely been of benefit up to now. It is not just low-income groups who need to save for their retirement. We all know that one of the most devastatingly difficult problems to deal with is the case of people in middle-income groups who have to sell their family home to provide for nursing homes. Part of the objective is to encourage them, through PEPs and other regimes, to accumulate some liquid savings to deal with that situation when it arises, as it will for many in any age when people live so much longer.

I am strongly in favour of PEPs—indeed, as Chief Secretary, I took them through the House in the Finance Bill—but I am certainly not going out to sell the advantages of a PEP or of an ISA on the basis that it will be of great benefit to low-income groups, because that is not the case. The Government have got into a muddle.

One of the problems that have arisen from encouraging savings through occupational or other pensions is that those are available only to people with earned income. That is a strong criticism of the existing system, given that life styles are different, and people go in and out of work more frequently. The way to tackle that is for those who are not currently earning but who have some disposable income to be encouraged to put it into pension schemes with the same tax reliefs, rather than into ISAs.

Through their approach, the Government have clobbered the PEP saver. They have already clobbered pension savers through their measure on advance corporation tax in the last Budget. They are not putting in place a regime that is attractive enough to the people whom they intend to help. I hope that the forthcoming Budget does not contain any other measures to hit contributions or savings going into pension schemes. If further tax reliefs were taken away from contributions, that would be further evidence that the Government were not serious about what they claim to be their objectives, because their actions go in the opposite direction.

The last two points that I shall make are somewhat related. The first is the need to encourage the market and people out there to take up ISAs, if those are to be introduced. The second is the regulatory regime. When we were considering introducing PEPs—as I said, I took the legislation through the House—I said regularly that we had to give incentives to the marketplace, which is the financial services industry, to encourage it to sell PEPs. I was bothered then that the scheme that we were introducing, which had a limit of £2,400, would not prove sufficiently attractive to the financial services industry to enable it to recoup the costs of selling the scheme. However, I was happy to see the scheme start, because at least there was a regime and a tax incentive on the statute book on which we could build.

That is precisely what occurred. The take-up was low in the early years. As the conditions were relieved—we allowed some investment in shares in foreign companies, and the £2,400 limit was raised effectively to £9,000—there was massive take-up both by the industry and by individual savers. The Government should give the financial services industry—I shall turn to Tesco, Marks and Spencer and so on later—some incentive so that it can make the scheme work. The more the Government criticise the financial services industry without appreciating that point, the less successful the scheme will be. I urge the Government to acknowledge the importance of that argument with regard to PEPs.

The Government are doing something quite different with ISAs. According to the conditions outlined in the consultation document, they are producing a scheme that the industry will find difficult to market at low cost. First, the product is anything but simple, so advice must be provided. Secondly, the Government are insisting that a single manager should handle all the different elements of the scheme every year. It will be extremely difficult for individual providers to monitor those elements, and there will an associated cost. Thirdly, we have the limits. The industry will not take up ISAs easily—the vast range of respondents who criticise the scheme in the consultation document make that point based on their experience.

That leads me to ask whether we can simplify the product and sell it differently. I am in favour of Virgin, Marks and Spencer and others trying to simplify the product and using their marketing skills to reach a wider clientele. However, the product will not be easy to sell. It is suggested that people from low-income groups will be able to take up ISAs at the cash till, having asked the cashier what it means and what they should do with it. That is not on. It will not happen like that—if it does, there will be massive mis-selling on a huge scale for which the Government will have to take the blame. The product as it stands will not be easy to sell, so there will be an associated cost.

That brings me to my point about the regulatory regime. I am trying to be as objective as I can, because there has been too much criticism of pension mis-selling by Labour Members who do not understand the basics. If we introduce complicated schemes such as this, we must ensure that those who take them up receive proper advice—and there is a cost attached to providing that advice. There is a cost attached to administering the scheme and a big cost attached to tracking the £50,000 limit to which I have referred already.

There is a direct contradiction between the Government's comments about the regulatory regime, and their lambasting of the industry for high costs and charges, and the purportedly low-cost scheme that they have introduced. I am in favour of the Government's attempts to reduce costs and charges—that is a highly desirable aim. However, if the Government go down that route, they must recognise that the regulatory regime will have to change. We cannot maintain the current prescriptive and difficult regulatory regime.

In the event of any so-called "misselling", this or a future Government must not be able to blame those who sold the product. We must recognise that those who buy financial products assume a certain amount of the risk—it is caveat emptor to a certain extent. If we invest in equities in an ISA, and another unit trust performs better, we cannot blame the provider of the poor-performing trust. That would be ludicrous. There is a vast difference in the performance of unit trusts in any one year, so there must be a certain amount of understanding and give and take. The only way forward is to have the simplest possible regulatory regime with a kite mark—it could be a benchmark, but I prefer a kite mark—set by the Government. Providers could then follow that kite mark without needing to worry about redress—which could be enormously expensive—if it is thought subsequently that their original selling was wrong.

I plead with the Government to appreciate that they must understand what happens in the marketplace—not in the tax avoidance industry, but at the bottom end where the low-income groups are involved—regarding selling and the regulatory regime. I know from my experience in the London and Manchester Group that encouraging people on modest incomes to save can be a labour-intensive exercise, and therefore a costly business. However, that is how we shall achieve our objectives. The scheme and the regulatory regime must be made much simpler.

I do not seek to make a partisan point: I genuinely believe that the Government have got it wrong. I believe that the scheme is wrong and that the £50,000 limit is dangerous and unfair on those who have invested to date. It is a breach of the retrospective principle. The Government must take into account the relationship between ISAs and the stakeholder pension, and recognise that ISAs will not be particularly attractive to those in the low-income group—although I favour some form of saving of that sort.

I fully understand why the Chief Secretary could not reveal today the Government's response to the consultation document. However, I hope that the Chancellor will introduce a totally different scheme in two weeks that responds to all the objections that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden raised.

4.56 pm

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): I begin by responding to the comments of the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). He said that PEPs had no advantages for the low-income group; I shall outline the advantages of ISAs in my speech today. Before I do that, I must express my admiration at the desperate attempt by the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the shadow Chancellor, to save his job. However, I think that he failed and I am sure that he will not hold that position much longer. He made a vindictive and petty speech, in which he failed to address seriously the issues of the day.

It is interesting to witness the politics of envy: Conservative Members are envious of anyone who is successful in this country. That is quite astonishing.

I am waiting for a response from the Opposition, but there is none, as usual. The right hon. Gentleman launched a completely unnecessary attack on Ministers in a very important debate about the future of savings in this country. I welcome the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has apologised for one remark, but I think that he should reconsider many of his comments in light of today's debate.

Of all hon. Members, I am qualified to speak in this debate because—as I am sure Opposition Members know—until 1 May, I was employed by Legal and General, which is a major pension and savings provider. In 1986, when the then Chancellor, Nigel Lawson, introduced PEPs, I was in the marketing department of Legal and General. We faced the quandary of deciding what the PEPs products meant.

We looked carefully at Nigel Lawson's Budget speech in 1986. He said, for example, that "it is the long-term ambition of this Government to make the British people a nation of share owners . . . in which more and more men and women have a direct personal stake in British business and industry."

This is not about privatisation; it is about personal equity plans. The then Chancellor continued:

"I propose . . . a radical new scheme to encourage direct investment in United Kingdom equities . . . it is specially designed to encourage smaller savers, and particularly those who may never previously have invested in equities in their lives."

His final comment on the PEPs scheme in March 1986 was:

"I am confident . . . it will bring about a dramatic extension of share ownership in Britain."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 177-78.]

Those words, 11 years later, are wrong. What we in the marketing department discovered in 1986 was that it was not possible to put those words into action, because PEPs were not about greater share ownership. They were about allowing the better-off in society the opportunity to save in a tax-free vehicle. There would be nothing wrong with that if the Government in 1986 had been honest, but they were not because PEPs were not an attempt to bring about greater share ownership. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has just asked me whether the year was 1986. It was.

I will take the House through the PEPs issue in its entirety. Fewer than one in 100 of the poorest households in the United Kingdom have any form of tax-free share investments, whereas more than a quarter of the wealthiest do. That shows clearly that, as the right hon. Member for South Norfolk said, there is no advantage in PEPs for low-income groups. He is right. It is his Front Benchers who are getting it wrong by trying to defend PEPs and TESSAs. I looked at the pledges that the Conservative party made in its manifesto to rectify the point that the right hon. Gentleman made. Nothing in it corrects the anomaly that there is no advantage in PEPs for low-income groups.

Mr. Loughton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the latest Association of Private Client and Investment Managers and Stockbrokers figures show that earners down even as far as the fourth decile use PEPs extensively; that more than half the people who invest in PEPs are basic rate tax payers; and that 20 per cent. do not pay any tax? Does he agree?

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman might like to get a copy of the Institute for Financial Studies briefing paper on this, which is widely available, including in the Library. It says that 49.65 per cent. of households in the United Kingdom have no investments; that 40.27 per cent. have some investments but no PEP; that 4.62 per cent. have no investments other than a PEP; and that 5.46 per cent. have a PEP and some other investments. That does not seem to bear out the hon. Gentleman's point. Only 4.62 per cent. of households in the United Kingdom have no investments other than a PEP.

Mr. MacGregor: I should clarify what I said, and what I meant. One has to define low-income groups. If by that one means the groups to whom the company with which I am involved, London and Manchester, often appeals, and the groups to whom the £1,000 cash limit is meant to appeal, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the low-income group is unlikely to be attracted by PEPs. There is a substantial range of income groups who did not previously invest in equities, but who have been encouraged by the PEP regime and the other ways in which we have encouraged savings.

Mr. Caplin: I do not think that I have denied that the previous Government attempted to encourage savings, and that PEPs and TESSAs are worthwhile causes, but have they encouraged many to save? They have not. I have just amplified the point that fewer than 5 per cent. of households in the United Kingdom have no investments other than a PEP. In that respect, no Government with any reasonable ambition for wider savings could sit on their hands and do nothing. That would be a travesty, but that was the proposal in the Conservative party's manifesto in 1997. Perhaps the Conservatives, like the rest of the country, knew that they would lose the election. I do not know.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies document says clearly that, on average, as the right hon. Gentleman will know, PEP holders are older and richer than non-PEP holders. In other words, the industry and the then Government aimed PEPs at people in the 50-plus age group.

Nigel Lawson said in 1986 that PEPs were about widening share ownership in the United Kingdom. The Conservatives must answer the question whether PEPs have achieved that. PEPs have not achieved their goal. Indeed, the financial research survey shows that the same type of people invest in PEPs as hold stakes in normal unit trusts. Unit trusts do not have tax incentives whereas PEPs do, yet the same type of people are investing in both. Unit trusts and PEPs are concentrated among those who are over 55.

Mr. Loughton: The hon. Gentleman's figures seem to be completely out of tally with those of the industry. Is he aware that the Association of Unit Trusts and Investment Funds has carried out a survey that suggests that 78 per cent. of unit trust holders who also have a PEP would not invest in those unit trusts if they were not "PEPable"?

Mr. Caplin: I will not bandy figures with the hon. Gentleman. I do not know where he got that survey from.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): That is the same point that my hon. Friend is making.

Mr. Loughton indicated assent.

Mr. Caplin: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is agreeing that only 5 per cent. of households in the United Kingdom have only PEPs.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The overlap.

Mr. Caplin: I think that the hon. Gentleman was talking about 22 per cent. of those who have unit trusts and PEPs.

[Mr. Caplin]

I will try to make some progress, as I think that Opposition Members are getting a bit bored. [Interruption.] You are obviously not bored, as you keep intervening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must remember that he is addressing the Chair.

Mr. Caplin: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had not forgotten.

I shall make some points about the financial research survey carried out by NOP. I am sure that the shadow Chancellor has seen it, as he is well versed in these issues. The survey shows that 57 per cent. of adults in this country have less than £500 in any savings scheme, including PEPs, and that 85 per cent. of people in socio-economic classes D and E have less than £500 in savings or investments, so PEPs and TESSAs have not worked. They have not got the masses to save.

The question put to me by the right hon. Member for South Norfolk was whether, going up the salary scale, greater use had been made of PEPs? I am afraid that the answer is no. Those with incomes between £25,000 and £35,000 have less than £2,000 in savings or investments. The previous Government failed in their savings policy for PEPs and TESSAs.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): If the hon. Gentleman's figures are true—for the sake of the argument, let us assume that they are—would he advise the same proportion of the population on low incomes to contribute to an ISA before they contribute to a stakeholder pension?

Mr. Caplin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, but I am not—and nor is he—qualified to give advice on financial products. That would be against the current regulatory regime. When one comes from the industry, one is aware of the traps when colleagues ask questions about financial services. I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman for suggesting that I should advise him on financial matters in the House of Commons. We cannot do that.

The shadow Chancellor made some disgraceful comments about the consultation process on future savings on which the Government have embarked. Opposition Members seem to have a problem with the word "consultation". For 18 years, it meant not consultation, but "This is what we shall do; we want you to sign up to it". When we say "consultation" and invite comments from the industry and all interested parties, including political parties, we mean it. In the past few weeks, I have been out and about speaking to colleagues in my old industry. People in the industry are debating vigorously the future of savings, but no one believes that the status quo, as proposed by the Conservatives in their 1997 manifesto, is a starter. People welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate about the future of savings.

I have already owned up to having been in the industry when pensions were mis-sold in the late 1980s. I finished my career working as head of quality in Legal and General's compliance department, which was growing more quickly than the marketing department. That may have been a sign of the failure of the regulatory regime that the Tories gave us in the Financial Services Act 1986. It is now widely accepted that it has failed badly.

It would have been nice for the House to hear the person who was responsible for the mis-selling of pensions, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden, apologise to the House today for the fact that hundreds of thousands of people were mis-sold pensions. He had the opportunity to do so today and in the Budget debate in July, but he has failed to apologise time and again. He must be judged in those terms.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk said that the ISA is a product. In pure marketing terms, it is not a product, but a concept. It can become a product only once we have devised how it will be sold. I have attempted not to be partisan about that.

I have outlined in detail why PEPs and TESSAs have failed to extend savings. It is right that any Government should consult widely in an attempt to do that, which is what this Government have done. Ultimately, we shall have an effective and sensible product which will make savings available to the many. That must be the aim of every right hon. and hon. Member, because PEPs and TESSAs have clearly failed to do that in the past.

5.12 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): May I couch my remarks primarily in terms of the Government's declared objective, which is to spread the savings culture and encourage low-income savers? That objective should be judged as laudable and sensible. I regret that the Conservative amendment makes not even a passing reference to that problem, although the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) made some pertinent remarks about it.

The hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) summarised very well the problem of low-income savings. The figures are reasonably well known: roughly a third of households have no financial assets and many of them are in debt. The reasons are profound and not easy to overcome. Many people simply do not have the money to save. The whole institutional structure discourages them from saving because there are relatively large returns for people with large bank deposits and smaller returns for those with small bank deposits. Those on low incomes sensibly and rationally discount saving and, unless spectacularly high returns are offered, keep such savings as they have in cash. The test of ISAs is whether they can overcome that.

Despite the Government's objectives, many of the proposals are disappointing. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk gave a good arithmetical example to illustrate the reasons for that. The logic of his arithmetic was that, under the Chancellor's newly proposed 10 per cent. income tax band, a £1,000 deposit with a 5 per cent. yield would give the saver an extra £5. If the saver falls below the 10 per cent. band, he would get nothing. The Government intend to compensate for that by some kind of bonus, but when one studies the details of the bonus, the word that comes to mind is "pathetic". They propose that 50 out of the prospective 6 million new savers be allowed to take part in a prize draw to claim £1,000. That is the kind of sum that one would get in a respectable summer village fete. It is not a large inducement to save, especially for low-income savers.

May I suggest, in a constructive spirit, how the Government might deal with that problem? One route is to adopt the Government's philosophy of rewarding reasonably good balances. Why not take up the proposal of the Liverpool Victoria Provident Society, for example, which suggests that small savers could be rewarded with a generous entitlement to premium bonds or a large portfolio of free lottery tickets? That is an attractive proposal.

I am surprised that no one so far has mentioned the fact that the benefit system severely damages the incentive for those on low incomes to save. Many low-income families are caught in a savings trap, just as they are caught in a poverty trap when they try to work. This weekend, I dealt with a lady who is having serious problems with the Department of Social Security. The DSS was in arrears of payment and, now that it has eventually paid the several hundred pounds owing into the lady's bank account, it is trying to claw back entitlement to supplementary income support because she has a few hundred pounds' savings in her bank account. Such practice is common under the benefit system. I hope that the Government will rule that all benefits paid to low-income savers can be credited as a savings disregard. I also hope that they will make some positive suggestions, in the Budget if not today, about how the savings disregard could operate more flexibly to help low-income savers.

My main criticism is that, although the Government's intentions for low-income savers seem admirable and should be supported, the incentives are weak. Most hon. Members have received a lot of representations about the £50,000 limit. Many people in Twickenham have written to me about it. I am not referring to some abstract philosophical problem with retrospective taxation—the Conservatives have missed the point in that respect, because it is not a basic point of principle. All Governments have chiselled away retrospectively at mortgage income tax relief, for example. That is common practice. The real problem is practical: the marketing of new savings instruments is undermined once it becomes clear that the Government tamper with hindsight in returns from successful products. That is what is happening with PEPs and TESSAs.

There is also a serious administrative problem. Under the PEP scheme, many people have 10 different accounts. Will there be a centralised register so that those can all be monitored? Potentially, there could be an administrative nightmare in capturing the extent to which people exceed their lifetime ceiling. The Inland Revenue has laid off 6,000 people and is already under pressure. It simply does not have the capacity to handle such administrative problems.

It would appear from leaks in the financial press that the Government have already thought about that problem. I therefore suggest that the £50,000 cumulative limit on TESSAs and PEPs be waived. If it were waived, a lifetime ceiling would be illogical, because the Government could impose the necessary restrictions on tax relief through the annual limit. Clearing up the system in such a way would deal with many of the objections of Opposition Members.

My final point relates to the reform's implications for public expenditure. The Chief Secretary gave a clear and helpful response to my earlier intervention, but my hon. Friends and I have been trying to get to the bottom of the matter for months and have received different answers from different Ministers. On 10 December 1997, the Prime Minister said at Question Time that there would be more relief than is currently available, but on 17 December, the Chancellor told the Treasury Select Committee that he was working within a ceiling of £1.5 billion, which is quite different and implies that significant savings will result from the reform.

The correspondence that we have had with Treasury officials to clarify the matter essentially confirms what the Chief Secretary said: the existing level of tax relief will apply for the first two or three years, but there will be a flatter profile after that, which is a technical way of saying that savings will result from the scheme. That is not simply a debating point: if savings are made, those resources should go into improving the scheme.

Two major improvements—to the £50,000 retrospective limit and to bounties or incentives for low-income savers—could be made to the scheme. If the Government can reassure us on those points, we shall support the ISA scheme in principle.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I am grateful for the chance to speak in the debate because financial services are of great importance to my constituents. I was particularly interested when the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) said that Conservative policy was, somehow, in the best interests of middle Britain. I represent a constituency in middle Britain, which I took from the Conservative party. The financial reality faced by my constituents bears little resemblance to that which the right hon. Gentleman described. An estimated 9,000 people in Northampton need help with debt problems. Many of my constituents have no savings, but are sold more credit than they can manage. They are living at the limit of their income and have nothing to fall back on, even if they run into small family problems. Therein lie most of their problems.

I shall consider the individual savings accounts proposal from the viewpoint of my constituents in middle Britain with incomes of about £16,000 and mortgages of about £40,000. Most of those who have provided for continuing care have done so with insurance policies. I understand the problems that the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) mentioned, but he described them from the provider's viewpoint. That does not gainsay the need for a vehicle to ensure that the consumer has access to good financial services and good returns on savings.

The fact that 40 per cent. of the population have no savings has been referred to often. That figure is bad enough, but the position is worse. The Consumers Association recommends that people should have three to six months' savings to fall back on. For my constituents, that means £4,000 to £8,000, yet fewer than half of all savers have savings approaching that sum. Not only are people not saving; even those with savings do not have enough to protect themselves against the proverbial rainy day.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) quoted figures showing that people with children, whether couples or single people, have the lowest savings. I strongly believe that the complex problems surrounding savings and debt, as much as those surrounding benefits and work, must be solved if we are to tackle child poverty. It is not good enough to accept the fact that families with children are the most vulnerable to financial ups and downs.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hove said, TESSAs and PEPs have failed to deal with the problem. Although they attracted huge investment from private individuals, those people were not necessarily new savers and certainly were not on lower incomes. That failure is especially true of PEPs: one in four of the top 10 per cent. of earners have a PEP, but fewer than one in 100 of the bottom 10 per cent. have one.

The involvement of the wider public in share ownership has increased, but has recently tailed off among the young and those on lower incomes, partly because of marketing changes and the ending of the previous Government's privatisation advertising campaigns. The real problem with TESSAs and PEPs is that, although tax breaks undoubtedly encouraged investment, tax benefits mostly went to those who were already in higher income groups, which is why the proposed saving scheme with tax advantages for low-income earners is so welcome. Individual savings accounts will benefit the many, not the few.

It is especially important that ISAs will provide access to different types of investment. Conservative Members described that as a complication; I think that it is an advantage. People on lower incomes have tended to use only certain financial services, such as bank, building society and credit union savings accounts, which carry fewer risks, but offer lower rewards. If we are serious about fuller participation in the economy, people on lower incomes must have access to the sophisticated financial products that are on the market.

The industry may find the ISA formula complex, but it is relatively simple for the consumer to understand. Another important feature is easier access; I welcome the Government's intention to make schemes available through supermarkets. I have struggled through shopping centres with small children in tow, so I know the value of one-stop shopping. Other retailers may not like the idea, but consumers, especially women with young children, increasingly hope and expect to do the bulk of their shopping, pay their bills and bank in one shop.

The quality of ISAs will depend, in part, on the quality of the supermarket from which they are available. That is no different from supermarket banking or products such as Virgin PEPs.

Mr. Loughton: How will the hon. Lady get best advice among the frozen peas and discounted yoghurt at the checkout at Tesco or Sainsburys?

Ms Keeble: I shall return to that serious point. As I said in relation to Virgin PEPs, the quality of financial services depends, to an extent, on branding. The quality of financial advice is a serious issue—it does not have to be a problem—which the Government must address in response to the consultation.

The issue of the quality of financial advice is not exclusive to PEPs and TESSAs. A number of high street banks are shutting local branches, and financial products are marketed aggressively on the radio and can be bought over the telephone. There is a wider issue: personal banking service providers must give good advice to people who are looking into financial services while buying peas and yoghurts in a supermarket. Although ISAs may be complex for the industry to manage, they will be accessible to the consumer, which is a particular advantage for those who would otherwise be locked out of the increasingly sophisticated financial services market. Moreover, as I have said, banks are closing branches, and supermarkets are likely to become increasingly the most convenient—and sometimes the only—point of access.

The possibility of individual savings accounts being offered through credit unions is an important development which is often overlooked. Credit unions have been the poor relation of financial services in Britain, but the advent of the first national credit union—organised by the bakers' union, backed by Unity Trust bank—has changed that, allowing people to deduct amounts from their payroll.

I hope that when the Government produce their final proposals for individual savings accounts, they will address two issues. I have referred to the provision of financial advice for those who buy such accounts at supermarkets. The other issue is the amount of savings that people are to be allowed to hold before being disqualified from receiving various kinds of benefit, especially if they have chosen life insurance as one of their options for individual savings accounts.

I hope that the Government will consider those two issues, for a reason in addition to those given by Opposition Members. I think that they will particularly affect women who, although they want to save, may either find it difficult to gain access to good financial services and advice or feel concerned about the impact of their savings on benefit entitlement. The figures show that those with the least savings are, overwhelmingly, single parents, only about 20 per cent. of whom have any savings at all.

Much has been made of the £50,000 limit. We used to hear a good deal about the impact on PEP mortgages, but, according to information provided in Hansard, if both partners in a couple exercise their full rights they can support a combined PEP mortgage of some £250,000. Whatever the financial problems of people in middle Britain, they certainly do not focus on mortgages of a quarter of a million pounds. That error of judgment may have contributed to the Conservative party's losing its hold on middle Britain.

I believe that the plans for the individual savings account are both bold and ambitious. I believe that they provide people who have so far been excluded with access to a range of modern financial services. They combine imaginative and innovative features that will attract people who have not saved money before, and, in doing so, they will help to end some of the misery of those who find that lack of money turns a family problem into a financial crisis. I think that these will be savings accounts for the many, not the few, and that they will give more people just the kind of financial independence and choice that this Labour Government are all about.

5.32 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) made a thoughtful speech. In her summing up, she referred to the need for advice to be available within the general context of savings schemes. It is interesting that she raised the question without having an answer to it, simply pointing out that it needed to be addressed by Government. I certainly agree with that. Another point that the hon. Lady made in summing up related to the effect of the level of savings on benefits, which I intend to discuss in my own short speech.

The subject of pensions and savings may seem dry to those who are young and a long way from retirement age, but I have long been interested in it. I may be the only Member of Parliament to have recently taken the trustees' examination of the Pensions Management Institute; I am also the independent chairman of a pension fund. Given that Lord Nolan puts his nose into most matters nowadays, I suppose I should add that I am not a beneficiary.

This is an issue of raw politics. It goes to the centre of the contrast between the Labour Government and the Conservative party. The Conservative party lives in the tradition of Iain Macleod, who said that it was the duty of Government to provide a framework within which each individual could save, and make himself a modest fortune in his own lifetime. In contrast, the Labour party promised in its manifesto to extend the principle of PEPs and TESSAs, which have done so much to enable many people to build up modest fortunes and look forward to retirement with confidence. There is no doubt that that undertaking to extend the principle of PEPs and TESSAs reassured savers as the election approached, and no doubt that it won votes for the Labour party. I submit that it was a misleading statement, a fraud on the saver and the electorate and a false prospectus.

A striking feature of the Labour Government's current formulation of savings policy is its lack of cohesion. As the Association of British Insurers has pointed out, the consultation paper on ISAs seems to have been written by a different hand from the consultation paper on stakeholder pensions. That is extraordinary. One would have thought that the Government's approach to savings would be within the general framework of their approach to pensions.

There are four main ways in which individuals can prepare for retirement. First, they can save for their pensions through an employment scheme, if they are fortunate enough to be in one. Secondly, they can save through a special additional scheme—the state earnings-related pension scheme, or an alternative private scheme. Thirdly, there is the basic retirement pension. Fourthly, there are personal savings.

I have attended seminars, and have studied the subject of low-cost pensions, which the Government's consultation paper is intended, in due course, to address. The expression "low-cost pensions" has become associated with stakeholder pensions. One certainty, however, is that there is no such thing as a low-cost pension. Any pension that is funded will need to be funded by an amount 15 to 18 times the amount of any required pension. People will need to save substantially if they are to save for their own pensions.

Some people will have had the benefit of saving through occupational pension schemes. Others will have relied on PEPs and TESSAs. I heard the Chief Secretary say that he had always regarded PEPs and TESSAs as complementary to pensions. Of course the Chief Secretary is economically literate. He may well regard PEPs and TESSAs as complementary to pensions, but some people do not, including a clergyman's widow who wrote to me from my constituency. She has been relying on her PEP and TESSA contributions as a significant part—perhaps a major part—of her retirement income. It is not good enough for the Government to change the rules on PEPs and TESSAs, and, effectively, to impose retrospective legislation to change the benefits that people will receive from them, when some have been looking forward to PEPs and TESSAs as the main plank of their retirement arrangements.

Attention has been drawn to the cost of the advice that people will need to take before changing their retirement plans. Legal and General carried out a survey, asking people how much they would think it reasonable to pay for advice on insurance and retirement provision. Most regarded £60—younger people said £50—as a reasonable amount to pay for advice on retirement provision. As the hon. Member for Northampton, North said, however, advice is needed, and the Government have now demanded that it be of high quality. The normal rate charged by a pensions or insurance adviser is about £150 an hour. No one can believe that it is possible for a pensions adviser to give realistic and sensible advice in 20 minutes. He cannot do so in less than two hours, given the time that it takes to appraise the position. That will cost £300 plus VAT—in other words, £335—which, incidentally, amounts to two thirds of 1 per cent. of a £50,000 fund. Those who wished to rely on PEPs, TESSAs and ISAs under a Labour Government have been badly let down.

Another issue that has not yet been raised in this debate is the implication of the savings trap, which the hon. Member for Northampton, North mentioned. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) clearly had absolutely no idea of the yield on pension funds, or, more important, of the capital sum required to provide a pension. The savings trap will have dramatic effects on savings for pensions. If savings are limited to £50,000, as they may be under ISAs, and if that sum is the sole pension provision, it will yield only £256 per month—£3,072 annually—in annuity for a 65-year-old married man, allowing for the normal 3 per cent. inflation expectation.

If someone with no other pension or savings receives a state pension of £5,083 annually, income support at the level of £330 annually, housing benefit at £2,080 annually and council tax benefit of £312 annually, his or her net annual income will be £7,805. However, if that individual has saved £50,000 in an ISA, the additional amount that he or she will receive will be only an extra £400 annually. Therefore, £50,000 which has been saved over the years will yield only four-fifths of 1 per cent.—representing a serious savings trap with which the Government must deal.

A 45-year-old man who expects to retire at 65 and has no other savings or pension would have absolutely no incentive to save for retirement unless his pension will amount to £4,132 annually, allowing for 3 per cent. inflation. Therefore, if he cannot save £65,000, he would be better off simply blowing his money and not bothering to save.

The message is quite clear: individuals who wish to prepare for their own retirement should start early and keep saving. Although individuals might well support a cap on the annual commitment to their pension or savings fund, it is not acceptable for them to have on overall cap of £50,000, as that would render such savings completely pointless. If such a scheme were to be their only method of savings, regrettably, there would be no point in their saving £50,000.

Are the Government small-minded and ignorant about those matters? No; the situation is worse than that. The Government, having won the general election by reassuring holders of PEPs and TESSAs, are now ditching those individuals. The losers will be many: those who believed the Labour Government when they said that they would extend the benefits of PEPs and TESSAs. The only beneficiary of the change, should it happen, will be the Treasury, which will save £800 million annually in tax relief on PEPs and £450 million annually in tax relief on TESSAs.

5.42 pm

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): The debate had a very unfortunate start. Nevertheless, both Labour and Opposition Members have made some valuable points. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) made some valuable points on the interaction of pensions and savings vehicles, such as individual savings accounts and personal equity plans. The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) made some useful points on pension yields, although those who can afford to invest will rarely rely on only one vehicle.

It is useful to start such debates with some history. The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) began his speech with some remarks about the previous Government's policy to promote savings. Lord Lawson—in his book, "The View from No. 11"—was much more frank about the matter, making it quite clear that policy was not thought up by the Conservative party, and that he got the idea from a law passed in France in 1978. The comments of the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden were therefore partly a mis-selling of Tory innovation.

The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden mentioned promoting savings. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) rightly said, PEPs were originally designed to widen share ownership. In his book, Lord Lawson says:

"I was always very cautious about describing PEPs as savings incentives."

He went on to admit that PEPs were intended more to widen share ownership. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hove said, that intention was not fully realised, as those who already had shares moved into PEPs because they were a tax-efficient means of investing.

Conservative Members have suggested that the PEPs and TESSAs savings regimes are long established and almost sacrosanct. They also mentioned retrospectivity, which I shall deal with later in my speech. Conservative Members should remember that they changed the mortgage interest relief at source regime, which affected the tax advantages gained by putting one's investment—if one considers it as such—into housing. If the introduction of ISAs represents retrospective legislation, changing the MIRAS regime certainly represented retrospective legislation.

PEPs did not take off in the early years—until 1991, fewer than 50,000 had been sold. They have been bought in large quantities in only the past five or six years—so that now, according to one estimate, there are up to 2.5 million PEPs. TESSAs were introduced only in 1991, although TESSA ownership has grown more smoothly than PEP ownership. Nevertheless, only about 4.5 million people currently have TESSA savings. We are therefore debating not schemes that have been approved over generations but recent institutional developments. Hon. Members should therefore be much more careful when mentioning retrospectivity.

Labour Members have made some important points about the extent of TESSA and PEP ownership among the public, and Conservative Members have said much about how middle Britain will be hit—although the statistics do not begin to support their comments. My hon. Friend the Member for Hove cited the 1995 British household panel survey which showed that almost 50 per cent. of households had absolutely no investments—no shares, no bank accounts, no building society accounts and no friendly society holdings—and that only 10 per cent. had PEPs. Therefore, only a very small segment of society has such investments.

The 1996 family expenditure survey showed that just over 10 per cent. of families held TESSAs. If we go further and examine the type of people who comprise that 10 per cent. of the population, a point made by Labour Members is confirmed: wealthier and older segments of the population hold such institutional savings accounts and investments. The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden talked about small savers—but they are small savers with very large incomes.

I am not as cynical as Gillian O'Connor was last week in the Financial Times, when she rather acerbically said that the PEPs regime had been a licence for the middle class to print money. Nevertheless, the report by Andrew Dilnot and his colleagues at the Institute of Fiscal Studies demonstrates the limited ownership of those investment vehicles.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hove cited the figures, so I shall not repeat them, but it is clear, from the percentage of households with at least one PEP, that ownership is concentrated among the richest 10 per cent. A quarter of that cohort own PEPs. We should also bear in mind distribution by age. Ownership is highest among households aged between 50 and 59.

The report reveals that TESSAs are similarly concentrated among older and richer households. Again, the highest ownership rate is among those aged between 50 and 59 and more than 70 per cent. of TESSAs are owned by households in the top 50 per cent. in terms of income.

To anyone other than the Opposition, that would raise an interesting and important issue of public policy—how to involve other segments of the population in saving. The ISA proposals are designed to address that.

Opposition Members have not addressed other disadvantages with the existing regime of PEPs and TESSAs, such as the inflexibility of the TESSA regime. The report by the Institute of Fiscal Studies demonstrates that, because of their inflexibility TESSAs are not held by the sections of the population that one would normally expect to invest in them. People in their 50s, and particularly those in their 40s, need ready access to money to meet particular contingencies and the TESSA regime is far too inflexible.

There are also disadvantages in the PEPs regime. The hon. Member for Gosport touched on the fact that PEPs do not roll over to surviving partners in the event of the death of the investor. There are also marketing problems. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary mentioned that the management charges in respect of many PEPs were quite significant and in some cases outweighed the tax relief.

There are further problems. Some companies in the PEP market had to cease taking new business until they had sorted out their problems. A couple of months ago, Kevin Goldstein-Jackson wrote in his column in the Financial Times:

"In July 1995, I pointed out that many people had been persuaded to invest in Peps in order to 'save' tax—but the only tax they saved was that on dividend income. This was because many of them had invested sums which, had they been used to buy shares directly, would not have been subject to capital gains tax since they were within the exemption limit."

In other words, there was a mis-selling of PEPs. So there are problems in the existing system and, more important, there are grave disadvantages in terms of the coverage of current investment vehicles.

I now come to the ISA proposals which aim to increase the coverage in the general population. We want to encourage saving. Half the population hardly save at all. In 1995–96, the family expenditure survey revealed that more than a third of households had no financial assets—no bank accounts and no shares.

Mr. Loughton: The hon. Gentleman has said that for the third time.

Mr. Cranston: The hon. Gentleman does not want to hear the facts. He has never been concerned with empirical evidence, only rhetoric.

The ISA proposals are designed to get new savers involved. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary drew attention to the tax expenditure aspects of the current regime. In 1997–98, the figure was £1.25 billion and it would rise to £1.7 billion by 2001 under the current regime. Given the enormous tax expenditure, the idea is to distribute more widely the advantages that currently benefit a limited section of the population.

Of course, there have been criticisms from some parts of the industry. The shadow Chancellor quoted some industry reaction, but, as Gillian O'Connor said last week in the Financial Times,

"the industry's laments . . . suggest that they had been a nice little earner."

I would not be so cynical, but certainly some parts of the industry have been making a nice little profit from PEPs and TESSAs, and there is nothing wrong with that.

The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden quoted various criticisms. However, he omitted to mention the support for the proposals from various parts of the industry. Roger Cornick, head of marketing at Perpetual, a big provider in the PEPs market, is quoted as being "confident that the company will still get a big slice of the ISA cake".

Mr. Loughton: And the share price fell by 10 per cent.

Mr. Cranston: If the hon. Gentleman examined the figures in the Financial Times more carefully, he would see that it rose again subsequently.

The industry will have to be much more flexible and innovative. At present, some parts of the fund management industry concentrate on equities. Under the ISA proposals, they will have to be more expansive in terms of the products that will fall under the tax shelter. Of course, there will be new institutions involved. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North mentioned the supermarkets, some of which have made very positive comments about the possibility of promoting ISAs.

Lord Lawson explained in his book the great difficulty in the initial years with unit trust companies which were most reluctant and dragged their feet. It was only subsequently that they started to promote PEPs vigorously. ISAs will have to be sold in new ways as well as through the traditional channels. Supermarket checkouts are one possibility. Tesco described ISAs as "a smashing idea". Mr. Newton Scott, chairman of Tesco Personal Life was most complimentary. He was not especially happy with the idea of a prize draw fund, but said that, in his view, to get people on lower incomes involved it might be better to offer groceries and loyalty points, and such points have arisen in the consultation period.

Mr. Caplin: I have no interest in the matter, but is my hon. Friend also aware that Marks and Spencer has also welcomed the proposals for ISAs to attract the widest possible range of savers?

Mr. Cranston: Yes. Marks and Spencer has also been very forward looking, also in respect of the euro, unlike the Opposition.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North mentioned another advantage of ISAs, which is that a wider range of products could be developed. She mentioned deposits with credit unions, national savings products and shares in industrial and provident societies. They should all get a boost from incorporation in ISAs.

There will also be flexibility for investors, who will be able to withdraw their money when particular demands arise. As I said earlier, there is evidence that one off-putting feature of TESSAs is that because of their inflexibility those who might otherwise invest do not do so.

Conservative Members have talked about retrospectivity. They misunderstand the nature of retrospective legislation. It makes unlawful something that was lawful at the time or, in the tax context, renders a past transaction subject to tax that was not applicable at the time. At the most, one could say here that expectations have been disappointed. But I do not think that anyone who deals in the area of taxation can have any such expectations. I gave the example of MIRAS earlier. One has to expect different Chancellors to change taxation regimes. No one can proceed on the basis that regimes will remain unchanged for ever. No one could have had a legitimate expectation that the existing tax regime would remain unchanged.

Mr. Viggers: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. What is his comment on the Labour party's manifesto promise about the future of PEPs and TESSAs?

Mr. Cranston: Our manifesto made it clear that we intended to provide savings vehicles for a wider section of the population. That is what we are doing with our ISA proposals.

[Mr. Cranston]

It has been argued that increased flexibility will result in higher costs for providers than at present—up to 30 per cent. higher, according to one estimate. That demonstrates a misunderstanding of the nature of our financial services industry. Over the past 15 or 20 years, we have had increased competition and innovation. With new providers and managers coming in, I am sure that any increases in costs will be much lower than the figures that are being bandied around.

ISAs will also make the tax system more neutral, reducing the extent to which it distorts investment choices. I would have made further points about the £50,000 limit if I had had more time. Only between 10 and 15 per cent. of PEP holders would be affected by the £50,000 limit. We are talking about a relatively small number of people. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary took up the point about marketing. Given the past problems of pension mis-selling, we have to be cautious about the marketing of the products.

The charging regime must be more transparent than at present. That is one of the disadvantages of the PEP system. One has to go to Chase De Vere's guide to find out how much investing in a PEP will cost. There have to be controls on the operations and the administration of funds.

I congratulate the Government on the ISA proposals. I look forward to the results of the consultation exercise.

6.4 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): I sincerely congratulate my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor on two things: his powerful and compelling speech; and—the Labour party should be grateful to him for this—his altruism in proposing the debate. A more cynical politician might have avoided talking in public about Labour's plans for ISAs and exposing all their shortcomings, perversities and absurdities to Ministers. Instead, he might have let Ministers get on with implementing their plans. When the shambles ensued, as it certainly will—when there was a collapse of tax-incentivised savings vehicles, when the individual aspirations of so many had been shattered, when the proposals had produced a great deal of justifiable resentment—the Conservatives could have made some political capital. My right hon. Friend has decided to take the high road and have a debate before legislation is introduced. We are trying to save the Government from the fate to which they are heading—taking the country with them—by having genuine parliamentary consultation. The debate has already illustrated extraordinary perversities and absurdities in the Government's proposals.

We do not have any quarrel with the objectives that the Government say that they are trying to pursue: to produce a fair scheme; to produce a system that increases savings, because one of our national handicaps is having the lowest savings ratio in the European Union; and to do something for the lower paid, helping wealth creation in the less financially privileged section of the population. We agree with all that, so we should be having a dispassionate and technical debate, deciding how best to relate objectives to means.

Mr. Caplin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I am sorry, but the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) took such an awfully long time with his speech that I cannot accept any interventions. I apologise for that, because I normally enjoy the cut and thrust of debate on such occasions.

I shall deal briefly with those three objectives—fairness, aggregate savings behaviour and the position of the lower paid. The proposals cannot be fair. How can they be fair for someone who has decided to build up a PEP to repay his mortgage of more than £50,000, which is less than the average price of a house? He will suddenly find that his calculations have been thrown out, producing a gap that he had not anticipated. Given the promises that the Labour party made before the election, such a person would have had every reason to suppose that his PEP would continue under the same tax regime until his mortgage needed to be repaid. He and his family will be very badly let down. If the proposals go through, there will be a lot of miserable families. Some people will probably lose their home.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I am sorry, but, for the same reason that I gave to the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin), I have to refuse.

It is not fair to bamboozle the public in such a way. We heard the Prime Minister, then the Leader of the Labour party, the Social Security Secretary and Treasury Ministers making it absolutely clear to the public that the PEP and TESSA regime was not threatened. The quotations are very well known. We now know that it has been fundamentally threatened.

Given that the tax-incentivised savings vehicle was limited on entry—one was able to have only £6,000-worth of general PEP investments, £3,000-worth of a specialised PEP a year and TESSAs were limited on entry—it is not fair to say to people that, retrospectively, the vehicle will be limited on exit as well. It is not fair to say to people that, if the result of saving has been positive and they have managed to accumulate a reasonable pot of money, tax privileges will be retrospectively withdrawn or limited to some figure about which they did not know in advance. That is clearly the very reverse of fair.

I shall deal with what I think that the Paymaster General will say about fairness. He will say, "Oh, but we are withdrawing tax privileges from the rich who have accumulated £50,000, and the poor, who have not got anywhere near that sum, will continue to enjoy them." If that is being done in the name of traditional socialist egalitarianism, it is thoroughly perverse. It is one of the most foolish perversities in a whole string of such perversities in this debate. If one wants to go in for socialist egalitarianism and clobber the rich, one should put up marginal tax rates—although that would be very bad and destructive for everyone, including those who are less well off, since it would threaten their jobs and the country's prosperity.

Most extraordinarily, however, the Labour Government are proposing to say to the rich that, if they spend their higher income, the tax regime will not be changed and they can go on enjoying exactly the same standard of living, but if they save their higher income, they will be worse off. The Government will clobber such people and ensure that they suffer if they save. The change will impact only on people who save on higher incomes or who are better off—not on those who spend that higher income. That cannot make the beginnings of sense and certainly cannot be justified on the grounds either of economic rationality or of fairness.

What about the impact on savings as a whole? How can such a proposal possibly increase aggregate saving? Let us just think about that for one second; it is clear that Treasury Ministers have not begun to think seriously about it. After all, on their own admission, they are proposing to reduce tax credits for such saving. On universal admission, due to the greater administrative complexity of ISAs, which will force managers to keep an account for every contribution in every year, administrative costs will greatly increase.

If the returns are reduced and the costs are increased, there will be a double negative impact on the net return to savers. Clearly, therefore, the attractions of the scheme as compared with its predecessors will significantly reduce. If human beings are rational, there will be less saving, not more. That is the only possible conclusion; it follows as surely as night follows day.

The negative impact on savings behaviour will be compounded by the fact that those who have already saved £50,000 in their PEPs will have no tax-driven incentive to save any more than they otherwise would. So, the section of the population which has the highest propensity to save—those on the highest incomes—will save less. One does not know by how much, but it will undoubtedly be less. If the aggregate return of saving for such people is reduced, the aggregate savings flow will fall. The proposal's effect on aggregate savings will undoubtedly be negative.

Let us look at those who are low paid—people whose interests the Government claim to have at heart. Will the proposal help them? Such people cannot get many of the benefits of ISAs. Nor could they in predecessor regimes; nothing has changed. In practice, such people will not benefit from capital gains tax relief because they are unlikely to have capital gains exceeding the £6,000 annual personal allowance—or whatever it is now. I think that it is £6,500.

Equally, low-paid people will not get higher tax relief because, by definition, they do not pay higher tax. All that they will get is relief on the basic rate of tax. We have demonstrated in this debate that, from any view, management charges will exceed that benefit, which itself is being reduced due to the reduction in tax relief on ISAs over the next five years.

For those on smaller incomes, the financial benefit of taking part in the new savings vehicle will be less than it was when they contributed to PEPs. The opposite effect of the one for which the Government hope will come about. There will be less saving, not more, by the less well off. The Conservatives are genuinely concerned about that, regardless of whether the Labour party is.

Ms Keeble: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I cannot take an intervention due to lack of time. I hope that the hon. Lady will forgive me. She and her hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North had plenty of time to make their points.

There is another sinister discriminatory aspect of the proposal, which I fear will impact particularly seriously on those who are on lower incomes. As we know, the proposal is that anybody can save up to a maximum of £1,000 a year in cash, £1,000 in insurance products and £3,000 a year in equities. That is a very artificial portfolio balance, which may be totally inappropriate in certain circumstances.

For example, when the equity market is particularly high, it might be thoroughly irresponsible to put such a high proportion of savings in equities. Indeed, no independent financial adviser worth his salt would dream of advising his client to do so. For the wealthier savers who have an ISA—if any do—as part of a wider portfolio, such constraints are not very great. The balance of portfolio which they desire to achieve can be achieved elsewhere, outside the ISA regime.

People who will not have savings outside an ISA because they hardly have any savings at all—the people about whom the Government claim to be concerned, and whom the ISA regime purports to encourage to save—will not have the ability to obtain a portfolio balance outside the ISA regime. The portfolio balance forced on them inside the ISA regime may be extremely damaging. Poor people might be bamboozled into going for the product, and find that the apparent tax advantages are more than outweighed by management fees. On top of that, they might find that they are forced by regulation to put a disproportionate part of their savings into equities, which might prove to be a disaster at a certain stage in the market. They might find themselves exposed to losing a large part of their savings. That must be an exceedingly bad deal for the low paid.

Ms Keeble: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I am about to bring my remarks to an end. I am sure that the hon. Lady's colleagues will have an opportunity to make whatever points they can—if they can—in answer to my criticism of the Government's proposal.

I shall put one final point to Labour Members. The tragedy for the low paid is that it is not worth their while saving at all. They will merely find that they have deprived themselves of future income. In the event of loss of employment or some disaster, or when they reach retirement age, they will have deprived themselves of access to means-tested welfare benefits. Therefore, the return from their savings will be negative. They might find that they have sacrificed consumption by putting money away, and then do not qualify on retirement for income support, housing benefit, council tax relief and all the things enjoyed by the family next door, which has never bothered to save.

[Mr. Davies]

It is the cheating of the poor by this particularly pernicious system that the Government should be addressing if they seriously want to do something for the lower paid, and if they seriously want to change the culture of this country in favour of greater saving. That requires either a much more radical and fundamental welfare reform programme than I believe the Government have the courage to begin to contemplate, or some form of socialist compulsion. We shall see, as the months go by, which of those courses the Government take.

6.18 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Why do the Government give tax relief? It is to achieve a particular policy objective. In plain language, when the Government give people a handout, they do so to encourage them to do something. The point of the handout, and that is exactly what it is in the case of PEPs and TESSAs, is to encourage people to save.

"Although the scheme will be open to everyone, it is specially designed to encourage smaller savers, and particularly those who may never previously have invested in equities in their lives."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 112, c. 178.]

Mr. Bercow: Speed it up a bit.

Mr. Gardiner: I am taking my speech at the rate at which I think it is possible for the hon. Gentleman to comprehend it.

"I now want to extend savings incentives to the mass of ordinary tax-paying savers—and potential savers".—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 1024.]

That was said in the Budget statement on 20 March 1990 about the introduction of TESSAs.

How effective has that handout been? We have heard that 50 per cent. of adults—broadly the poorest 50 per cent.—have virtually no savings at all. They do not invest in PEPs and TESSAs, but they do pay for them. It is the tax taken from that poorest 50 per cent. of our community that still goes to contribute to the tax relief from which the richer 50 per cent. presently benefit. It is because of that that this handout must be justified to those who pay for it without benefiting from it.

We have been told today that £50,000 is not a huge sum. We have been told also—by the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers)—that unless a person was able to save at least £65,000, there would be no point in saving at all. They might as well blow it, because the yield would be so small. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman considers whether his words gave great comfort to those who have not yet accumulated £50,000 in their PEPs. There is little comfort here for the struggling pensioner who was mentioned, who put his faith in the then Government's PEPs scheme if, unless he accumulates £65,000, there is no point in accumulating anything at all.

The shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), stated that after the replacement of PEPs with ISAs, people would "lose the incentive to save." How does that statement stand up? Either there is a benefit from saving or there is not. If there is, and no one in the Chamber today has suggested otherwise, it seems clear that by the time one has accumulated £50,000 of tax-free savings, one has worked out the value of that activity; one does not require an additional handout to convince one further. Money spent in this way is doubtless much appreciated by the recipient, but it is unjustifiable to the neighbour, who pays for it without benefiting from it.

The shadow Chancellor, in a carefully crafted speech, enticed my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to bite and then closed the trap on him. The right hon. Gentleman said that a fund of £356,000 would be required to produce my hon. Friend's pension—about £20,000 per annum. He refused to take an intervention from me at that time, when I would have informed, or reminded, him that the new stock exchange regulations to force companies to disclose the pension arrangements for their directors have revealed—I see some Opposition Members blanching—many more interesting cases than that of my hon. Friend.

Let us take the example revealed in the annual report of the Bass brewing and leisure group, which states that one director—Sir Ian Prosser—has a pension which, at 30 September 1997, is valued at £304,300. That is not the fund—it is the pension which he will take each and every year in retirement. Even the shadow Chancellor might accept that in the light of such a pension, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover may be entitled to his paltry £20,000.

Unlike the shadow Chancellor, I do not want to get into the politics of envy. The director of Bass may well deserve his £304,000 a year pension. However, the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were significant in that they were a reversal of what the Conservatives have traditionally echoed in this Chamber over past years. The politics of envy have never been quite so clearly stated as they were by the right hon. Gentleman this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) talked of penalising people who have saved because they will not get tax relief on their savings in excess of £50,000. However, no penalising is going on. It is a change in the tax regime so that taxpayers' money is spent where it is most effective and most needed—in persuading the 50 per cent. of the population who presently are unconvinced of the benefits of saving.

Mr. Caplin rose—

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Caplin: At least I am taking an interest in the subject—unlike Opposition Members, particularly some who have just walked into the Chamber. Has my hon. Friend had time to consider the figures I mentioned in respect of the lack of people who have PEPs? I referred to a figure of less than 5 per cent. Will he address that point?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The figures that he gave were most revealing in that only 4.7 per cent. of people have a PEP and no other form of saving. He also laid before the House his qualifications, as someone previously employed in an insurance company. Although it is many years ago, my qualification as an associate of the Chartered Insurance Institute gives me some reason to stand in this Chamber this afternoon.

When the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford talked about penalising, the critical fact that he failed to mention was that the legislation is not retrospective.

Nothing that was lawful would be unlawful and nothing that was unlawful would be lawful as a result of the proposed measures.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) talked about the way in which people who have not got great incomes but are of modest means, go about saving. They do so piecemeal and in dribs and drabs. Indeed, the whole foundation of the old Prudential insurance company was based on that policy—the fact that it was difficult to get people to save. We know the old image of "the man from the Pru", who knocked on the door to pick up the weekly premium—the odd five shillings—from the householder. I would be reticent to refer to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary as the modern day "man from the Pru", but in setting up ISAs we are seeking a contemporary equivalent of just that.

The ISA would enable people to bring together a range of savings—stocks, shares, cash, national savings, life insurance—and to do so in dribs and drabs, in small weekly amounts. That is the way in which people are able to save—over a period of years—and how they have learnt to save in the past.

At the same time, the great majority of TESSA and PEP investments could be carried forward into the tax-favoured environment of the ISA. For most people, the ISA will be the natural home where their savings and investments of the past few years can lodge to their benefit for the future. It is simply not the case that the Government are trying to penalise people who have saved hard and planned for their retirement. There has been no more telling remark this afternoon than that of my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), who said that if there were ever a case of people's planning for their futures being thrown up in the air by the Government, it was when the previous Government changed the MIRAS tax relief system to their financial detriment.

In conclusion, in the past eight and more years since TESSAs and PEPs were introduced, the schemes have significantly failed to find acceptance throughout society. The people who have benefited from them are those whom one would expect to benefit—people who have traditionally saved and planned pensions and who take advantage of whatever scheme is available. I do not believe that any hon. Member thinks that the schemes have succeeded in the original intention as stated in the extracts from Hansard that I quoted—the intention in those Budget statements that the benefits of tax-free savings would be extended down to the most disadvantaged in our community.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): All I can say about the speech of the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) is that the hon. Gentleman is clearly one of the few hon. Members who speak faster than they think. We now have a Paymaster General whose tax is sheltered and whose reply to the debate has had to be sheltered by the sort of filibuster that we just heard.

The Government's proposals are dishonest, ill thought out, technically defective and hypocritical. I shall begin with the dishonesty. This scheme is mis-selling in every sense. The individual savings account is designed not to encourage new saving, but to cut the cost to the Treasury of existing saving. Before the election, the Government claimed that they wanted to extend the scope of PEPs and TESSAs. Even the consultative document that they published concealed their true purpose. That was forced out first in the debate in another place two weeks ago, when the Government spokesman, Lord McIntosh, came clean about PEPs and TESSAs, saying:

"We must consider the ultimate effect to the revenue of a system which relies only on annual limits . . . I want to make clear that capping is an essential part of any tax-free savings package."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 11 February 1998; Vol. 585, c. 1220-21.]

That statement flatly contradicts the Prime Minister's assurance before the election and that given by the Chief Secretary after the election, that existing savers would not be affected. I hope that Ministers will now apologise for deliberately misleading the public. Of course, they will not do so—expecting contrition from this Government is like expecting openness from the Paymaster General.

The whole ISA scheme is ill thought out. As my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) and my hon. Friends the Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) said, there is nothing long term about encouraging instant access accounts at supermarket checkouts. There is nothing sound about offering a monthly flutter as a way of building lifetime savings. The Government now admit that the £50,000 limit would yield only £1,420 a year. That will not pay for long-term care or support PEP-based mortgages and it will certainly not help to provide the sort of pension that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport so neatly illustrated and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary—[HON. MEMBERS: "Who?"] I mean the former Chief Secretary, who pointed out that the scheme is wholly inconsistent with the stakeholder pension that the Government are simultaneously proposing.

The scheme is flawed in conception and deeply flawed in detail. I cannot recall a Treasury proposal that has had such universally bad press—[Interruption.] Let me quote it. The Consumers Association has described the scheme as "fundamentally flawed, and . . . a considerable risk to consumers."

The Association of Investment Trust Companies said that the ISA proposals

"will do very little to encourage those on modest incomes to save."

The Independent Financial Advisers Association said that the scheme was "little more than a tax efficient Christmas club."

The Association of British Insurers believed that it was "potentially anti-competitive". It said:

"Complexity, and hence cost, is a major worry."

The National Association of Pension Funds said that the proposals were

"tackling the problem from the wrong end."

Even the Treasury's spokesman in the other place attacked the scheme. The hapless Lord McIntosh criticised the consultation paper for not proposing a proper regulatory framework. He said that such a framework

"receives almost no mention in the document . . . That is certainly a defect."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 11 February 1998; Vol. 585, c. 1223.]

All the practitioners regard ISAs as unworkable. As the Association of Private Client Investment Managers and Stockbrokers—led by the former Conservative Economic

[Mr. Michael Fallon]

Secretary to the Treasury, whom the Chief Secretary prayed in aid—highlighted, the proposals will be an administrative nightmare. The association said:

"For the system to work, ISA providers will have to provide the following information at the end of each tax year during which they have provided an ISA:—

ISA assets transferred in or out.

ISAs which have been closed.

ISAs which have been made void.

Investor details.

Where an ISA has been transferred, the provider to whom it was transferred.

Where a transfer has been received, the provider to whom it was received.

Where an ISA has been closed, the date of closure.

Net investment made during the tax year . . . We cannot emphasise too strongly the difficulty and so the associated cost of administering" this system. In case the Chief Secretary is still tempted to claim that Angela Knight is in favour of the scheme, I should point out that she proposes—her views are set out in black and white—that

"the tax regime for all the existing PEPs and TESSAs should be honoured".

ISAs are unfair, technically defective, administratively complex and will be very expensive for the providers to operate. We are entitled to ask, therefore, who dreamt up this scheme, which brings us to the architect of ISAs, the Paymaster—or taxmaster—General. He launched the scheme in his usual, careless, blustering style. In the foreword to the consultative document, he opined:

"Everyone should have the opportunity to save in a tax-favoured environment".

He wrote that in happier times, of course, before the storm broke over his head. Perhaps he wrote it in one of his two large country mansions—perhaps those words were inscribed in his Park lane penthouse, in his apartments in Cannes, or even in his unselfconsciously named "Villa Muchio". His words would show nerve enough, but he then had the gall to attack those who currently hold PEPs as "well-off people who have done extremely well out of the accounts".

Not as extremely well as he has done with his £12 million offshore—all of it sheltered from tax.

The plan is this: those who have scrimped and saved their PEPs over 10 years will now be penalised. The tax man will rob them retrospectively of anything over £50,000. The Paymaster General, however, will still pay nothing on his £12 million—no income tax, no capital gains tax, no inheritance tax. That is true hypocrisy.

As we have learnt, when the hon. Gentleman is caught out, he blusters. One ISA conference was told that the £50,000 limit would stay, whereas the next was told that it could be changed. Finally, he blamed his officials. In meetings with representatives of the savings and investment industries, he revealed that "he was not fully briefed on the widespread appeal of Peps among all taxpayers.

He allegedly said that he was given out-of-date information and was wrongly advised that Peps were still the domain of higher-rate taxpayers."

This is a true Labour saga: a broken promise that was dishonestly concealed; an ill-thought-out scheme that is technically defective; a measure ridiculed by the industry that is supposed to provide it. For the 3 million people who hold PEPs, for the 4.5 million people who hold TESSAs, this is a serious breach of faith that will undermine confidence in Government savings.

The Government have one way out, which is an unusual one for the Paymaster General—he can come clean. He can admit that he has bungled. He can admit that he tried to deceive existing savers. He can take away his ludicrous scheme and rethink it in the fortnight that remains before the Budget.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): We welcome this opportunity to discuss the ISA proposals, which have been put out to consultation. Indeed, consultation ended on 31 January—clearly, the Opposition have only just caught up with that fact, but we welcome them none the less to the debate. We wish that they had had something more substantive to say, on which we could further consult, but the pettiness and irrelevance of what they said were no better exemplified than in the speech of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon).

It is left to us to consider the representations that we have received—they have been many, varied and all of considerable interest, as we intended when we put out the scheme to consultation. The former Conservative Government refused to consult—they did not adhere to that process—which is why they got things very wrong.

No hon. Member can expect me or my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to pre-empt what the Chancellor will say in the Budget. I welcome the hon. Member for Sevenoaks to his position as shadow spokesman—I think that this is the first time that he has spoken from the Front Bench, at least since I have been in government—but I was surprised that he did not quote in full the words of Angela Knight, who is not unknown to Conservative Front Benchers. I should put the record straight, as he seems incapable of reading what she said. She stated:

"There is much that we welcome within the ISA and APCIMS"— which, as the hon. Gentleman read out, stands for the Association of Private Client Investment Managers and Stockbrokers—

"endorse the policy of attracting more people to save. We also agree with features such as the flexibility, no minimum level of saving, reducing restrictions on the equity element and no 'lock-in'".

Those are precisely the points that the hon. Member for Sevenoaks and others, including the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), tried to refute. Angela Knight continued by saying that those aspects "are all welcome and we consider that there has been much careful thought given to the design of the ISA."

She speaks with much experience and authority in these matters, to which she clearly gave much thought.

That does not mean that we shall not also listen carefully to other representations that we received, although those we heard today from the Opposition will not rank highly in our consideration. The Virgin organisation, for example—which has driven down costs on various sorts of savings and investments—said:

"Undoubtedly ISAs are good news. They will bring more savers into the market."

Fidelity, one of the biggest product providers in the financial services industry, said:

"We welcome the new scheme . . . this was the big breakthrough in investment."

The Halifax said:

"Halifax sees a bright future for the ISA."

The Prudential said:

"We welcome the Government's aim of promoting saving, in particular for people with modest incomes . . . we welcome making ISAs as accessible as possible."

Those quotations are worth reading because they show clearly that, while we were open to consultation, we thought carefully about the document that we issued as the basis for that consultation.

Mr. Fallon: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Mr. Robinson: I shall give way in a moment, although I did not interrupt the hon. Gentleman in his speech. In all that he said, he made no attempt to discuss any of the points raised in the debate. I do not say that he acted discourteously, as he had other, less relevant, things to say.

The shadow Chancellor told us that he, personally, by some Herculean endeavour, had rebuilt savings in the 1980s. What happened in the 1980s is a sorry story. When he was in the Treasury in various guises, from 1986 to 1990—a full five-year period—we had a negative savings ratio in the household sector. The figure was –0.3 per cent. in 1986; –1.9 per cent. in 1987; –2.8 per cent. in 1988; –2.7 per cent. in 1989; and –0.4 per cent. in 1990.

Mr. Fallon rose—

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) rose—

Mr. Robinson: I shall give way, but not to the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) who was not here during the debate. Johnnies-come-lately do not get in; he should know that by now.

Mr. Fallon: Of all the organisations that the Paymaster General cited as giving some support to the Government's proposal, can he name one that says that the £50,000 limit should stay?

Mr. Robinson: We have held consultations with all of them. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman is smirking, as if he had said something terribly clever. If the previous Government had gone out to consultation, as we have, they would not have got into the frightful muddle that I shall talk about in a moment when the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) first launched PEPs.

Mr. Loughton: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Mr. Robinson: I will, because I know that the hon. Gentleman was here throughout the debate and did not get the chance to make his own speech.

Mr. Loughton: I am very grateful to the Paymaster General, but when he is quoting from authorities in the City, he should give the whole quotation. Richard Branson, to give the whole sentence, said:

"The £50,000 limit also sends the wrong signal to potential savers—it says that rules can be changed retrospectively."

Fidelity said of the £5,000 annual limit that it

"represents a 53% reduction in the total tax-privileged investment . . . it removes an incentive for"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. That is far too long for an intervention.

Mr. Robinson: I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman, who is not usually short of words, would have something to say for himself, rather than reading. It was clearly a waste of time for me to give way.

I was dealing with the shadow Chancellor, who was so proud of his record in the 1980s; in fact, it was a terrible record on savings, as he well knows. It is worth recalling that stability is the key to economic growth and to savings. When he was in the Treasury, interest rates were at 10 per cent. and inflation at 5 per cent. in 1988. Interest rates peaked at 15 per cent. and inflation at nearly 10 per cent. in 1990. That did not promote growth or stability or encourage savings. That is why we had negative savings rates in the last five years of the 1980s. That is not a record to be proud of.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk, a former Chief Secretary, made a good contribution to the debate, but he did not tell us that the pension fund of which he is a director was fined £545,000 for mis-selling. He courteously informed me that he would have to leave before the end of the debate, but I wish that he was here to hear this, because he might have been able to tell us something about why, in that context, he recommended a light regulatory touch for the new system. We shall ensure that no such problems happen again, and we are consulting to that effect.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk mentioned the problems that the Conservative Government had with the introduction of PEPs, and the number of goes that they needed to clear it up. They had a go when they introduced them in 1987; a go in 1988; and another go in 1989. They had to keep trying to simplify the rules and get rid of the anomalies, for the simple reason that they did not consult beforehand.

The right hon. Gentleman also mentioned kitemarking or benchmarking products, with a view to bringing down the costs of administration. That is a matter to which both Government and Opposition Members have alluded in a serious vein, and we are consulting on it. We are attracted by the concept, but we tend to favour benchmarking rather than kitemarking, as the latter might imply that the Government were totally committed to a given product. The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) spoke about that. It is a matter of interest, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will consider it in the Budget process.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) spoke with the background of much personal and professional experience. He pointed out exactly what had gone wrong in the mis-selling of pensions, and he is keen that we should not follow in the misbegotten, badly thought out footsteps of our predecessors.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) made a serious contribution and we hope that, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has decided on his proposals, we shall be able to secure his support in the Lobby on the new savings proposals. He was especially concerned, as were the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford and some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, about the savings disregard and the problems of those on benefit.

The problems go much wider than that, and it is ironic in the extreme that they should be raised by Conservative Members, who have a record second to none in living memory on means-tested benefits that cut right against the principle of people being able to work and save; working and saving is clearly the logical order of events.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) that there are considerable advantages in the idea of a one-stop account. I hope that those will be contained in the decisions that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will make. Opposition Members attempted some ill-founded irony about how retailers could deal with those accounts, but the fact is that many retailers have already moved into financial products and are doing well and giving advice. The exact arrangements are a matter for them, but when companies such as Tesco, Safeway, Marks and Spencer and others—

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Will the Paymaster General give way?

Mr. Robinson: No. The hon. Gentleman was not here during the debate and I have no intention of giving way to him, as I have very little time left and I want to make some more points.

Mr. Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Paymaster General said that I was not here during the debate. I was here for the opening speeches, after which I attended a Defence Export Services Organisation symposium with the Minister for Defence Procurement. I will not be told that I have not participated in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair. It is for the Minister himself to decide whether to give way.

Mr. Robinson: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman was spending his time very well with my noble Friend, but he was not here, so it is better for me to reply to those who spoke in the debate and attended it throughout.

The hon. Member for Gosport made several points, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), who speaks with great erudition on these matters. He is one of the biggest contributors to Committees on finance-related Bills. I hope that he will participate in more this year. His remark about Lord Lawson's purpose in introducing PEPs was one of the most perceptive of the debate. My hon. Friend is a keen observer of such matters and realises the motivation behind the introduction of PEPs. Lord Lawson introduced them not as an incentive to save or to increase aggregate savings, as has been claimed, but as a way to spread share ownership. That is a welcome objective, but it has nothing to do with savings.

The main issue is stability. We have acted on tax credits and on advance corporation tax. We have introduced a deficit reduction plan and a code of fiscal stability. We have reintroduced the golden rule. Which of those measures, if any, do the Opposition support, or would they repeal them? They should come clean. Would they repeal the provisions of the Bank of England Bill? Would they return to the imputation system of corporation tax? Would they reintroduce advance corporation tax or tax credits? All those measures are intended to have long-term effects, and they will generate savings.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Graham Allen and
Mr. John McFall.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's commitment, set out in the pre-Budget report, to consult on tax proposals, including the proposed ISA; believes that the ISA will extend the opportunity to save and invest and that the Government's proposals will ensure a stable and fair savings environment; commends the Government for its commitment to long-term economic stability and low inflation which is good for savers; and rejects any return to the boom and bust policies of the past which were so damaging to those on low incomes, savers and investors.

Listening to the Countryside

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): We now come to the debate on listening to the countryside. I have to inform the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.14 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): I beg to move,

That this House recognises the concern of those marching in London on 1st March that the voice of the countryside should be listened to by all politicians but regrets the attempts by non-attending Agriculture Ministers to undermine the credentials of the march with claims of it being hijacked by political and overseas interests; calls upon Her Majesty's Government, in acknowledging that a viable agricultural industry lies at the heart of a successful rural economy, to recognise properly the fears and concerns of farmers over dramatically falling farm incomes, rising levels of food imports, the continued imposition of the beef ban, the introduction of the Minimum Wage, the Working Time Directive and Agenda 2000, by now making a clear statement of how it proposes to address these concerns; deplores the threat to life in rural Britain resulting from a revenue support grant settlement which has removed resources from rural local authorities; and calls upon the Government not only to strengthen the protection for the countryside while encouraging the renewal of towns and cities, but also to respect the patterns and fabric of rural life by removing the threat to land owners of a statutory right of access.

I move this motion as the spokesman of the true party of the countryside in the House. [Interruption.] The guffaws of Labour Members are typical of people who have not done their homework.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Can the right hon. Gentleman, my parliamentary neighbour, explain why his party is regarded as the true party of the countryside when, in all their 18 years in government, they did nothing to resolve the problem of the moss roads, which so afflict both my rural constituents and his?

Mr. Jack: When the hon. Gentleman and I join forces perhaps something will be done on that. I am grateful to him because he usually leads with his chin. I will take advantage of that by noting that Professor John Curtice of Strathclyde university, using data from the 1991 census to classify seats as rural on the basis of the number of people directly involved with agricultural production, classifies 54 of the 100 most rural seats as Conservative and 21 as Liberal; in third place comes the Labour party with 15, there are nine for the nationalists and one other. That conclusively shows that when it comes to the real rural voice of the United Kingdom, it is the Conservatives who speak for rural Britain.

The first thing that our motion does is to recognise the significance of Sunday's march. The first thing that the Government's amendment does is to ignore the march and its clear message. Its message was that every hon. Member should listen to the voice of the countryside. Our motion recognises the importance of that listening exercise; the Government's amendment does not.

Let us spend a moment considering the amendment. It is a slap in the face for the voice of the countryside, which was heard in London. More than 280,000 people came to a dignified, positive demonstration to speak on behalf of the countryside. I and many of my right hon. and hon. Friends were proud to walk with our constituents and help their voice to be heard. There is nothing about listening in the Government amendment. Most of it condemns the previous Administration. Has it not dawned on Labour Members that, in 18 years, in spite of some things that we may have done that upset some people some of the time, we never provoked a reaction that filled London's streets like the country people did on Sunday? Let that be a lesson to the Labour party.

We recognised the need to do more for the people of the countryside. That is why, in 1995, we published a countryside White Paper, the first such document since 1945. We published a follow-up in 1996 to say what we had done. It included initiatives on matters such as rural transport and housing. The Government amendment says that they have policies for the reform of the common agricultural policy. I did not know that the Government were the Commission in disguise; perhaps we have discovered something new. The Community is responsible for that policy.

If the Government have ideas for successful sustainable agriculture, why did the Select Committee on Agriculture, which consists of seven Labour Members, three Conservatives and one Liberal, say in its recent report on Agenda 2000 that the Government should produce "a comprehensive and clear vision of the future for UK agriculture"?

Only today, the same Select Committee, dominated by Labour Members, pointed out that it was the same lack of strategy and forward planning which had contributed to the problems of the beef industry. It states:

"We concede that valuable time and money that could have been spent on restructuring the industry has been wasted for lack of a clear Government long-term strategy which would have assisted farmers to recognise the need for change."

On two counts, the Select Committee condemns the Government's approach to the future of agriculture.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Jack: It is hardly surprising to discover the Government's priorities. The Prime Minister dropped agriculture as a priority for one of the presidency priorities, about which he boasted so much.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): The right hon. Gentleman spoke about the BSE crisis. Will he acknowledge that this Government are to spend £70 million on introducing a cattle traceability scheme? What did his Government do? Nothing.

Mr. Jack: With respect to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), when we were in government we promised that, on its introduction, such a scheme would be free to farmers in terms of its establishment costs. His right hon. Friend decided only later to join that party.

The motion refers to the minimum wage. I shall return to that, as it poses a serious threat to agricultural employment for temporary and casual people.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Is it not the case that the Agricultural Wages Board, which survived despite the attempted abolition in 1994, gives a minimum wage of £4.12 and an average—

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): No, it does not.

Mr. Prentice: The hon. Gentleman contradicts me from a sedentary position. I have the figures. The minimum rate is £4.12, and the actual rate is £4.69 per hour. How can the right hon. Gentleman speak of minimum wages devastating the agricultural industry, when the wages board is protecting minimum wages in that industry?

Mr. Jack: I shall deal with that when I come to the fruit industry later in my speech.

It would be interesting to hear from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he can give the House an assurance, when he talks about rural prosperity, that he has made a Budget submission to the Chancellor, asking him to ensure that no one in the countryside will be worse off as a result of the up-coming Budget. I expect that he will be unable to do that.

The march on Sunday was described in a recent magazine article in these words:

"But the march is also about ordinary people coming from communities across Britain coming together to show their concern about the future and help to raise awareness throughout the country of the vital role that farming and the wider rural community plays."

It is a great pity that the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), his Minister of State, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and others on the Front Bench spent so much time rubbishing the march as having been hijacked by politicos and the American gun lobby—points that the organisers of the march forcefully rebutted. The right hon. Gentleman may not have realised that the words that I quoted, which welcomed the march, were those of the Prime Minister. It will not have done the right hon. Gentleman's career any good to have departed from the Prime Minister's line on the march.

The only Minister who seemed to get it right was the Minister for the Environment, who was brave enough to turn up and be counted. We can draw our own conclusions. We see a Government divided on the question of the countryside, as witnessed by their attitude to the march.

The march illustrated how out of touch with the countryside the Government have become in nine short months. In a panic response to the force of argument deployed by Conservative Members and others speaking for the countryside, the Deputy Prime Minister tried to convince us that, all of a sudden, his free-for-all on the green belt had come to and end. My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) soon rumbled that, by pointing out that in that announcement there was no evidence that any of the controversial housing developments in the green belt had been stopped.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. I cast my mind back to the hundreds of thousands of miners and their families who came down in the Tory Government years when we fought for our communities and to save our pits. The Tory Government did not take a blind bit of notice, and the former President of the Board of Trade, who led the great march on Sunday, put one finger up to us. Where was the Tories' support when we were trying to save our communities in those days?

Mr. Jack: I am flattered that the hon. Gentleman still calls me the Minister.

Mr. Campbell: Shadow Minister.

Mr. Jack: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Government are in charge and will be replying to the debate tonight.

[Mr. Jack]

A farming concession followed on the Deputy Prime Minister's announcement.

Mr. Campbell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I asked the right hon. Gentleman a question and I have not got the answer yet. I and the mining communities are entitled to an answer. When they came down—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. [Interruption.] Order. The House must calm down a little. It is for hon. Members on the Front Bench to answer questions as they see fit.

Mr. Jack: If this was a debate about mining, perhaps we could debate the hon. Gentleman's point, but it is a debate about the countryside. [Interruption.] It is typical of Labour Members, who want to raise everything other than the countryside. They are deeply embarrassed about their miserable record, as I am teasing out in front of the House.

Mr. Campbell: Hypocrite!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not use words like that, and I must ask him to withdraw that word. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is an experienced—

Mr. Campbell: I will not withdraw the word hypocrites, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because that is what the Tories are.

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the hon. Gentleman, as an experienced Member of the House, that the debate is about the countryside. I understand his feelings, but he must withdraw the word hypocrite. I ask him to do that.

Mr. Campbell: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will not withdraw it. They are nothing but hypocrites. I remember the miners fighting for their communities in the countryside, and they got nothing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have given the hon. Gentleman every chance to withdraw the word hypocrite.

Mr. Campbell: I will not withdraw.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to leave the House for the remainder of the sitting.

Mr. Jack: Before that interruption, I was pointing out to the Minister of Agriculture that he was second in line with a concession to the voice of the countryside. It is remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman has told us on umpteen occasions in the past few months that there was no new money for agriculture. He said that the cupboards were bare. We pointed out that money was there. Suddenly, in the week running up to the march, we find new money coming out to deal with the higher charges for the Meat Hygiene Service and the cattle passport scheme. Is it not remarkable how, under a whiff of grapeshot coming in the direction of MAFF, the Minister panics and finds £70 million?

The Minister tried to put about the myth that the Government were giving money to farmers. They were not. All that he had decided to do was not to charge them for those schemes. It is about time that he acknowledged that fact, which we have pointed out.

Not to be outdone in the rush to concessions, the Minister for the Environment produced his much-delayed consultation document on the so-called right to roam. The document is a mailed fist in a velvet glove. Paragraph 5 of the introduction tells us:

"If we could be certain of achieving our objectives entirely by voluntary means, there would be no need to legislate at all".

So much for the spin that it would be voluntary—there is an implicit threat of legislation. Who is the judge and jury? None other than the Minister.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) rose—

Mr. Jack: I think that we have had enough interruptions from Labour Members for the time being. The House wants to hear our message on behalf of the countryside, because last Sunday Labour Members were too frightened to turn up and march with country people and, more important, to listen to what they had to say.

The Government have pledged to protect village schools. However, when we examine the fine print, we find that the closure decisions will be called in for further consideration. There is no guarantee whatsoever that no rural schools will close in future. The question regarding the Department for Education and Employment's proposal to stop parish councils nominating governors of rural schools remains unanswered. I must conclude that this rag, tag and bobtail collection of piecemeal policy concessions does not add up to a comprehensive policy for the countryside. People were crying out on Sunday to hear that policy from the Government, but they were met with silence.

I suppose that is not surprising when we consider the true priorities of the Minister of Agriculture. Rather than concentrating on the countryside, the wallpaper fetish from which this Government are suffering has really taken hold in the Ministry of Agriculture. The Guardian revealed this week that the Minister has spent £2.3 million on his office move. Did that move have anything to do with the priorities and problems of farming? No, it took place because the Minister needed new accommodation to "send a strong signal that the department should have a new aim, focus and objectives."

What are the Government's new aims, focus and objectives? If their main aim is not looking after farmers in their present plight, I do not know what their priority is. We also discover that the Minister spent £10,409 on an antique reproduction desk—he cannot recognise the real thing when he sees it, so he must buy a reproduction. I suppose that that is typically new Labour.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): Before the right hon. Gentleman digs himself into a bigger hole of myth and inaccuracy, I shall tell him one or two truths. The Guardian revealed nothing: all that information was published in the MAFF bulletin in January this year. That is my first point.

Secondly, the accurate figures for the cost of transferring the headquarters of MAFF, not just my office, to Nobel house—and I remind the House that the previous Government took the lease on that property; it was already a MAFF building—were provided in answer to a parliamentary question from the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) last month. Incidentally, that information was also given to the Agriculture Select Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman checked the facts in Hansard, rather than the inaccuracies in The Guardian, he might be worth listening to.

Mr. Jack: That reveals that nobody reads the MAFF bulletin. I would be wary if I were in the Minister's boots. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), the Chairman of the Agriculture Select Committee, told The Guardian:

"We were told £930,000, you have got figures saying £2.3 million. We are very concerned and we will be investigating."

My hon. Friend would not have said that if he was not sure of his facts.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): This is a matter of considerable importance to the House. The Guardian obtained those figures under the access to information code. MAFF did not deny those figures until the Minister came to the Dispatch Box tonight. My right hon. Friend may wish to know that the Select Committee is writing to MAFF seeking clarification of how the discrepancy between the figures is accounted for.

Mr. Jack: That answer will be very interesting. I had thought that the Minister had installed a naff kitchen, but it turns out to be a Neff kitchen.

That is typical of what has been happening in MAFF. Irrespective of the Minister's denials, the authoritative article in The Guardian shows where the Ministry's priorities lie—and they are not with farming issues and the countryside. The Select Committee summed up the situation currently facing farming in its report on Agenda 2000, which states:

"UK farmers are experiencing a uniquely difficult time, with structural problems compounded by the strength of sterling. It is unusual for all sectors of farming to be confronting sharply reduced incomes simultaneously. So it is understandable if many farmers are concerned about radical change."

It is sad that the Minister has not responded humanely to what the farmers have said. Those who attended the annual general meeting of the National Farmers Union heard one of the most chilling addresses ever made to a farming audience. The Minister talked about partnership at the start of his speech and then lectured farmers saying, "You will do this and that". In no sense did he appear to share the current burden in agriculture.

Two columns of figures published by MAFF highlight the seriousness of the income situation facing farming. It has been said that times improved for agriculture in 1992–93. Compared with an average net farm income at 100 per farm between 1989–90 and 1991–92, the index shows that net farm income for the dairy sector stood at 116 in 1992–93. However, the provisional figure in that sector for 1997–98 is 60—which is a 50 per cent. fall. Net farm income for cattle and sheep in less favoured areas was 129, but it is projected to be 80—a fall of 38 per cent. There will be a fall of 7½ per cent. in projected net income for cattle and sheep in the lowlands. There is a level picture for cereals. General cropping will be down 12 per cent., pigs and poultry will be down 40 per cent., and mixed farming will be down 48 per cent.

Those chilling statistics reveal that if farm incomes had accumulated over a series of good years—as was said in a recent Adjournment debate—any accumulated surpluses will be used up by the end of this year.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack: Agriculture will truly face a frightening financial crisis to which the Minister has provided no solutions so far.

Mr. Hall: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack: I pointed out to the Minister some time ago that there were opportunities for the Government.

Mr. Hall rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The right hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Jack: I pointed out some time ago that there were things that the Government could do. The Opposition highlighted the fact that hill farmers needed help. The Minister provided a sort of increase in funds, but he botched that as well. As a result of his announcement in December, hill farmers will receive not £65 million but £57 million. The sum total of the Minister's assistance for agriculture to date is plus £21 million.

The Minister has often challenged us to say where the money would come from to deal with the question of agrimonetary compensation, for example. I remind the Minister that the Treasury has confirmed that there was a surplus in the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund in 1996. That resulted in Britain's achieving a higher Fontainebleau rebate which assisted the Government in terms of the Chancellor's Budget statement. I hope that the Minister will confirm that that same fund is under-spent for the calendar year 1997. In which case, will he be prepared to go to the Chancellor, in light of the figures that I have put before the House, and ask for at least some compensation for our farmers? That could be done within the bounds of public expenditure. After all, we did not ask the Government to adopt our plans, but they have adopted them. I have pointed out from where money could come to assist our hard-pressed farmers.

Dr. John Cunningham: How much?

Mr. Jack: The Minister is aware of the figures. If he has done his homework, he will be able to put before the House the detail that it requires and, once and for all, answer the questions that I have asked. Underspends on United Kingdom Community-funded agricultural schemes could enable him to recycle to the areas that are hardest pressed.

Dr. Cunningham: How much?

Mr. Jack: The Minister asks me questions. He is supposed to give answers. I have done my homework. I know that the EAGGF fund is underspent.

Dr. Cunningham: Since, as always, the right hon. Gentleman never fails to demand more public expenditure, more taxpayers' money, let me remind him and the House that £86 of every £100 of agrimonetary compensation comes from Her Majesty's Treasury. How much more public expenditure is he demanding?

Mr. Jack: If that is an example of the Minister's preparation, he has not listened to what I have said. I said that I wanted him to use the underspend, which would enhance our rebate, to give money back to farmers, within public expenditure guidelines. That is not more public expenditure. The guideline for agriculture is 41.8 becu. The spend is 40.374 becu. He should have known those facts. If I can get them, why could not he?

On a serious point—[Laughter.] The guffaws of laughter to questions that affect the very fabric of rural life in this country clearly show that the Minister's priorities really are his wallpaper and his plants, and not the needs of the countryside in the United Kingdom.

I should like the Minister, if he will be kind enough, to tell the House what will happen at the end of this year when the freeze on the livestock and arable area payments ends. Those payments are worth some £400 million to United Kingdom agriculture and farming. Farmers would like to know what the situation is.

The Minister has shown scant regard for the effect of his policies on rural communities. I quote from a survey undertaken in west Wales by the NFU, as reported in the Farmers Guardian of 20 February. The area is represented by Labour Members of Parliament, who claim to speak for the countryside. The report says:

"Trade down 50 per cent, staff being laid off, debts still unsettled 12 months on, veterinary practitioners surviving largely on cat and dog treatments and even a vicar praying hard that the depression within the farming industry would not turn into a wave of suicides."

Those are the real issues that face farming and countryside communities. The Minister must address those fears and concerns when he replies.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way at last.

Is the right hon. Gentleman saying in all honesty that his former Administration take absolutely no responsibility for the crisis in the countryside in mid-Wales?

Mr. Jack: I said earlier that we take some responsibility for the need to improve. That is why we produced two White Papers on the countryside.

I have put before the House the Labour Government's record of neglect on the countryside. I gave information on incomes in farming, and its knock-on effects on the rural community. When one considers all the other things that are going on as far as the countryside is concerned, it is hardly surprising that the countryside feels under siege: no early lifting of the beef ban in sight; the ending of the Rural Development Commission; the beef on the bone ban; the efforts to ban green-top milk; an assault on country sports; the reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of the milk industry; the Krebes report, leaving large parts of the countryside vulnerable to tuberculosis from badgers; and a raft of Labour private Members' Bills on pigs and poultry, which would leave our industry seriously disadvantaged compared with our European competitors.

It is no wonder that country people cry out to be listened to, but not, it seems, by the Government. The listening will be done by Opposition Members. I beg to support our motion.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"condemns the previous administration for its persistent neglect of the countryside over the past eighteen years which resulted in rural unemployment and deprivation and the collapse of the rural transport system; and congratulates the Government on its emphatic commitment to comprehensive countryside policies, to reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, to successful, sustainable United Kingdom agriculture, and on its vision for a countryside that is strong, fair and modern, with a programme for social justice, inclusiveness, welfare reform, improving services, the national minimum wage, education and skills which will ensure prosperity for all in rural areas as well as in the towns.".

It is an easy task to deal with the rag bag of a motion that stands in the name of the Leader of the Opposition, particularly since it is as incoherent as it is inaccurate. After the long, boring and convoluted speech of the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), the task should not take too long. The Opposition motion refers to the need to recognise concerns over farm incomes, yet it opposes the minimum wage. In fact, farm incomes fell consistently throughout the period in which the Conservative Government were in office. The Opposition motion refers to concerns about the Agenda 2000 proposals, which the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association and the Government support. The motion talks of rising levels of food imports. It is pretty easy to dismiss that, too, because they were lower in 1997 than in 1996. It talks of the need to strengthen protection for the countryside and the fabric of rural life, which Tory policies disastrously undermined over 18 years and left in tatters.

On access to the countryside, the Government have listened and responded to the dialogue and a request for a voluntary approach. The Opposition motion contains no new proposals for a better future for agriculture or for rural communities. It is devoid of coherence and content. As The Scotsman asked on 7 April last year, speaking of the Tories,

"Do their plans for the future of farming really matter when we know perfectly well what they have done in the past 18 years or even the past year?"

That simple quote says it all about the failure of the Tories' stewardship of the countryside.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): The motion asks the Government to consider properly the fears and concerns of farmers over falling incomes. If the Minister doubts those fears and concerns, he has only to look at the tragic case, detailed on "Panorama" last night, of a farmer who committed suicide. Will the Minister now tell the House that there will be a proper green pound compensation scheme for our farmers, which every other Government in Europe have given to theirs? Our farmers have to compete with those farmers in the same marketplace.

Dr. Cunningham: The latter part of the hon. Gentleman's statement is not only inaccurate but untrue.

In case he has not noticed or does not understand, virtually all the agrimonetary compensation available to beef and livestock farmers has already been given to them.

The Opposition's motion represents another attempt by the Conservatives to deny their past: their record of taking rural communities for granted for almost two decades; their disastrous record of betrayal of millions of people in the countryside, which culminated in swings to new Labour in rural areas every bit as powerful as they were in the urban areas. That is why Labour has so many Members of Parliament representing rural communities, and they are doing it well.

The right hon. Member for Fylde struggled to find a Scottish academic who had produced a paper saying that the Tories represent rural areas. They do not represent a single seat in Scotland, so that is stretching credibility just a little bit. Nor do they represent any constituency, urban or rural, in Wales.

Since last May, the Labour party has had more Members in rural constituencies than the Tories and the Liberal party put together.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): May I draw to the Minister's attention the fact that, like Scotland and Wales, Cornwall is now a Tory-free zone?

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): And the list goes on.

Mr. Tyler: We shall do the infilling later.

I invite the Minister to ignore Conservative Members' absurd amnesia and deal with the concerns of those who really represent rural areas—the farming unions and all those concerned with the future of the countryside. The Agriculture Committee's report, which was published today and which Labour Members support, makes it clear that long-term problems face the farming community. Will the Minister ignore the ridiculous speech that we have just heard?

Dr. Cunningham: I shall do my best to satisfy the hon. Gentleman, although I am sure that I shall not succeed totally. I warmly welcome the Agriculture Committee's report, which is an important and constructive contribution to the debate about the problems in the beef industry. I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) and his colleagues on the Committee—of all parties—on their serious piece of work.

As I was saying, last May people in rural areas put their trust in Labour—for the first time, in many cases. They did so because they felt betrayed by successive Tory Governments, and we all know why: bus deregulation has meant no public transport for many communities. The closure of rural schools—450 closed in just over a decade—has torn the heart out of rural communities. Health care is inadequate and inaccessible: many of my constituents in rural west Cumbria cannot gain access to a national health service dentist as a result of Conservative policies. Low pay is a chronic problem in rural communities. Even recognising that, the Conservatives tried to abolish the agricultural wages board—in the teeth of the opposition of farmers, incidentally. They left us and the farmers with the tragic consequences of BSE and the beef crisis.

The list of Tory failures is almost endless. Rural parishes were destroyed: 75 per cent. were left with no daily bus service; 82 per cent. were left with no food-only shop; 70 per cent. were left with no general store; 43 per cent. were left with no post office—and the Conservatives tried to privatise that, too. In addition, 93 per cent. were left with no public nursery provision; and 91 per cent. were left with no access to day care, banks or building societies. That is the Tory party's record. What a legacy, yet they have the gall—the brass neck—to table such a motion.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) rose—

Mr. Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) rose—

Dr. Cunningham: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Ruane: Would my right hon. Friend consider adding to that list Alar in the apple industry, anthrax in the pig industry, botulism in the food processing industry, salmonella in the chicken industry, listeria in the dairy industry, E. coli in the meat industry and BSE in the beef industry?

Dr. Cunningham: As I said, the list is almost endless.

As the Agriculture Committee points out in its good and constructive report, the previous Government bequeathed an "unenviable inheritance" to this Government on BSE. In short, the previous Government presided over the worst crisis in British agriculture this century, destroying beef farming and loading colossal costs on to taxpayers, culminating in the tragedy of new variant CJD. It is an appalling record.

The election of a Labour Government last May signalled a clear break with the past right across Britain. That is as true in rural areas as it is in towns and cities. The Labour party is effectively—indeed, formidably—represented in rural areas and I am proud to have represented a rural constituency in west Cumbria for almost 28 years.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is proud to be the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Mrs. Wright, whose family farm is in Salmesbury in my constituency, telephoned me today and wanted to know the answer to two questions. First, what is the Minister's response to last night's "Panorama" programme? Secondly, does the Minister fully appreciate the number of hours that farmers put in every day, seven days a week, to make a small return? The Minister heard what my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) said about the returns that farmers get. Will he answer both those questions, please?

Dr. Cunningham: My response to the "Panorama" programme is that I was in it and gave my response at the time. On the second question, the hon. Gentleman can tell his constituent that I am well aware of how hard-working and industrious farmers are.

Mr. Evans: My constituent does not think so.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman had better tell his constituent that I have represented people like her for much longer than he has. I represent many, many farmers in west Cumbria. Nothing changed under Tory policies for hill farmers with incomes in the lowest decile of farm incomes.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister visit my constituency?

Dr. Cunningham: No, I shall not promise to visit the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Rural people voted for our policies, which are putting more money into health care in rural areas and, for the first time, making allowances for the extra costs of emergency ambulance care in rural areas. They voted for our new deal, which the Conservative party opposes. That is bringing quality jobs and training to young people. Pilot schemes of that £3.5 billion initiative in counties such as Cumbria and Cornwall are already showing the potential for benefiting rural as well as urban areas. Those same people voted for a Government who would understand the need throughout the country for regional development agencies that could understand different regions' unique needs.

The difficulties in British farming and the concerns for the future felt by people in rural areas are the result not of 10 brief months of the new Labour Government but of 18 years of failure by the Tory party in office.

Action for Communities in Rural England said of the Conservative record:

"Our main perception is one of neglect."

The NFU and the Country Landowners Association also complained about Conservative neglect of their interests. The Conservative party's attempts to proclaim itself as the party of the countryside just do not wash. It should credit the public with a longer memory of its record in government, although we all understand why it wishes to forget that record.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No, not for the moment.

Farm incomes have been in long-term decline for more than two decades, apart from the brief period between 1992 and 1996. The situation then changed temporarily only because sterling's weakness gave British farmers bigger rises in income than those in any other European country. Naturally, European farmers then complained that the playing field had been tilted too far in Britain's favour.

We have already promised more essential help for farmers who need it most—certainly more than the Tory Government were prepared to plan for or provide. The package of measures that I announced in December, which was targeted at livestock farmers who have particular disadvantages, was worth an extra £85 million. The measures that I announced last week were worth £70 million to the same sector. A further £9 million, which is not new money but money that has been recycled from a scheme under which some farmers were paid too much and others too little, will go principally to suckler cow farms.

We are working consistently to lift the beef ban. Indeed, the scheme is being considered today and tomorrow in the Standing Veterinary Committee in Brussels. We are working constructively with our European partners, the member states and the institutions of the European Union, within which Britain is no longer reviled and mistrusted as it was when the Conservative party was in power.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) rose—

Dr. Cunningham: I give way to my constituency neighbour.

Mr. Collins: The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned the income of hill farmers several times. Many hill farmers in his constituency and in mine are on incomes of much less than £10,000 a year. How can he justify spending more than £10,000 on a desk?

Dr. Cunningham: I am sorry that I took the hon. Gentleman seriously. I did not spend £10,000 on a desk, let alone more than £10,000. The hon. Gentleman should look at the figures. I shall not be sidetracked, but if the hon. Gentleman wants to read something accurate in The Guardian, he should read today's editorial, and not refer repeatedly to yesterday's misleading and inaccurate article. I regret inviting that particular journalist into the Ministry and taking him through—[Interruption.] I want to be open about what is going on.

Mr. Jack: What about the £2.3 million?

Dr. Cunningham: There is no such expenditure figure. We are reorganising the Ministry, because the previous Government left it in a shambles. Many buildings used by the Ministry are decrepit, dilapidated and under-utilised. [Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Minister of State says from a sedentary position, others are unsafe.

Today, I decided to bring our civil servants into the centre of London from places such as Tolworth, where the previous Administration left them, and to dispose of surplus sites and assets. The taxpayer will see a substantial profit from that exercise.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I am anxious to hear more about the possible internal reorganisation of MAFF, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and other Departments, because that is slightly more significant in the long term than the cost of office furniture. The rueful smile crossing the right hon. Gentleman's face has perhaps given me the answer before he has said anything. Can he put further flesh on the bones of weekend press reports, and tell us the time scale for reaching any decisions?

Dr. Cunningham: I cannot provide more flesh off the bone, let alone on the bone.

The Prime Minister asked me to do several things at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, one of which was to set up the Food Standards Agency. We are making good progress, and the White Paper has been exceptionally well received. We are reorganising, redirecting and slimming down the Ministry—many civil servants will leave as a result—and giving it a new open culture, but the Prime Minister will make the final decisions.

The right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) is smiling benignly at me. He rarely does so, but he is welcome to continue, for a while at least. The right hon. Gentleman knows that decisions about changes to Ministries and the machinery of government in Whitehall are for Prime Ministers, not individual Ministers. I have noted what the Select Committee on Agriculture and the Country Landowners Association have said on the subject, but no decisions have been taken. I will not be tempted any further on that issue.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No, I want to deal with the nonsense that we heard from the right hon. Member for Fylde.

The prudent control of public expenditure is a Government commitment. Every time the right hon. Gentleman comes to the Dispatch Box, he demands more support and public expenditure, but never puts a figure on it or says where the money should come from. He is almost always misleading, as he was today. The right hon. Gentleman knows this well, but the record should be set straight: the Conservative Government never once in 18 years recycled money from European budgetary contributions back into Ministries—MAFF or any Ministry. His argument is a complete fraud.

The Conservative party never once paid agrimonetary compensation when in office, probably because the previous Prime Minister, as a former Chancellor of the Exchequer, knew that £86 out of every £100 would have to come from the Exchequer.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No, not on that point.

Let us hear no more of those fraudulent arguments. The right hon. Member for Fylde knows, as we do, that easy, no-cost money from Brussels is not available to the Government or to farmers.

Mr. Jack: My figures are based on Treasury figures. Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that the Economic Secretary's answer about the £400 million that the Chancellor gave away in his July Budget is wrong, and that underspend on the EAGGF did not help to provide that £400 million?

Dr. Cunningham: Not at all; I am saying something completely different. If the right hon. Gentleman does not understand, he clearly has a problem with understanding what goes on in the Treasury and in Brussels.

The Government have provided an extra £447 million for shire counties to raise school standards and to repair school buildings which were neglected under the previous Administration; £900 million of capital receipts is being released for new homes in urban and rural areas; and an extra £1.5 billion has been made available for the national health service in all areas of the country. Work opportunities for young people are being created through the biggest welfare-to-work programme in history, and pathfinder schemes are already operating in rural areas in Cornwall and Cumbria; £300 million has been provided for child care, and pilot programmes have been set up in rural as well as urban areas. Rural transport needs are being examined by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and his ministerial team—I am delighted to welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) to the Front Bench this evening—as part of the Government's integrated transport strategy. A rate relief scheme will give sole post offices and general stores in small rural villages 50 per cent. off their rates bills.

We have released a consultation paper on access that balances the needs of landowners—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber.

Dr. Cunningham: I think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that some Conservative Members have spent too much time recently in the vicinity of hunting horns.

Last week's announcement about the green belt will help to protect the countryside, as will the extension of the green belt that has been agreed since the Government were elected. We have found extra resources for hill and livestock farmers as well as the additional £70 million in costs which we removed last week. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) must be quiet. I demand silence.

Dr. Cunningham: Farmers will begin to receive those payments next week.

Yesterday, I visited the Alnwick district in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Did the right hon. Gentleman have lunch with the Duke of Northumberland?

Dr. Cunningham: I met the Duke, and he was a welcoming and generous host.

I was greeted warmly by the leader of the council—who, incidentally, was not a Labour party councillor—and was astonished when he announced to the gathering of farmers, farmers' wives and other people from rural communities that, in the history of the district council and in the past 18 years, in one of the most rural parts of one of the most rural counties in England, no Conservative agriculture Minister had shown his face.

That is indicative of the Conservative party's betrayal of rural areas. It is a record which we and the country roundly condemn. It is a record which we shall erase, while demonstrating that we are genuinely committed to all the people of this country.

8.10 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): At the end of his speech, the Minister made a point in passing. The Government—and the Liberal Democrats, for that matter—rightly point to the 18 years that preceded the events of last May, and it is fanciful nonsense to suppose that the British public are so thick that they imagine that all the problems of the countryside began on the stroke of midnight on 2 May. The truth is, however, that ever since the days of "dig for victory" during the second world war, thanks to social, economic and technological changes, the country has seen almost the reverse of the industrial revolution. That is behind many of the problems of the countryside as much as specific policy controversies, or the shortcomings of Administrations of one hue or another.

One hundred years ago, people were moving from the country into the city—into conurbations—in search of work. Now, owing to technology, greater social mobility and increased disposable income, more and more people are moving to the country, taking with them pressures that are attitudinal as well as infrastructural. I feel that, given the seriousness of the subject, it is worthy of a slightly greater sense of perspective in regard to time than has been allowed for by the Conservative party.

The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) produced a selective series of statistics showing how well his party was doing, on the basis of a sample of 100 rural seats. It would be interesting to be given the same statistics on the basis of a sample of 200 seats. We would then find that Labour and the Liberal Democrats handsomely outnumber the Conservatives in terms of rural representatives. I empathise with the right hon. Gentleman, however. For four years, I was something called the president of my party, and I always took the view that the difference between the leader and the president was this: when the party won a by-election on a sensational swing, my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) would be seen on "Newsnight" saying what a great breakthrough it had been, but when a by-election was lost—and the candidate's deposit with it—the president would be seen on "Newsnight" telling Jeremy Paxman that, in fact, the lost deposit was a very encouraging base on which to build for the future. I felt that there was a hint of that in the opening analysis of the right hon. Member for Fylde.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I was elected by only 77 votes; the Liberals were pushed into third place by the Labour party. I congratulate the Minister, who, in 10 months, has converted my local farmers from being very anti-me and the Conservative Government to being totally against him. Surely the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) does not support that lot, who have made such a disastrous job of the past 10 months.

Mr. Kennedy: My colleagues and I are immensely encouraged by that tale. If the farmers began by hating the hon. Gentleman and now hate the Government as well, that must mean that we are set for another appearance on "Newsnight" by my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil. What a great day for us that will be.

It is interesting that the Conservatives entitled the debate "Listening to the Countryside". Listening is a faculty that we did not associate with them during their period in office. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) pointed out, if we were concerned about the Conservatives' faculties in general, we would be concerned not just about their capacity to hear, but about their capacity to remember even recent history in this context.

I do not think that the amazing scenes in London on Sunday—in which a number of us were very pleased to participate—should be interpreted by the Conservatives as an overwhelming endorsement of all that they stand for. I think that they should be interpreted as a rainbow coalition of contradictory viewpoints sending a common signal. There was a general concern for the countryside as a whole. The march was disparaged in some ministerial quarters, although not in others. I have to say that, for once, I agreed with the Minister for the Environment. I felt that he was entirely right, as Minister for the Environment, to turn up and to make it clear that he disagreed with one of the central tenets of the march. I consider that not an inconsistent position, but a perfectly sensible one. [Interruption.] I am interested by the running commentary that I am hearing from Conservative Members.

The march achieved one thing apart from the tremendous image that it presented. It led to a raft of policy statements during the week. If the threat, or the approach, of the march could achieve that, let us hope that its aftermath will achieve even more.

I note that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths)—the Welsh agriculture Minister—looked as rueful as the Minister himself over departmental reorganisations. I do not refer only to the original reorganisations applying to the Minister's Department—the Food Standards Agency and all the rest. I am thinking of changes elsewhere in Government that are being implemented under—I fear—the none-too-sensitive hand of the Deputy Prime Minister, affecting both the structure and the funding of the Rural Development Commission and its absorption into the regional development agencies.

I should have thought that, if the Government are having something of a turf war in Whitehall on what kind of rural-agricultural agency may yet emerge, they would take a fresh look at their own legislation. They might ask themselves whether it would make more sense, if such an agency is established, not to subsume the RDC in the original RDAs—where many of us feel that the voice of rural Britain will not be heard sufficiently—but to merge it with the Countryside Commission and make it answerable to a rural and agricultural Ministry. I think that that would be a much more sensitive approach than the approach that we might see if the agency ends up in the Deputy Prime Minister's super-glorified Department.

Dr. John Cunningham: The budget of the Rural Development Commission will be ring-fenced within RDAs, and at least one member of the agency will be given specific responsibility for rural areas and rural enterprise. As for the wider argument, the important thing is to get the decisions right if there is to be any reorganisation in Whitehall. Turf wars usually result in people not getting things right. In politics, it is important not to engage in a turf war in the first place.

Mr. Kennedy: I do not think that that last comment was directed at me. I hope that those at whom it was directed will read it in Hansard, and will act accordingly. Liberal Democrats are always willing to act as a useful conduit for the Minister to engage in megaphone diplomacy with some of his ministerial colleagues.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): Is the hon. Gentleman aware—given the intervention by the Minister of Agriculture—that, in the Standing Committee debating the Regional Development Agencies Bill, the Government specifically rejected the idea of giving one person in the regional development agencies a mandate to deal specifically with rural issues? The Government are, therefore, doing exactly the opposite of what the Minister said in this debate that they wanted to do. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the sensible thing would be if the entire membership of the agencies were mandated to keep an eye specifically on rural interests? Would he also be interested to know that the Government plan to incorporate the rump of the Rural Development Commission into the Countryside Commission—unless the Government's fundamental spending review cuts all the commission's remaining money, as is entirely possible?

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I think that it was T. S. Eliot who wrote:

"In a minute there is time for decisions and revisions,

Which a minute will reverse."

It may well prove to be the case that the confusion on the issue that we saw spilling out in column inches from different bits of the Government over the weekend has not yet been fully clarified.

Regardless of whether there is to be ring fencing of funding or only one person designated to deal with countryside matters, the fact is that one person would not be sufficient to deal with them. Although the RDC's impact on the rural areas that it covers—in the north of England and Cornwall, for example—is very important, the totality of its budget compared with those that will be available to RDAs will be sufficiently small—significant though those funds will be for the areas that they cover—that ring fencing will not act as a sufficient safeguard. I should prefer wider consideration to be given to the matter.

In a very good letter in today's The Daily Telegraph, Lord Barber of Tewkesbury said that—of all people—the late Nicholas Ridley, who may not have had the greatest credentials in countryside matters, had a blueprint ready to go as far back as 1987 to deal with those matters. It might be worth revisiting that blueprint to discover whether it is applicable to current circumstances.

Mr. Luff: May I be clear about the hon. Gentleman's comments? Is he suggesting that Liberal Democrat party policy is now to support the creation of a Department of rural affairs, along the lines suggested by the Agriculture Select Committee in its first report, which was endorsed in an early-day motion signed by 60 Labour Members?

Mr. Kennedy: No; we shall have to wait and examine the Government's proposals. I am trying to say that if the Government are examining the matter—as the Minister, in his interventions, has clearly confirmed that they are—they will have to consider the implications of other bits of legislation that are being passed in parallel with that Bill.

Ministers will have to consider two issues. First, if a post were created at Cabinet level, they would have to determine how to prevent it from being regarded as a rural ghetto for all rural issues, allowing other Ministers completely to switch their attention from the rural implications of their policies. If that were to happen, it would be a setback rather than a step forward. Secondly, Ministers will have to deal with the extremely vexed issue of planning, and decide who will responsible for it. The planning issue will have to be examined very carefully.

Many of the issues that have been raised in this debate, as detailed in the Conservatives' motion and in the Government's amendment, show that—as the Minister knows that we have argued—there is now an overwhelming case for a royal commission to examine countryside issues.

The flashpoint for recent concerns—leading to last summer's protest in Hyde park, and to this weekend's events—may have been the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill, and perhaps the post-Dunblane gun legislation. Those were rightly regarded as free-vote issues in the House and divided all parties. If there is to be a royal commission, surely it is sensible that it should encompass not only the types of issue that I mentioned earlier, but those more recent issues, and determine—as it looks as though that private Member's Bill will die a death on Friday—whether we can find a way forward.

Mr. Gray: Is the hon. Gentleman interested to note that the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) has not been in the Chamber for any part of this debate?

Mr. Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman makes his point. We may hear in Friday's debate why the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) has not attended.

Liberal Democrat Members commend the idea of a royal commission to examine overall countryside concerns. A commission could also examine the other issues that have been raised in this debate, the first of which is the catastrophic situation vis-a-vis farm incomes.

A couple of weeks ago, hon. Members may have heard on "Farming Today" a representative of Barclays bank say that farmers are perhaps in for a better year. However, in the recent edition of Farmers Weekly, another representative of Barclays pointed out that, in the most extreme cases, farm incomes would fall from £47,500, in 1996, to only £2,485 this year. That exceeds the traditional picture of farming in which one or two good years help to compensate for one or two bad years. That peak and trough will be disastrous not only for farmers, but for the rural economy.

The position of farmers was well summed up by a very entertaining barrister who spoke, a couple of weeks ago, at the National Farmers Union's annual dinner in London. He said that he spoke to a wholesaler in Yorkshire, who said that farm incomes were now so bad that even the blighters who did not pay had stopped ordering. [Laughter.] That was a graphic illustration of just how bad things have become.

We must undoubtedly deal with the issue of farm incomes. Equally, there is no doubt that the continuing unjust ban on British beef is contributing significantly not only to depressed morale, but to depressed income and depressed opportunities to enhance income. In his reply, perhaps the Minister will reflect on reports in today's Evening Standard that the Department has issued further clarification to inspectors on policing the ban, and that meat inspectors are being encouraged to act as agents provocateurs in many respects. If that is not the case, we would like clarification of the matter—which has been well spelt out in the Evening Standard, with attendant supporting quotes.

[Mr. Kennedy]

The Minister of Agriculture currently holds the presidency of the Council of Agriculture Ministers. The Government have also placed great emphasis on reforming the common agricultural policy. The emphasis on that reform has undoubtedly changed significantly since the beginning of year—reflecting, we believe, Germany's upcoming elections, in September, and the fact that Chancellor Kohl does not want to open up that Pandora's box in immense detail, especially after this weekend's election results, which he will have to consider.

One wonders, therefore, whether the Government are not putting the cart before the horse. Last night on "Panorama", the Minister was at pains to stress the need to get away from the subsidy regime and to restructure the policy. Reform is part of a bigger debate. However, surely it is better not to restructure on a United Kingdom-wide basis until we know what shape and form Agenda 2000 will take; it may cause even more dislocation.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman is making an important point. Surely we can all see that the policies that have been pursued for the past couple of decades have not well served farmers, let alone consumers or the environment. There is an overwhelming case for change; the question is how and to what time scale we shall manage that change. The hon. Gentleman was, of course, right to say that one of the first proposals that we shall see from the Fischler package of reform will be on restructuring the beef sector throughout Europe. He was right also to say that we must insist that the brunt of the burden of restructuring the beef sector does not continue to be borne by British beef farmers—as it has been for the past three or four years—but is shared equally across the European Union.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Minister for that response. I tell him constructively that, if that attitude were being expressed more strongly by him and the Ministry—

Dr. Cunningham: It is.

Mr. Kennedy: As the Minister well knows, politics—he has been in this business a long time; a lot, lot longer than I—is about perceptions as much as anything else. The current perception outside the House is that such restructuring is not the Government's priority. Farming sectors will be more reassured if he and his colleagues take more opportunities to emphasise that that is the Government's priority. Hon. Members who represent those sectors would be significantly assisted in our jobs, when dealing with local farmers, if they were to do so.

On the CAP reform, given the general consensus that there should be greater emphasis on environmentalism, if we allow the baby to be thrown out with the bath water, there will not be sufficient personnel on the land to carry out the husbandry that will be essential to the environmental protection enhancement that we all support. If we allow it to go wrong, it will also defeat Europe's stated objectives.

On the right to roam, I welcome the fact that, last week, the Government opted for local voluntary agreements, although there is a different legal and traditional framework in Scotland which works rather well, albeit in a rather piecemeal fashion. There is no reason why it should not be extended south of the border, although it might be helpful to remove the continuing uncertainty. As for the squeeze on local authority funding, the worry is not that the landlords will create problems, but that local authorities are likely to say, "Let us sit back and do nothing for 18 months or two years. We know that there will be legislation at a later date that will allow us to proceed from a statutory position rather than have to make the time and effort to deploy personnel to negotiate local voluntary agreements".

In respect of the local authorities, our principal disagreement with the Government remains, and it impacts on the countryside as much as on everything else. By accepting the rather arbitrary Conservative spending limitations which, in the unlikely event that the Tories had won the election, the previous Chancellor would have broken on day one—of that there can be no realistic doubt—

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: No. I am concluding my remarks. The Government are making it almost impossible to meet the laudable objectives that would unite a considerable body of opinion in different parties in the House in respect of countryside concerns and the rural environment. Although the Government have taken some initial positive steps, they clearly have a long way to go, largely because they are hamstrung by an item of their own making—accepting their predecessors' artificial constraints and sticking to them unrealistically. Due to that and other disagreements of principle with the Government, we shall not support them tonight. Nor shall we be giving our endorsement—[Interruption.] It takes a particular acumen to know when both parties are wrong.

As I was saying, our disagreement with the Government is on principle, but we disagree with the Conservatives because we are not prepared to be unprincipled, as their amendment is tonight.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): I represent a large rural constituency and I am also the patron of Country Guardian, of which the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) is president. It is an organisation which exists to prevent country-loving landowners from putting wind turbines all over choice upland areas.

It is interesting that the Conservatives—the "true party of the countryside"—have not been able to muster a dozen Back Benchers to attend their own debate. That shows how much interest they have in the countryside. Only eight Conservative Back Benchers are present in the Chamber.

A few weeks ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) initiated a debate on rural poverty that was well attended by Labour and Liberal Democrat Members. For the Conservatives, there was a brief appearance by the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark), who made a short speech about his rural constituents and then left. The only Back-Bench Member present was the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen). The Conservative Whip wound up the debate as no Front-Bench representative was present. That was emblematic of the Conservatives' true concern for the countryside. They have no interest whatever in rural poverty, isolation in the countryside or the regeneration of the rural economy. They are interested only in the continuation of blood sports, which are opposed by 57 per cent. of rural dwellers, the preservation of privileged enclaves in the countryside and, most seriously, the creation of a false division between town and country.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): First, the hon. Gentleman is completely wrong to say that I attended the debate only briefly. I was present for virtually the entire debate. If the hon. Gentleman was there, he will have heard what I said. Secondly, I made none of the points that he identified with the Conservative party. I said exactly the reverse and many of his colleagues praised my speech. I do not know whether or not the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber throughout, but if he reads Hansard he will see that I am correct.

Mr. Pickthall: I do not remember the right hon. Gentleman's speech being praised by my colleagues, but I remember him leaving shortly after making his speech.

The Tories and the Countryside Alliance seem to assume that the United Kingdom is made up of rolling countryside occupied by real British people—a squirearchy served by cheerfully toiling peasants, farmers and hunters—and opposed by huge urban conurbations such as Greater Manchester—full of alien masses that are eager to burst out and swamp merry England. They do not address the reality of much of Britain—the complex interpenetration of rural areas, market towns, large villages, suburbs and, of course, larger towns and cities. They consider urban dwellers visiting the countryside or seeking to live there to be alien interlopers, but feel that it is perfectly natural for rural dwellers to penetrate urban areas for work, services or leisure activities.

It is airily forgotten by many Conservatives that the industrial, commercial and tax base of our economy is largely urban and that if it were the collective will to end all agricultural subsidies, each taxpayer would save £4 a week and most farmers would be bankrupt. They forget that a child in a rural school costs the taxpayer in Lancashire, for example, four times as much as a child in an urban school and that does not include school transport. They forget that without urban links all rural rail services would cease and that local authority transport subsidies are almost all that keep rural services going.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pickthall: No. I am trying to be brief, as many of my hon. Friends are waiting to speak.

It is forgotten that the opponents of overdevelopment in the countryside—of whom I am emphatically one—are not just those who come from 10 generations of green wellies and Barbours. They are often urban escapees, whose first priority, having grabbed a chunk of rural Britain, is to pull up the drawbridge so that other townies cannot get anywhere near them.

The underlying presumption by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions that the health and prosperity of the countryside is inextricably bound up with the health and prosperity of urban areas is exactly right. The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) has expressed the same view on several occasions, and I agreed with him each time.

I recite all that, not to attack the countryside in which I live, but to assert the need for balance as opposed to the recent drive to create enmity and rivalry. Town and country should forge alliances against their common problems, as is the case in many shires, although some of those alliances have been badly damaged by the creation of unitary authorities.

The stirring up of hatred by the Countryside Alliance and the killing wing of the Conservative party is extremely dangerous and threatens every rational attempt to address the genuine needs of the countryside.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pickthall: No. The Conservative motion begins by recognising the concern of those marching on London, and that is fair enough. It then attacks falling farm incomes, rising food imports, the beef ban—which was achieved by the Conservatives—the minimum wage, the working time directive, Agenda 2000, the rate support grant settlement and the right of access to the countryside. It makes not one mention of hunting. Yet Robin Hanbury-Tenison, a well known hyphen and chief executive of the Countryside Alliance said in a press release yesterday:

> "Yesterday's march demonstrated . . . the concerns of rural people. Fears for the future of hunting and field sports, and deep concern at the problems facing livestock farmers were undoubtedly the issues that brought the majority of the crowd to London."

He goes on:

> "Yesterday's march could not have happened without hunting."

So why is there no mention of it in the Conservative motion? Could it be that it has finally sunk into the brain of the Leader of the Opposition that more than 70 per cent. of the population support the Bill proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster)? If they decided to march through London, they would take about a week to march past Nelson's column.

The central concern of the countryside is the difficulty faced by many farmers. After a number of good years, they are having a bad year, largely as a result of the level of the pound, but also because of the problems with beef. It is worth reiterating that no other sector of the economy has had so much subsidy or compensation in hard times. My hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) has had to leave the Chamber because of his feelings about mines. Many of us share those feelings.

We are constantly told that the Government are doing nothing for farmers. The Government were right to remove the cost burden of cattle identification and meat hygiene inspection, but they should expect no thanks for that—and they got none from the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). Rather, they should expect further demands.

I did not notice many banners on Sunday attacking supermarket buying policies, which can have as debilitating an effect on farming as BSE. Safeway in my constituency recently announced that it was ceasing to buy locally grown produce. Farmers have rightly complained that lower prices for their meat are not reflected in lower prices on supermarket shelves. I saw no banners saying, "Growers against the Government", although they are having a hard time, too. I represent many growers. There is more to agriculture than beef, although one would not think so listening to the Conservatives. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) once memorably said, he is not just the Minister for meat.

The National Farmers Union bravely addressed the long-term structural problems of agriculture in its document, "Options for Change" a couple of years ago. The NFU and the Government agree on the need for common agricultural policy reform and the steady removal of subsidy and quotas. We should be working on that agenda, not one designed to provoke the majority in this country to say, "A plague on farmers and on the countryside."

The Government should look closely at the labelling of foodstuffs so that the consumer can choose British meat—and other products—with confidence. We should also examine the distribution of beef cattle compensation. It is logical that there should be much greater compensation for a pedigree beef animal than for a finished dairy cow.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has effectively addressed my concerns about building development in the countryside and the need to protect the green belt in particular. However, I urge him not to have a blanket policy on urban brown-field sites. We must not forget that towns need open spaces, too. The ending of predict and provide and the policy to take more planning decisions regionally represent an important breakthrough, marking a major change from the previous Government's attitude to planning in the countryside, which all too often was just to let it rip.

Governments cannot achieve the same services, leisure facilities, transport systems and choice of occupation for people in rural areas as are available for those in urban areas, contrary to what the Country Landowners Association foolishly asserted in the handout that it sent us today. Similarly, it is not possible to achieve for people in urban areas the benefits of clean air, open landscapes and small, quiet communities enjoyed by most people in rural areas. Government, local and national, must ensure that each is available to the other as easily as possible without damaging either. Public transport systems through rural areas provide a crucial means of achieving that. Government policy is moving in the right direction on that.

It is disturbing that a vociferous minority, purporting to represent rural areas, is seeking to brand the towns as predatory and privileged and to keep townspeople out of large chunks of the countryside if possible. Most people in rural areas feel no antagonism towards the towns. If anything, they feel sympathy, sometimes even pity. Most of my rural constituents have not been impressed by the motives of many involved in Sunday's demonstration, sympathetic though they are to the concerns of farmers and some of the other groups represented on the march.

When the Countryside Alliance shouts, "Listen to us"—not, "Please listen to us"—they really mean, "Don't listen to anyone else." The Conservatives—devastated at the election result in rural and urban areas—are desperately seeking to claw back support in what they have always regarded as their heartlands. If they cannot do that, they have no hope of ever forming a Government again. In the process, they are trying to obliterate from the public memory 18 years in which they presided over the devastation of rural areas such as mine in matters ranging from housing, transport and schools to BSE. They should remember that the march on Sunday may not have been the tip of the iceberg, but the whole of it and that the ship of state, to stretch the image, spotted it a while ago and has sailed on by.

8.45 pm

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): I am glad to have the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I am concerned from the speech of the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) that we are being treated to a selective interpretation of what happened on Sunday. The great thing about Sunday's march was that it brought together such a wide range of interests—a patchwork of people with different concerns for the countryside. We have to be careful about selective interpretation. The Conservative party was careful not to abuse the request from the Countryside Alliance to keep the march apolitical. We tried our best to respect that.

I owe it to those of my constituents who participated in the march to use this opportunity to articulate their concerns in Parliament. I feel strongly that the Government amendment seriously misses the mark. At no point during 18 years of Conservative agricultural policy did more than 250,000 people find it necessary to descend en masse on the capital to express their fears for the future.

One had only to ask those taking part to discover the causes that brought them to London. Like me, many of them had sat at the back of the hall during the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's address to the National Farmers Union annual general meeting. They became increasingly disappointed, then annoyed, by what they had to listen to. He did not uphold new Labour's promises of partnership. I was appalled by the mismatch between his statement on page one that "the Government seeks a partnership with everyone involved in agriculture" and the use of the word "we" shortly afterwards referring only to the Government. In most of what followed, he consistently used the word "you" to refer to the industry in phrases such as, "the challenge to you" and "yours is the choice".

Partnership requires co-operation and communication between two or more parties.

Mrs. Anne McGuire (Stirling): Will the hon. Lady explain what partnership the previous Administration were involved in when they closed their eyes in the hope that BSE would go away between 1988 and 1996? What communication was there between the then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the farmers?

Mrs. Spelman: Practical partnership when facing a food scare established by the scientific community means listening to the advice of the scientific community and following it. The previous Government undertook that.

In contrast, when the present Government were presented with scientific options, they selected one without consultation.

Mrs. McGuire: Will the hon. Lady give way again?

Mrs. Spelman: Not again. I should like to proceed. I think that I have described the professional partnership between the Government and scientific bodies adequately.

The greatest offence in that speech was the Minister's separation of the industry from the Government, again using the word "you", saying:

"Farmers need to be good business people."

Apart from stating the blindingly obvious, he was rather patronisingly suggesting that they are not good business people. The successful rationalisation and modernisation—a response to world market forces in agriculture—that has been achieved in this country is a tribute to the good business management of the majority of farmers.

The Minister's speech was full of hand-washing phrases designed to exonerate the new Government from blame for the farming crisis. Hiding behind Conservative spending plans or suggesting that farmers should have set more money aside in good times is an inadequate response to the crisis facing the countryside.

The farmer who built the beacon in my constituency on Thursday is not untypical. He has had to sell his farmhouse. Formerly, he and his brother farmed together and hired labour. His brother had to find a job in landscape gardening; they no longer hire labour. That is a typical example of the real crisis faced today. That was why he was so keen to have the beacon built on his land: as a statement of his practical experience.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Is the hon. Lady aware of the Conservatives on North Yorkshire county council who have made known their intention to sell their farm estate? As the farm estate is the way in which most people without means come on to the land, does she agree that those Conservative county councillors deserve condemnation?

Mrs. Spelman: I am wisely advised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), who has a better understanding of that part of Britain, that the council has to make such a move because the local government financial settlement, under a Labour Government, put the council in the financial position of having to realise an asset.

Why would the NFU, an organisation which has been commended by Labour, go to the lengths of producing slogans such as "Keep Britain Farming" and putting them on trailers and standing them over motorways if there were not a real threat? An empty threat would simply bring that organisation's reputation into disrepute.

The Government cannot wash their hands of the impact of their economic policies since they came to power. Allowing the Bank of England to raise interest rates has resulted in five separate rises since 1 May. It is to the immense frustration of farmers that the political instrument that the Minister has at his disposal under the common agricultural policy to compensate for such currency fluctuations just lies motionless on his table. It may be possible in the short term to "tough out" such times of strong currency, but do the Government envisage the pound weakening in the short term? Is it not rather more likely that Britain's position outside European monetary union—[Interruption.] I am not making a comment on that stance. We must think about the consequences of the policy. It will attract speculation on our currency, result in a strong pound and aggravate the difficulties faced by agriculture. The instrument that could do something about that lies unutilised on the Minister's table.

It is not possible for the Government to wash their hands of the deepening crisis and ignore the way in which their policies have aggravated the situation for the beef industry. The Government's decision to impose a ban on beef on the bone was riddled with inconsistency. We find that the guiding principle of the new Food Standards Agency will be to give consumers the right information and allow them the freedom to decide. Yet precisely the opposite is true of the ban on beef on the bone. That is why the decision has attracted ridicule in the wider population—urban and rural. The nannying stance of deciding for others in the case of minimal risk is what has so irritated consumers.

The march sought not only to call the Government to account for such decisions but to draw attention to what is ahead. At the NFU annual general meeting, we saw a little of the Minister gazing into the future. I am concerned by the inexperience and naivety of his perspective on the future of British agriculture. He said that he "wants to see changes . . . so that British farmers can take full advantage of growing world markets".

Although we all aspire to a reduction in agricultural support and want a reduction in protectionism in agriculture, it is unrealistic to think that British agriculture can survive on its own with reduced support in a market where competing countries would not hesitate to capitalise on a disadvantaged competitor.

A reduction in agricultural subsidy is a sincerely held objective among Conservative Members and has been progressively achieved in GATT rounds, but any comparative advantage that Britain enjoys with its relatively large farming structures pales into insignificance alongside the economies of scale of the prairies of the mid west, the plantations of South America and the low-wage farming of the far east. The new Government's policy direction of unilateral disarmament, particularly in relation to sectors that are experiencing an abnormal crisis, is irresponsible.

The Minister has been challenged on numerous occasions in the Chamber over his commitment to the beef industry. It was pointed out to him that, in Agenda 2000, there is a Commission intention to reduce the size of the beef sector in Europe by 30 per cent. It was put to him that the current situation in British farming and the inadequate support given to the beef sector in order that it might stabilise its position could result in the entire 30 per cent. reduction occurring in this country. Yet we have been given no adequate answer.

Mr. Hayes: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that, when the Minister was asked in the Select Committee on Agriculture whether he had a vision, a view, a projection for the amount of production or the number of producers in the British beef industry, he was sadly lacking?

[Mr. Hayes]

That lack of strategic vision, of targets, was pointed out in the Select Committee's reports on beef and on Agenda 2000—by all Committee members, not just Opposition Members.

Mrs. Spelman: Consequently, the Select Committee, which has a majority of Labour Members, concludes its report on the beef industry by saying that the UK beef industry "could become too enfeebled to restructure itself rationally".

That is the very point that I have been making. With inadequate help, Britain will unilaterally disarm an otherwise profitable, competent and professionally run sector, which is handicapped by the Government's handling of it.

Mr. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): Are the hon. Lady and her colleagues aware that farming, deep though its crisis is, involves and employs a relatively small proportion of people who live in the countryside? Whether or not farming was in crisis, 56 per cent. of people in rural parishes would still be left without a shop of any kind, 45 per cent. without a post office, 53 per cent. without a school, 84 per cent. without a general practitioner and 86 per cent. without a rural bus service. What has she to say to people in rural constituencies such as mine and hers whom she and her colleagues continue to ignore—even though they have called for this debate?

Mrs. Spelman: We do not ignore the ancillary industries serving agriculture. At my surgeries, I have repeatedly received delegations from farmers and from ancillary industries. The crisis in farming has knock-on consequences for a far wider group of people than the hon. Gentleman would imply. Only last week, I learnt that Massey Ferguson—a well-known tractor producer outside Coventry, offering jobs to a large number of the population of the surrounding conurbation—has been forced to adopt a three-day week. That is an example of the way in which the difficulties in the agricultural sector knock on to a wider range of industries.

The countryside is in crisis because the country is governed by an Administration who do not really understand its ways and presume, with the audacity of a new Government, to know better than country people how they should maintain our rural heritage. The Government are not prepared to fight for the needs of the countryside and, in a curious modern double-speak, claim a vision of the countryside which is strong, fair and modern while presiding over its demise. That is why people marched on Sunday—to demonstrate their solidarity with the many ancient rural traditions under threat.

The small concessions and selective back-tracking are no substitute for forward vision. Blaming a past Administration is a feeble attempt to duck responsibility. In opposition, we call the new Government to account. In so doing, we keep alive the hopes of the countryside protesters, who have no confidence that the Government will fight their corner.

8.59 pm

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): I am pleased to speak in this important and topical debate. I spend a lot of time listening to the voices of the countryside, and it is important to recognise first that there are different voices in the countryside. Countryside people are not a homogenous mass, and anyone who has had a meal around a farm kitchen table will recognise that.

I regularly speak to and arrange events with a range of countryside organisations—the Country Landowners Association, the National Farmers Union, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, the Countryside Commission, the Rural Development Commission, the National Trust, parish councils, the Council for National Parks, the Youth Hostels Association and the Ramblers Association. Let me make it clear to the House that I am a vice-president of the Ramblers Association.

Last weekend, I was tree planting and looking at erosion where people had been walking. The weekend before that, I was with the National Trust, looking at its positive policies in the High Peak. Not long ago, I spent a day on a hill farm, talking about the real problems that farmers have. Only yesterday, I was talking with people about traffic-calming measures and the powers of parish councils in rural areas.

Given all that, to be accused of not listening to the voice of the countryside, or of not understanding the delicate balances that exist there, is, to put it mildly, rather irritating. It is important to recognise that Labour Members representing county seats make up more countryside Members of Parliament than the Tories and Liberal Democrats put together.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tipping: No, I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman will make his own speech, if he has the opportunity.

I am backed by a fine group of parish, county and district local councillors, who look after the needs of the rural community.

I watched the countryside march with great interest. What surprised me was that I was not certain under what banner those people were marching. I am extremely grateful to the chief executive of the Countryside Alliance for telling me what the march was about. In a press release on 2 March, he said that the march

"could not have happened without hunting. More than 70 percent of the coaches and trains bringing people to London were organised by the hunting community."

That is not top of the agenda in the countryside that I know and love. There are important issues, hard questions and difficult decisions about priorities that must be made in the countryside, and it will take time to put them right.

What is my countryside agenda, and that of the people in Nottinghamshire to whom I speak? First, let us be straight—farmers face real problems. British farmers are the most efficient in Europe, but they face problems. Farm incomes have fallen, and we must contrast what is happening now and in the past year with previous years. We must be open—there is no point in having discussions with farmers unless we are open and honest. We must say that there is no pot of gold in Brussels. The story spread by Opposition Members about £985 million being made available is nonsense. The British taxpayer would have to contribute to 70 per cent. of the cost. It is all about priorities, and farm interests have had priority with this new Government. Let us not dismiss the fact that £85 million was made available before Christmas for the most disadvantaged farmers. Let us welcome the fact that £70 million will be made available for a cattle traceability scheme and let us remember that the Conservative party presided over the bovine spongiform encephalopathy crisis, but did not produce a computer scheme like that, which will help.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tipping: No, I will not.

New and extra money has been made available to farmers, on top of existing Tory spending plans. We must also remember that reform of the common agricultural policy is on the agenda. Enlargement will happen, and we shall have to move from a system in which we support production to one that is different. I hope that we shall work with our partners in Europe at the centre of Europe, using our voice wisely to bring in more money and investment, and to create jobs and investment in the rural economy. Also, I hope that we shall move towards a green premium, whereby we can lift the landscape and enhance the environment.

Farm incomes have fallen in recent years, and I am delighted that we have recognised that and are consulting and talking carefully to such bodies as the NFU about an early retirement scheme. Those are not easy issues and they will require a Government who look to the future, not the past, who believe that the countryside is for all our people and not merely for the landowners and who are prepared to take tough and hard decisions to drive reform through.

Progress is being made on lifting the environment. I was delighted that one of the first steps taken by the new Government was to put a moratorium on the sale of Forestry Commission land. Under the previous Government, a piece of land the size of the Isle of Wight was sold off, with no access to the public, whether the environment was rural or urban. I am also delighted that since the Government came to power, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has given no new consents for opencasting on green-field sites. That is widely recognised and welcomed throughout the countryside.

We have taken steps to ensure that we protect the green belt. I welcome the statement by the Secretary of State only last week, that 60 per cent. of new housing will be built on recycled sites, and his statement on sequential planning permissions—the end of predict and provide. Those are important steps forward. I look to the Budget for fiscal measures to reinforce that programme.

On a more critical note, there are real problems in the east midlands. Under the previous Government, 32 per cent. of houses were built on recycled sites. If I put that another way, under that Government, two out of every three houses were built in green-field areas. There are problems in my county of Nottinghamshire, where the previous Government endorsed a structure plan that provided 67,000 new houses. I must praise councils such as Gedling borough council, which is struggling to find a way through the Conservative Government's mess. I know that it welcomes the policy changes announced by the Secretary of State.

People in Nottinghamshire welcome the fact that this Government have put extra money into education. Nottinghamshire schools have an extra £12.2 million to spend next year as opposed to this. For the first time, there is new and extra money—2 per cent.—to develop new initiatives. The people welcome the new deal.

Mr. Hayes rose—

Mr. Tipping: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that last Friday the Newark Advertiser, a rural newspaper, welcomed the new deal, saying that it was by no means an inner-city policy. It welcomed the initiatives that we have taken.

One thing that filled me with enormous pleasure last week was the publication of our consultation paper, "Access to the open countryside in England and Wales". The principle of greater access is not negotiable. We want to ensure that access by the millennium—what a way to celebrate the millennium, with the right to walk over open countryside. We shall ensure that that promise is delivered. Landowners have been given a chance, and now it is up to them to respond. If they do not, legislation will follow.

I know that the countryside is not a museum—it has always changed, and it will always change. Our policy must be to ensure that that change is properly managed. I believe that we can achieve that. We shall consult and we shall listen. We are not ignorant of and arrogant about the countryside. Unlike the Conservative party, we are not full of pride and prejudice about it—we have sense, and we shall have sensitivity. We shall deliver. I am confident that, under the Labour Government, the countryside will be a place for all our people.

9.10 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) said, but I am not sure that I am a vice-president of the Ramblers Association.

Mr. Tipping: A very good and honoured supporter.

Mr. Steen: I know that I am something important in it. I am also involved with the Open Spaces Society and the Dartmoor Preservation Association. I cannot list as many great deeds as the hon. Gentleman did, but I have some interest in and experience of the countryside, and I want to share with the House what I believe to be some of the threats to the landscape and the continuation of the rural way of life.

All hon. Members will recognise that agriculture plays a central role in the rural economy. The rundown of a farm has a knock-on effect. For example, when I first went to South Hams in 1983, a father, his son and six workers used to repair tractors in the little village of East Allington. Now, only the father and son do that, as the demand is not the same. The rundown of agriculture also affects local builders, who do not have as much work, as well as mechanics, temporary milkers and the village shop. The importance of the crisis in agriculture is that it threatens not only the farmers but the whole rural way of life in Britain.

The decline in agricultural support will result in what has happened in third-world countries—the agricultural worker will move from rural to urban areas. Although the rural way of life currently provides an enormous amount of employment, if it is not supported, rural areas will become run down, and the workers will find jobs only in the towns and cities, which is the very thing that we do not want to happen in this country.

Mr. Dawson: I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's point about the regrettable movement of young people from rural areas to the towns. Was not that exacerbated, however, by the policies of the previous Government, which led to the reduction in the availability of affordable accommodation? Young people who have grown up and now work in rural areas can no longer afford to live there. Should not we address that issue as a matter of some urgency?

Mr. Steen: The problem about making a speech in the House is that one can end up debating each point. I do not want to outstay my welcome, but I will answer that point. One can go on building affordable housing association or council accommodation in the countryside, but one has then to find jobs. Without a buoyant agricultural community to supply the jobs, it is no good building houses.

There is a great movement of people into my area from the north, on retirement, which pushes up the house prices. One cannot build a wall and stop them moving around. That is a problem of market forces.

I want to deal with the more serious problem of urbanisation and suburbanisation of the countryside. The drift from major cities to rural areas is well documented. The number of Members of Parliament representing Liverpool and Birmingham has seriously declined. In 1965, Liverpool had about nine Members, and it now has five, while in Birmingham the figure has decreased from about 11 to eight.

The drift is away from the inner cities and urban areas to the rural areas, because that is where people want to live. Should we deal with that by building new satellite towns around the principal conurbations, or should we infill the villages and hamlets? In my part of south Devon, we have done both, with the result that the countryside between the conurbations is getting narrower and narrower.

The Labour Government, not following the Conservative lead, have increased the number of houses that are to be built in Devon by 2011 from 90,000 to 95,000. The problem is where we are to build all those houses. The Liberal Democrat councils in South Hams and Torbay are simply lying down and accepting the Government's figure, but in my view they should fight the Government and say that they cannot accommodate 95,000 more houses. We shall end up with a continuous run of housing from Plymouth to Exeter. The whole of the A38 will be one urban sprawl, as I forecast in 1983. Unless we stop the growth, we shall get one large urban sprawl throughout the county. How are the Government to stop that happening?

A more significant problem is how the Government are to help to preserve the countryside; that is the subject of this debate. The major factor to be considered about the countryside is the landscape and the view. [Laughter.] One of the first steps that the Government could take is to introduce a new planning policy guidance whereby the view has to be taken into consideration. At present, people can build anything where they like, because the view is of no consequence. The Government may say that we could have done that, but I am saying that they can do it now.

Mr. Hayes: Labour Members may laugh, but my hon. Friend makes an important point. He is saying—I hope that he will accept my clarification—that aesthetic concerns are important both in planning terms and in terms of people's perception of the environment around them. That is a matter not only of what they do, but of what they are. The fear of radical change—of the transformation of customs; culture; and the traditions of whole communities—motivated Sunday's march more than any other factor. Of course it was about hunting, but, more than that, it was about the fear of such radical change.

Mr. Steen: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for that helpful elucidation. In fact, I was saying that in current planning law one cannot consider the damaging effects of development on the view and the landscape. The planners say that the view is not a consideration when an application for development is approved. The Government could look at that.

Mr. Peter Bradley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Steen: Yes, provided that it is not another clarification of what I am saying.

Mr. Bradley: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, just as there are additional planning protections for conservation areas in towns, there are numerous designations—not least areas of outstanding natural beauty—that afford such protection in the countryside? Is he really saying that if people in the countryside do not have jobs, they do not need homes, and if they do not have homes, they do not need buses, but a view would be helpful?

Mr. Steen: We need someone to explain the hon. Gentleman's point. The serious question is how we can build 4.5 million houses in Britain without damaging the countryside. One of the factors that should be taken into account when planning applications and structure plans are considered is the effect that those developments will have on the landscape and the view in the area. We do not want to see the British countryside rapidly changed and destroyed.

At present, we have a two-way movement of people. We have the rundown of British agriculture and the movement of rural workers to the towns, and we have a movement from the urban areas to the countryside by, usually, young married couples who want to have their children taught in rural areas and to experience the rural way of life. People are being levered from the towns to the countryside to find a better quality of life for themselves and their children, while country dwellers are forced—by the decline in agriculture—from the villages into towns to find work.

The Government must support the agricultural sector, and so slow down the migration from the country to the towns. They must also make the cities more attractive places in which to live, to stop the reverse process. I draw the House's attention to an excellent book that I wrote about 10 years ago, called "Plums", in which I suggested that publicly owned vacant land should be auctioned and that derelict land in the inner city should be used first before the rural landscape is changed.

The Government can take action on some of the issues that I have mentioned. The landscape must be protected by changes in planning law, and farming must be supported, as it is in other European countries, so that the rural economy is anchored and safe. Our principal cities must be given an injection of new life, because we have been talking about the inner cities for the 24 years that I have been in the House and they remain as bad as ever. Housing need on green-field sites must be approached with caution, with new settlements being considered preferable to creeping urbanisation of existing market towns and villages. I hope that I have been helpful to the House, which has listened carefully to what I have said.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate, because I represent a large rural area in north Wales and have done so since 1992. It is an area with a large farming community, many small villages and many problems with transport, access to rural services and other matters. We also have a fox hunt—the Flint and Denbigh hunt—as well as a Labour majority of 13,000.

I am pleased to see so many of my hon. Friends who also represent rural areas present for the debate. Labour Members represent many of the rural areas of this country, and I must point out to Conservative Members that not a single tree, bush, fence, hedge or cow in Wales or Scotland is represented by a Conservative Member of Parliament.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hanson: No, time is pressing. It is a caricature of the debate to claim that there is a difference between town and country. My hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) put his finger on it when he said that we are interdependent. All of us have an interest in rural areas and all of us have an interest in the success and prosperity of those areas. All of us eat the food produced by rural areas and use the leisure facilities available in rural areas. All of us have a stake in the future of rural areas and many of us who live in cities and towns pay through our taxes for the success and development of rural areas. We all need such success. The caricature of town versus country exemplified by Sunday's march is unproductive and unhelpful.

I hope that Sunday's march helps us to focus not only on those who want preserve fox hunting, of whom I am not one, or members of the Conservative party, of whom I am not one, but on the real issues of rural Britain and the positive things that can be done. In the spirit of cross-party co-operation, I welcome some of what the previous Government did. I welcome their White Papers on rural England, the working countryside for Wales and rural Scotland. I just wish that they had done something about those issues, rather than simply producing White Papers.

I welcome the Liberal Democrat amendment, which recognises that things did not get bad in the countryside only after 1 May. I remind the House of bus deregulation in 1985. In Wales, 33 million bus journeys a year have been lost in rural areas since 1985. In one small village in my constituency, Trelawnyd, people cannot get to the dentist, doctor or the shops because bus deregulation has robbed it of its lifeline. We have also seen the sale of housing association homes and the failure of the previous Government to promote low-cost home ownership. The previous Government allowed more green-belt building than this Government intend to. They reduced the number of properties available for rent and the number that councils could build for rent.

Crime is also a factor in rural areas, such as mine in north Wales, with the closure of local police stations. Crime rose by 80 per cent. under the Conservative Government, while police numbers fell in my area. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) mentioned the sell-off of Forestry Commission land. In Wales, under Conservative rule, 229 woodlands were sold—4,500 hectares of land. Only 18 have had access agreements put to them.

Those were the actions of the previous Government. There were proposals that we managed to stop, such as the abolition of the wages board, the sell-off of rural post offices and, through local councils, the closure of local schools. The previous Government's record was not addressed by Conservative Members, but the House should address it—and that is before we touch on BSE or the 17 per cent. drop in farm incomes in Wales between 1981 and 1991, or the loss of local businesses, pubs and shops. It is also before we touch on the fact that, after 18 years of Conservative rule, many rural areas such as mine cannot get NHS dentists. People have a 25-mile drive to the local major district general hospital. The Conservatives would do well to recognise and address that inheritance, as well as the issues that we are discussing today.

Mr. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): They should apologise.

Mr. Hanson: My hon. Friend mentions apologising. I think that the Conservatives owe my rural constituents an apology for the misery that they put them through. In the short time remaining, I should like some discussion of how to address those issues—not only fox hunting and the others mentioned by Conservative Members.

There are three broad objectives: economic renewal, protection and enhancement of the environment, and social renewal.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hanson: I have not got time.

I do not mind whether the issues are addressed by a rural Minister directly or by Ministers in each Department with a rural responsibility, but they need to be addressed. On economic renewal, we need to consider an overall economic strategy, both in Wales and in each region, to include rural areas.

I hope that we will examine information technology: bringing the city and information to rural areas through IT. I accept that the new deal will create many jobs for people such as my constituents in rural areas. I hope that we examine—I am sure the Government are doing so—diversification to help with falling farm employment and incomes. I hope that the Government will look at helping small firms to establish themselves in rural areas.

Next year, there will be a minimum wage in rural areas, something which I am very proud of. That will help to support the economic regeneration of areas that are traditionally low paid, especially in parts of Wales. I welcome the rate relief that has been given to local shops and businesses in rural areas. This Government have done it. I hope that we will reform the common agricultural policy to shift the balance of wealth and power from the larger farmer, to ensure that the small farmers, who are in most need, have the income and support that they need. I welcome the Government's announcement of £12 million extra to be given to Wales and farming incomes this year, in connection with the charges for specified risk material and the cattle tracing scheme.

On the protection and enhancement of rural areas, I should like to know how many of the people who went on the march on Sunday have been responsible for removing hedgerows and destroying the rural areas that they purport to represent. Reform of the common agricultural policy is important in that respect. The Government will take steps to protect flora and fauna, strengthen areas of outstanding natural beauty and establish a green belt for the first time in Wales.

A further issue that we need to discuss is a third party right of appeal on planning applications, so that local community councils can tackle developers.

In the context of social renewal, we must examine transport issues. I am pleased to see that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), is winding up the debate. Transport is crucial to rural areas.

I appreciate the Government's initiative on rural schools, so that such schools cannot be closed without ministerial approval.

Thanks to the Government's capital receipts programme and the input from local authorities into new social building and improvements in local villages, a village in my constituency has for the first time had central heating put into the small council accommodation in the area.

I welcome the extension of the social exclusion unit to include rural areas. I hope also that we can look imaginatively at the use of lottery money to improve village halls and be proactive about the investment in village halls. Perhaps we could examine the issue of matching funds to make it easier for local communities in rural areas to have access to lottery money.

The Opposition motion is too simplistic. It focuses on countryside issues, ignoring the failure of the Conservative Government over the past 18 years to tackle those issues. I know that my Government have a constructive approach to rural areas, and I will be pleased to support them in the Lobby tonight.

9.32 pm

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): In a wide-ranging debate, we have heard hon. Members on both sides claiming to support the countryside, but, when one listens to the speeches, it is apparent that the perception and understanding on the two sides are quite different.

That was demonstrated by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), who said that his approach was not the result of ignorance or arrogance. He went on to say that the right to roam on other people's land is not negotiable. That will strike many of those who have listened to the debate not as ignorant or arrogant, but as intolerant, as is the Labour party's commitment to abolish the right of other people to hunt on their own land. We have seen no great enlightenment among Labour Members, but rather a digging in and reinforcement of an intolerant attitude.

I appreciate that the job of agriculture Ministers is always difficult. I thought that the fisheries Minister was to wind up the debate, and I would have said that no job was more difficult than his. I do not want to open up the European debate, but it is clear that not least among the difficulties of agriculture Ministers is the fact that they have responsibility without necessarily having the authority to do what needs to be done. In his opening remarks, the Minister of Agriculture spent much time criticising the record of the previous Administration. Let me say to him and to others on the Front Bench: you will be judged by your record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman should not be saying anything of the kind.

Mr. Gill: I beg the House's pardon. Right hon. and hon. Members opposite will be judged by their record.

Many of us regret the non-attendance of agriculture Ministers at the countryside march on Sunday. It was a missed opportunity to listen to what the countryside had to say—more to the point, Ministers would have been able to hear what country people had to say because it was a good-natured, peaceable demonstration. It was not a howling mob. Ministers could have conversed with the people on that march, and doubtless they would have learnt something.

Mr. Dawson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will the hon. Gentleman note that certain Labour Members attended the march on Sunday?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is simply not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Gill: It was a peaceable demonstration by responsible people whose livelihoods and way of life is under threat.

Mr. Gray: With reference to the spurious point of order from the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson), is it not interesting to note that the only Minister to attend the march on Sunday is notable by his absence from this debate? He has not even turned up.

Mr. Gill: I think that the House will draw its own conclusions.

Ministers cannot dismiss the significance of Sunday's march, and they certainly cannot ignore the fact that 300,000 people sent but one message. That single message was, "Please listen to us".

In this debate, we have heard some predictable responses to the recognisable problems in the countryside. It was suggested that a royal commission should be established, that there should be a Minister for rural affairs and that possibly the Ministry should be reorganised. Is the House really saying that it does not know what the problems are? Surely the problems of the countryside are all too plain. The electorate in this country expects its politicians, particularly the Government and Ministers, to provide answers to those questions.

That job cannot be sub-contracted to a review or a task force. In nine months, the Government have appointed no fewer than 140 such bodies. The urgency of the problems in the countryside does not permit the establishment of bodies to investigate such matters: we do not need a theoretical examination by intellectuals who cannot tell wheat from barley. We need to listen to people in the countryside who do the job—they are the experts.

The problems have been identified already. There is high dependency on agriculture in the countryside. The difficulties currently facing agriculture are exemplified by one of my constituents who produces 1,400 cattle per year at a cost of 112p per kilo and who is currently selling them at 97p per kilo. Another problem is the high dependency on the motor vehicle in the countryside. The House will be watching to see what the Chancellor does in his Budget, because we are aware of the devastating effect that an increase in vehicle excise and fuel duties would have on transport in rural areas.

The threat to community hospitals is implicit in the ending of the general practitioner fundholding system. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] Oh yes. I invite Labour Members to come to my constituency where they will see how fundholding doctors, working closely in conjunction with a community hospital, have transformed that hospital, which now provides a much greater range and quality of services than ever before.

In the few seconds that remain, I must mention the totally inadequate SSAs for sparsely populated rural areas, where economies of scale do not apply. Those areas have high transport costs and, as the Minister said, low wages. This year, we shall face record increases in the council tax. Shropshire county council's precept will be 14 per cent. up on last year, before we even consider the district council precept. The Government must take responsibility. Many of the solutions to the problems identified tonight are in their own hands. A measure of the Government will be whether they address those very real and obvious problems.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): We have had an exceptionally interesting debate which has reflected the depth of concern about the countryside—a concern which is particularly shared by hon. Members on the Opposition Benches.

The debate has exposed the Government's continuing lack of understanding of rural issues. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food showed no sign at any stage during his 26-minute speech that he had listened to a single concern of the 280,000 people who marched on Sunday. That is not, perhaps, surprising, as he did not have the courtesy to turn up and meet them. Let me point out to him that the mandatory rate relief for small shops, to which he referred, was introduced by the Conservative Government.

The truth is that, on the countryside, the Labour Government have moved from denial, through panic into confusion. A month ago, they denied that there was a problem. A week ago, they panicked about the extent of public hostility. Today, they are in a state of total confusion about what to do and who should do it.

On Saturday, we saw the extraordinary spectacle—it would have been bizarre had it not been disgraceful—of an agriculture Minister publicly smearing the march, just when his colleague, the Minister for the Environment, was announcing that he would take part in it. Open warfare has broken out between the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about who is in charge of countryside policy. Will it be the Minister of Agriculture, who preferred to remain in the comfort and security of his expensive new office rather than meet the 280,000 representatives of the countryside? Or will it be the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, who, uncharacteristically, is hiding in the corner—the Minister who picked the pockets of local authorities in rural areas to reward his friends in the towns; who, in 10 short months, has destroyed the principle of the green belt, which has protected the environment around our cities for half a century?

The losers in the battle between the Departments will be those who live and work in the countryside. It is a battle which should never have started. The countryside needs not a new Minister or Department but a new policy.

Having heard the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), who has not had the courtesy to return to the debate, I am of the view that not only the Government but the Liberal Democrats need a new policy. The hon. Gentleman expressed concern about the Rural Development Commission, but, only a week ago, in the Standing Committee, two of his colleagues voted to approve clause 39 of the Regional Development Agencies Bill, which gives the Government the power to abolish the Rural Development Commission. It was a familiar example of the Liberal Democrats pointing in both directions at the same time.

The hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) joined Labour's attempts to impugn the motives of Sunday's marchers, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), rightly pointed out, at no time in the 18 years of the previous Government did 280,000 people protesting about Government policy on the countryside descend on the capital city.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) was at least honest enough to admit that farmers face real problems, but he would have done himself more credit had he also recognised that those problems are among the reasons why the marchers came to London last Sunday.

The Government still have an opportunity this evening to regain a shred of credibility and to show that they want to make amends. I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) to the Front Bench. It is revealing that, for all the Government's claimed expertise in rural matters, and for all the countryside seats which they have now won, the person who is fielded to wind up a debate entitled "Listening to the Countryside" is a London Member and the Minister for Transport in London. I hope that in her winding-up speech, she will announce changes of policy in three key areas. None of those changes would cost a penny of public money, none would need legislation and each would herald the possibility of a more sympathetic attitude towards rural communities.

[Mr. Tim Yeo]

The first change concerns the way in which the cash is distributed to local authorities. This year, the Government carried out a funding fiddle. They took £94 million off the standard spending assessments for rural authorities and switched it into towns. None of the eight changes made by the Government to the standard spending assessment formula has helped shire England. The Government took £8 million from Oxfordshire, £8 million from Norfolk and £10 million from Hampshire.

This week, the Prime Minister wrote in Country Life of his concerns about rural crime. Those were fine words, but, as so often under new Labour, they were just words and they were not matched by deeds. In rural Lincolnshire, the standard spending assessment for the police authority has been cut in cash terms. The same applies to Wiltshire and many other counties. What a contrast with the police authorities in urban areas, which are getting an increase in their standard spending assessment. Yet again, that is the clearest possible proof that when it comes to allocating public money, the Government always favour urban Britain.

The second change of policy that is needed concerns planning. Last Monday, the Secretary of State for the Environment announced a partial climbdown. He appeared to overrule his junior Minister, the hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), who had described any increase in the target for building more new homes on previously developed sites as a "recipe for disaster". We welcomed those greener noises from the Secretary of State, but we listened in vain for a hint that he would rethink his recent decisions to approve up to 10,000 homes on the green belt in Hertfordshire and 2,500 homes on the green belt in Newcastle, and approve industrial development of 150 acres of farmland in the west midlands. We listened in vain for a hint that he would not insist on inflicting an extra 13,000 new homes in the West Sussex countryside.

The Secretary of State talked of a sequential and phased approach to the development of all sites, but when will that approach be incorporated into planning policy guidance? In a written answer in yesterday's Hansard at column 429, the Minister for London and Construction explained that that idea is merely for consultation at this stage. Until planning policy guidance notes are altered, nothing has changed and the green fields are just as much at risk as they were before. The Minister's fine words are not matched by deeds.

What about the county structure plans? When will the new approach apply to them? Counties such as Hampshire were dragooned into accepting an extra 10,000 houses for their structure plan. Will Hampshire, Devonshire, Cheshire and Gloucestershire have a chance to think again before their structure plans are adopted? That problem was rightly highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen).

The third policy that should be changed is the right to roam—another example of Government confusion. Months of delay occurred while Ministers argued about whether to implement their promises. Finally last week, a document was published, which was portrayed as evidence of the Government's conversion to the voluntary approach, which the Conservative party has always supported and which has opened up 250,000 acres of land for access since 1990. However, during questions about the documents launched, the Minister for the Environment was reported as saying that he saw legislation as inevitable. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) pointed out, that threat should be withdrawn today.

I hope that all hon. Members will study the wording of the Government's amendment, which claims that the Government want "prosperity for all in rural areas".

Yet the Government have just taken powers in the Regional Development Agencies Bill to wind up the Rural Development Commission. The amendment claims that the Government are concerned about rural transport, but their planned huge increase in petrol tax will clobber every rural motorist. The amendment also claims that the Government want "comprehensive countryside policies", yet they refuse to continue to publish an annual update of the countryside White Paper, the first ever comprehensive review of countryside policy.

Dr. John Cunningham: The Conservative Government did not do that.

Mr. Yeo: Yes we did, and the Minister should know it. If the right hon. Gentleman aspires to be the countryside Minister, he should do his homework.

The amendment claims that the Government believe in inclusiveness, but lovers of traditional country sports are not just being excluded; Labour Members are supporting a Bill that will criminalise them. The Government's actions contradict the fine words in their amendment. The debate gave the Government the chance to show that they understand why 280,000 people gave up their Sunday to march on London, and that they are willing to listen to the anxieties of the marchers and millions of other country dwellers. That chance was missed by the Minister, but I hope that it will be seized by the Under-Secretary.

If the Government agree to our motion, the marchers really will have something to cheer about. I commend the motion to the House.

9.51 pm

The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): In his opening remarks, the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) dubbed the debate one in which the true voice of the countryside would be heard. The Country Landowners Association may not agree. In January 1995, it stated:

"For too long there has been a lack of political focus on Britain's rural areas."

In January 1995, the National Farmers Union stated:

"Many parts of the countryside are seriously affected by unemployment, under-employment, a narrow range of job opportunities and low average wage levels."

In July 1994, the Rural Development Commission stated:

"Declining rural services threaten village life."

In November 1994, Countryside 2000, the country life magazine, stated:

"Protecting the countryside is something that we did well traditionally. Sadly the 1980s was a disastrous decade in this respect, thanks to the new spirit of laissez-faire that afflicted planning."

Speaking on the Conservative Government's rural record in January 1995, Action for Communities in Rural England stated:

"Our main perception is one of neglect."

On 10 October 1996, the National Farmers Union Council passed a vote of no confidence in the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), declaring that it had

"no confidence in the Minister's representation of the interests of the UK and its agricultural industry in the EU."

The Opposition are noted for their lack of policies, direction and principles. Tonight's debate showed their sheer opportunism. The Conservative Government would not have wanted to abolish the agriculture wages councils if they had been genuinely concerned for the rural economy and the countryside. The Conservative Government deregulated bus services and privatised the railways, leaving 75 per cent. of parishes with no daily bus service, 79 per cent. with no community minibus or social car scheme, and 93 per cent. with no rail service at any time. They also closed 450 village schools, constantly threatened rural post offices with privatisation, built 60 per cent. of new houses on green-field sites, and closed village shops, hospitals and dental surgeries.

We are dealing with 18 years of Conservative neglect, but, during their lamentable contributions, Conservative Members did not have the courtesy to apologise to the people of this country for the damage that their Government caused. I have not even touched on the relaxation of regulations which led to the introduction of BSE not only into the British beef herd, but into the human food chain. The previous Government were responsible for that disgraceful occurrence, which has had an appalling effect on the countryside and its economy.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, my hon. Friends the Members for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall), for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) and for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), and the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) dealt with the serious issues that face people in rural areas.

Several themes have recurred tonight. My hon. Friends the Members for West Lancashire and for Delyn pointed out that the Conservatives' policy was clearly "town versus country". That is not our policy. We are clear about the fact that town needs country and country needs town. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should listen to the Minister, who is winding up an important debate.

Ms Jackson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it is too late to ask Conservative Members to listen. If their own leader cannot point out to them that their arrogance and unwillingness to listen lost them the last election so resoundingly, there is nothing that anyone can do. Regrettably, their ignorance is bliss for no one in this country.

The peroration of the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) matched the opening speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) in its lack of any understanding of the real difficulties that their Government created for those living in rural areas. The hon. Gentleman castigated the present Government for their local government finance settlement, particularly in a rural context. For the first time in four years, increased funds have been provided for services delivered by a shire district. This Government have done that. We have treated all local authorities, whether rural or urban, fairly and consistently.

The pattern of gainers and losers in rural and urban areas is mixed. There are gainers and losers in both types of area. That confirms yet again that the present Government govern for all the people. We are not interested in creating artificial divisions between town and country.

Many grievous allegations were made about the Government's policy. I shall touch on only a few that we have heard, perhaps on both sides of the House but certainly from Opposition Members. A recurring Opposition allegation—

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Will the Minister give way?

Ms Jackson: No.

A recurring Opposition allegation related to building on green-belt land.

Mr. Paterson rose—

Ms Jackson: I said no. That is another example of Opposition Members' inability to listen.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear in a statement to the House only a few days ago, we have abandoned the old predict and provide policy with regard to house building. We will work from the bottom up. We have asked for 60 per cent. of building to take place on brown-field sites. It was the Conservative party that built 60 per cent. of houses on green fields. In our 10 short months of government, we have added five times as much land to the green belt as has been lost.

Certain allegations were made about our ban on beef on the bone. Opposition Members described it as a panic measure. Let the record show, however, that independent scientists said that the material could be infected with BSE. The Conservative party banned all sales of infected material; we have done the same. It is vital to rebuild confidence in British beef at home and abroad.

More than once we were asked where was our right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment. Let me allay the fears that may be pounding in the breasts of Opposition Members: my right hon. Friend is abroad on Government business.

Our manifesto pledged to recognise the special needs in rural areas, and our policies are being designed to take account of rural interests—it is quite wrong to suggest that we do not care or understand. The Government believe in opportunity, fairness and prosperity for all—applied equally to urban and to rural areas. We realise also that people who live and work in the countryside have distinctive needs. The rural dimension is an important consideration in many of the Government's policies.

Most important, we wish to foster a strong and vibrant rural economy. New jobs are being created in the countryside.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House condemns the previous administration for its persistent neglect of the countryside over the past eighteen years which resulted in rural unemployment and deprivation and the collapse of the rural transport system; and congratulates the Government on its emphatic commitment to comprehensive countryside policies, to reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, to successful, sustainable United Kingdom agriculture, and on its vision for a countryside that is strong, fair and modern, with a programme for social justice, inclusiveness, welfare reform, improving services, the national minimum wage, education and skills which will ensure prosperity for all in rural areas as well as in the towns.

MR. GRAHAM ALLEN (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury) and MR. JOHN M. TAYLOR, who acted as Tellers in Division No. 187, came to the Table.

Mr. Allen: I have to report an error in the number reported as having voted in the No Lobby in the Division at 7 o'clock on the first Opposition motion. The number voting no was 320, not 329 as reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Clerk will arrange that the record is corrected.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Appropriation (Northern Ireland) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 12th February, be approved.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

Heavily Indebted Countries

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Perhaps the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins) should wait a moment while hon. Members leave the Chamber as quickly and as quietly as possible.

Mr. Paul Goggins (Wythenshawe and Sale, East): Thank you for protecting my first paragraph, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate this Adjournment debate on the problems and opportunities associated with third-world debt. For me the timing is particularly appropriate, since today I accompanied my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development to meet Church groups in my constituency that have campaigned for many years on behalf of the one in four people in the world who live in abject poverty. My right hon. Friend was extremely well received. It is appropriate, too, because we are merely weeks away from important meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World bank, as well as the Group of Seven meeting in Birmingham and we have reached a crucial point in the international strategy for reducing the debt of the world's poorest countries—the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, or HIPCI.

I see nothing wrong in any country, rich or poor, borrowing to invest to deliver a developing and sustainable economy. Indeed, one of the problems facing the poorest countries of the world is finding people who want to invest in their countries. In the 1970s and 1980s, many of the poorest countries were given loans that they could never hope to repay. Sometimes the creditors behaved irresponsibly, sometimes the Governments of the debtor countries were corrupt. Also, there were fluctuating interest rates, currency depreciations, falls in export prices, wars and drought, and all impacted on the world's poorest countries.

As an example of how the debt burden grew, in 1962 the countries of sub-Saharan Africa had a total debt of $3 billion, but today that total stands at $235 billion. In 1996, the World bank and the IMF, with considerable support it must be said from the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, established HIPCI, to provide the most heavily indebted and poverty-stricken countries with a robust exit from the burden of unsustainable debt. They identified 41 countries with a total population of 700 million people, which all had external debts valued at more than double their export earnings. Of course, many countries were in a much worse position. For example, Mozambique has debts of 10 times the value of its export earnings.

The advantages of HIPCI are that it provided a comprehensive assessment of each country's level of debt. It put in place a one-off system of debt reduction via the Paris club of Government creditors. For the first time ever, the IMF and the World bank agreed to provide debt relief themselves and they went beyond the existing Naples terms, which limited debt reduction to 67 per cent., moving instead to a new level of 80 per cent.

Moreover—many would argue that this was not an advantage—it was agreed that debt reduction would take place only after a six-year period of compliance, in which debtor countries had to achieve structural adjustment targets. It was recognised that, although the debts of the world's poorest countries were not a threat to the international finance system, they were a tax on economic progress and prevented sustainable growth and development.

That was why HIPCI was started. It was greeted with great acclaim—it was as if James Wolfensohn, the president of the World bank, had come as a modern messiah to bring good news to the poor. The truth is that, 18 months on, HIPCI is in some difficulty, partly because of the framework and the criteria that were laid down, and partly because of a lack of political will from a number of creditor Governments, not—I hasten to add—including the United Kingdom Government. As things stand, of the 41 heavily indebted poor countries, only Uganda and Bolivia will receive help in 1998—the majority will receive no help until into the next century.

The case of Mozambique, the poorest country in the world, has brought into focus the problems of HIPCI. Mozambique built up most of its debt during a 16-year civil war, which ended in total economic collapse. Despite its problems, however, it has started to turn round the situation. In 1996, its economy grew by 6 per cent. and its exports had risen by 30 per cent. Nevertheless, its exports are worth only $225 million—roughly what the country needs to service its debt repayments.

The price of Mozambique's indebtedness is paid by her people: 10 million people have no access to safe drinking water; 1 million children are not able to attend primary school; and 200,000 children will die this year before they reach their fifth birthday. One of Mozambique's major difficulties has been the HIPCI rules, which allow only 80 per cent. debt relief, despite the fact that most experts agree that 90 per cent. is required.

I know that, at the recent Paris club meeting, representatives managed to break through the 80 per cent. ceiling, but there is still a deficit of $100 million. Again, I praise the UK Government, who have contributed a further $10 million to try to fill that gap, in the hope that others will be moved to match that figure. It is clear that, unless creditors are prepared to change the rules and adopt a more urgent and generous approach, HIPCI for Mozambique and for many others is in grave danger.

One of the countries that may suffer is Tanzania, which has been implementing structural adjustment programmes since the mid-1980s, and which has received full marks from the IMF for its economic performance over the past two years. However, it spends a third of its export earnings on servicing its debts; it spends on debt four times what it spends on primary education or on health provision. Under HIPCI's current terms, the best that Tanzania can hope for is that next year its creditors may agree how to share out the debt reduction burden—by 2002, it may receive some actual relief.

Even the two countries that will receive help this year—Uganda and Bolivia—have not gained as much from HIPCI as they expected. Delays have cost Uganda an estimated $193 million, and overestimation of sustainable debt levels has cost Bolivia an estimated $241 million. HIPCI is in danger of delivering too little, too late. Unless something is done, we are in grave danger that it will not deliver what was originally intended.

I offer some proposals, which are supported by a number of development experts and which, I believe, should be considered. We should review the definition of debt sustainability, which currently includes a ratio of debt repayment to export income of 20:25 per cent., and a ratio of total debt to export income of 200:250 per cent. I simply ask why. No one has yet been able to give a convincing justification of those levels—perhaps my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary can. At best, they seem arbitrary, and, at worst, they seem to have been set to suit the creditor, not the debtor.

We should set a limit on the proportion of Government revenue that can be spent on servicing debt—say, 15 per cent. Countries should clearly pay something to wipe out their debts, but every dollar spent servicing debt is another dollar less for education, health and sanitation.

We should review the time scales governing HIPCI. I recognise that it is extremely important for poor indebted countries to have sustainable and sound economies, but to tell a country in which one fifth of children die before their fifth birthday that it will have to wait until 2002 is simply not acceptable. It may be acceptable in the world of economic theory, but in the real world of suffering, six years is too long to wait.

We need more flexibility about the 80 per cent. debt relief ceiling. We should not expect the needs of the world's poorest people to be limited by a technical formula. If Mozambique needs 90 per cent. debt relief, it should get it. I acknowledge the United Kingdom's recent initiative, but that 90 per cent. should be given as a right, not as a fudge, which smacks more of charity than of justice and, more importantly, allows the unenthusiastic to drag their feet.

Rules and regulations count for nothing unless the IMF, the World bank and creditor Governments show more compassion and a greater sense of urgency: the kind of urgency, I might argue, that helped to put together the $100 billion package for south-east Asia in a matter of three months.

I want to emphasise the positive role played by our Government, particularly through the Mauritius mandate. No doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will outline some of the details of that mandate, which was a genuine attempt to speed up the process and deliver some practical help. That spirit is not shared by all creditors. In particular, I cite Italy, Japan and Germany.

Germany's attitude is perhaps the hardest to understand. Last Friday was the 45th anniversary of the London agreement, which arose from Germany's inability to service its debts after the second world war, and under which 50 per cent. of those debts were cancelled; yet now, Germany drags its feet over an initiative that would cost in total 5 per cent. of the cost of reunification.

New priorities and a change of heart are needed. Organisations such as Oxfam, Christian Aid, the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development and, more recently, Jubilee 2000, are playing a vital part. Jubilee 2000 is especially to be praised. The idea of jubilee is rooted in Leviticus. It was an opportunity, every 50 years, to restore balance to economic life; to forgive debts; and to let the slaves go free. As is often pointed out, that did not always happen—people were as human then as they are now—but it was an aspiration and an inspiration, as it can be for us today.

The millennium can be a special time, a one-off moment for doing something extraordinary: cancelling the debts of the poorest countries and releasing the cash to reduce poverty. As a millennium project, that has the capacity to fire our nation's imagination. A nation that overturned the political status quo on 1 May and that mourned so deeply for Princess Diana is ready for a humane project that can bring progress and justice to 700 million of the world's poorest people.

Evidence of the potential popularity of such a scheme was contained in a MORI poll commissioned recently by CAFOD. Given a choice between writing off third-world debt and funding the millennium dome, people opted by four to one for the former. One in five ranked cancelling the unpayable debts of the world's poorest countries as the best way in which to celebrate the millennium.

In total, this country will spend £2.7 billion of public money on millennium projects. That is enough to cancel the debts of the 11 poorest African countries. How do we make the breakthrough? We have to start by talking in a more practical way: perhaps a little less about the telephone number debt figures owed by poor countries, and rather more about the millions of mothers in those countries who die in childbirth. The way we talk—the words and the pictures we use—can add urgency to our initiative and can help us to see that it is achievable. We could deliver the whole HIPC initiative for what Americans spend in one year on training shoes.

We must also think of debt reduction as poverty reduction. Let us forgive the debts, but let us also insist that the money is spent on health, education and clean water. In the first 10 months of our Government, we have seen priority given to health and education, which are popular causes. Let us ensure that we insist on the same standards for the world's poorest people. That is the approach that we are already taking when we link export guarantees to productive investment.

The Jubilee 2000 campaign has a prayer that will have meaning for believers and non-believers alike. It says:

"O God, to whom we owe more than we can count, in our desire to control all that will come to be, we hold your other children in the grip of debt which they cannot repay; and make them suffer now the poverty we dread. Do not hold us to our debts but unchain our fear, that we may release others into an open future of unbounded hope."

Let us take that golden opportunity to remove the burden of debt from the world's poorest countries and give their people real hope for the new millennium.

10.40 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Helen Liddell): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins) on securing this Adjournment debate, which is most timely because of the significance of the issues and the international conferences that are looming on the subject. It is also timely because, as my hon. Friend reminded us in his closing remarks, we are in the Lenten season, which is a time of reflection. Many of us are impressed by the commitment and compassion that my hon. Friend has shown in raising these important issues.

It is important for all of us who live in the advanced world to recognise that the world's poorest and most heavily indebted countries need urgent help with their debt problems. The debate is also timely because, as my hon. Friend said, we must consider the current state of the heavily indebted poor countries' initiative. Given the level of public feeling and the great resolve that has been shown recently by the international community in dealing with financial instability in Asia, it has become doubly important to ensure that the debt problems of the desperately poor countries are dealt with effectively and permanently, and that they are not squeezed out of our international economic debate by the scale of the problems experienced in wealthier economies.

Since the initiative was launched by the World bank and the International Monetary Fund in September 1996, we have seen some progress. Four countries—Uganda, Bolivia, Burkina Faso and Guyana—have had decisions on the level of relief that they will receive under the HIPC initiative. In a few weeks' time in April, Uganda will be the first country to receive relief. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has already announced a contribution by the Government of £6.5 million to help the African Development bank meet the costs of debt relief. Uganda will be followed by Bolivia in September, and Guyana in December. Burkina Faso will receive its relief under the initiative in April 2000. I recognise the problems that those countries will face, but the scale is enormous indeed.

A start has been made, but it does not yet make the HIPC initiative an undeniable success. In the speech by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the Mauritius mandate speech, as it is now known—he set out targets that he felt that the international community should adopt to ensure the rapid and flexible implementation of the HIPC initiative.

One goal is for three quarters of the 20 countries initially identified by the International Monetary Fund and World bank as possibly needing HIPC relief to receive decisions on the timing and level of debt relief by the new millennium. I accept my hon. Friend's point about the significance of marking the millennium not only by celebration, but by recognising that many people in many parts of the world do not have the wherewithal or the will to celebrate if they live in poverty. I believe that the target set in the Mauritius mandate is attainable, but it will not and cannot be reached without very substantial efforts by the international community, as well as by the debtor countries, which must acknowledge their responsibility for putting to rights their economic problems.

My hon. Friend was right to draw our attention to the need for the international community urgently to demonstrate its commitment in the case of Mozambique, which spends twice as much on servicing its debts as on the basic services of health care and education. Even then, it manages to meet only about a third of its debt obligations. It is a severely indebted country which has, as he said, demonstrated its commitment to reform, but it awaits a decision from creditors to provide the necessary debt relief to reduce its debt burden to a sustainable level.

My hon. Friend movingly described the human cost of Mozambique's economic crisis. IMF figures show that to reach debt sustainability, Mozambique will require a debt write-off of about 88 per cent. I shall come to debt sustainability in a minute. The UK has consistently argued that the Paris club of Government creditors should provide debt relief of up to 90 per cent. in the special case of Mozambique. Despite that, the Paris club agreed in January to provide debt relief equivalent only to an 85 per cent. write-off. The outstanding amount is some $100 million dollars. Without that money, the IMF and World bank boards have been unable to proceed with HIPC relief for the most deserving candidates. Mozambique is a crucial test case for the seriousness of the international community's commitment to debt relief and the HIPC initiative.

My hon. Friend asked about the debt sustainability criteria. Debt sustainability is defined in terms of an agreed ratio based on empirical studies by the World bank and the IMF on debtors' debt service performance over time. It is only an indicative analysis, but I hope that at least by reducing debts to such a level, we shall come nearer to the point of preventing the build-up of arrears, while allowing debtor countries the necessary development costs of health and education. I understand my hon. Friend's frustration about the time that that is taking, but we must concentrate countries' minds on debt relief.

Tracking the record of reform is a key indicator that sensible policies will be sustained. There is a need to ensure that structural problems are put right to make sure that the situation never again occurs. Countries get help from international financial institutions, donors and bilateral creditors while they are establishing a track record. For countries that have already established long track records, the UK will continue to argue that it is absurd to ask for further lengthy periods of such policies before debt relief is available. We have been successful in doing that for both Uganda and Guyana.

The UK, with some other creditors, has suggested that individual donors contribute bilaterally to raise the necessary $100 million. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has written to his counterparts in the G10, urging them to help to resolve the problem, and he and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development met the president of the World bank last week to discuss possible solutions.

After that meeting, we announced that we—the United Kingdom Government—would commit up to $10 million of aid funds to filling the financing gap. That contribution is on top of the £10 million that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has already committed, through her Department's bilateral aid programme, to help Mozambique to meet the costs of servicing its loans from the multilateral development banks.

I am hopeful that those efforts, along with the considerable work being done at the World bank and the IMF, will bring a rapid solution to the problem. Last month, I was in Washington, where I raised the matter again with the World bank and the US Treasury.

Decisions are expected in the coming months on Cote d'Ivoire, Mali and Mauritania. If those go smoothly and a solution is found for Mozambique, we shall be able to say that the HIPC initiative is well on track. To meet the Chancellor's Mauritius mandate targets, however, greater efforts will be required to ensure that all the countries identified under the initiative receive relief as quickly as possible.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, the United Kingdom is leading the way in making that effort, not least in our capacity as president of the G7. The HIPC initiative will be on the agenda in the context of development issues at the summit in Birmingham on 15 to 17 May. I hope, as do the Government, that that discussion can pave the way for more flexible and rapid implementation of the HIPC initiative, in line with the goals set out in the Mauritius mandate.

After the recent meeting of G7 finance Ministers and central bank governors, a communique was published which expressed the hope that all the 41 countries identified under the HIPC initiative would have begun the process of securing the debt relief that they needed by the year 2000.

My hon. Friend referred to the work done by the Churches, and I pay tribute to that. The Government have engaged in regular dialogue with Church leaders and NGO directors on the HIPC initiative. In December last year, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor held a seminar on the issues at No. 11 Downing street. The discussion was constructive, and showed that, although our final objectives may differ in some respects, there is much common ground between the Government and those other groups. On 17 February, my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for International Development met the president of the World bank, as well as a smaller group of Church representatives. It is important that that dialogue continues.

My hon. Friend may be interested to know that my fellow Ministers on ECOFIN are already finding that NGOs and Church communities in their countries are putting pressure on them in relation to HIPC. That is a useful development.

In the HIPC initiative, the IMF and World bank have provided the international community with a tool for dealing with the unsustainable debt burdens of the world's most indebted countries. We support that initiative and we support a serious commitment by the international community to implementing it flexibly. There must be an equal commitment by the debtor countries to reform. Once that happens, those countries can look toward implementing policies that can lead to sustainable economic growth, which is necessary for long-term development and poverty alleviation.

My hon. Friend mentioned Tanzania, which is one of the countries initially identified as possibly needing extra debt relief under the HIPC initiative. We fully support such relief for Tanzania, providing that it adopts and adheres to economic and structural reforms. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has committed between £5 million and £10 million to help the Tanzanians to meet the costs of servicing some of their loans.

Debt sustainability is, in the case of every poor country, our first goal. It is not, however, the full solution to the problems faced by HIPC. In short, there is a need to act quickly and effectively. It is important to the House, the Government and the British people. In the past six months, I have received 3,000 letters and postcards, many of which were accompanied by donations from 2p to several pounds from ordinary men and women in this country seeking to ease the debt burdens of those who are much poorer than we are.

We as a Government are determined to fulfil the hopes of our own people and of those in the most indebted countries of the world. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us an opportunity this evening to discuss this important and timely subject.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 4 March 1998

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jane Kennedy.]

Madam Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick), I remind hon. Members that I have a lot of applications to speak in the debate. In the best interests of all concerned, it would be appropriate to have short speeches.

9.34 am

Mr. Jim Fitzpatrick (Poplar and Canning Town): I am pleased to have secured time to debate this important issue. I can confidently say that the channel tunnel rail link is a national issue. I hope to reinforce the well-argued and, I believe, accepted view that the CTRL is critical to the United Kingdom economy. The Government must continue to do all that they can to support the project and ensure its speedy completion. I know that many hon. Members are keen to contribute to the debate, so I intend to limit my speech to around 15 minutes—or at least that is what I have timed it at without interventions.

I shall refer to three basic points: first, the history of the project and how we got to the current dreadful situation; secondly, why the CTRL is a national, not just a regional issue; and thirdly, the importance of the CTRL to east London in particular and how it fits in with the transport infrastructure already being built or developed there.

I almost hesitate to point an accusing finger at the previous Government on the project's history, because I assume that most of the Conservative Members present this morning support the link. However, it is impossible not to make some comment. I hope that they will forgive me for saying that their former colleagues in the previous Government failed spectacularly when they told the House that they had reached a sensible business deal with London and Continental Railways.

Criticisms of the business plan, particularly those about the passenger projections, have now been shown to have been well founded. Even at the time, it was recognised that we were 10 years behind our European partners in building a fast link. Our standing in Europe has suffered as a consequence of that indecision and will continue to suffer if we do not rectify the position.

However, that criticism is history. As well as accusing and apportioning blame, I should also applaud and commend vision. I am happy to appreciate the number of former Ministers who recognise the importance of the CTRL to the UK economy in general—and east London in particular—and those who fought for the project in the Cabinet. I am even happier to commend my right hon. Friends in the present Cabinet who are fighting for the project.

The launch in Birmingham on Friday 20 February of the campaign known as Faster—Fast Tracks to Europe—demonstrates the national significance of the rail link. The campaign brings together local authorities from Glasgow, Manchester, York, Birmingham, London and the south-east, as well as business and industry from those areas, including the London chamber of commerce and industry. They jointly articulated the importance of national fast-track access to Europe for our regions. For the European Union to have the support of the people of this country, they need to have access to Europe.

We are joined to Europe by the channel tunnel. The rail link on our side must be as fast and convenient as that on the continent. Had the link been built by now, as it should have been, life would be a lot easier for West Ham United football supporters to travel to away games next season, when we qualify for Europe.

On a more serious note, it would be wrong not to take this opportunity to refer to my concerns about safety and Eurotunnel's continued resistance to separating passengers from their vehicles on Le Shuttle. The fire on the latticed freight transporter demonstrated the dangers of a fire in the tunnel. I firmly believe that the decision not to separate passengers from their vehicles was taken on flawed commercial grounds. Safety has been at best compromised and at worst disregarded by Eurotunnel—but I digress.

The United Kingdom as a whole needs the fast link. I know that the Government recognise that fact, and I dearly hope that they ensure that it goes ahead. My main comments are about the impact of the CTRL on east London. I can confidently leave others to address the issues that affect the rest of the United Kingdom, the Thames gateway and the rest of London, and the south-east. I know that others may refer to blight, which has adversely affected homes and businesses across the south-east and had—and continues to have—a negative impact on the lives of our people. I have heard particularly my hon. Friends the Members for Barking (Ms Hodge) and for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) refer to that issue in other debates. Uncertainty, misery, unemployment, redundancy and negative equity are a few of the effects that their constituencies have had to endure. They need the matter resolved as soon as possible. This is certainly a serious issue.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. Does he agree that the most important forgotten victims of the whole fiasco are the hundreds of families whose homes have been blighted, through no fault of their own, by the mess that has been made of introducing the scheme? Does he accept that if there is further delay, we should ask the Government to introduce as swiftly as they can a more generous compensation scheme, so that residents who are unable to sell their homes have the opportunity to move and do not have their lives destroyed by something that has been brought about through no fault of their own?

Mr. Fitzpatrick: As one of my hon. Friend's constituents, I know that she has campaigned long and hard on the issue. I readily accept her points. I am sure that the Government will take note.

[Mr. Fitzpatrick]

Many people believe that London is Westminster and the corridors of power, the BBC and Fleet street. Perhaps it is if one is from outside the capital. But the real London, my London, is Poplar and Canning Town, an area of high unemployment—14.2 per cent.—of poverty, deprivation, overcrowding and homelessness, which puts Tower Hamlets and Newham among the 10 most deprived local authorities in the UK. But that is changing.

The Government's social exclusion strategy has been written for constituencies such as mine. Education standards are being raised, communities and long-forgotten estates are being rebuilt and partnerships between new business communities and local people are being engendered in east London. To ensure success, and in order to deliver, we need the transport infrastructure.

Already, we have had some new roads, and we have London Underground's District and Central lines, and Stansted airport. New developments are under way on the docklands light railway, and the City airport is looking to expand. Improved bus routes are taking shape and the Jubilee line extension to Stratford opens in 12 months. Improvements are planned for the A13, and there is a real prospect that the Thames will be crossed at three new separate points in the years immediately ahead.

The final piece of the integrated transport jigsaw is rail. Even now, rail is playing its part, but the channel tunnel rail link, with the international station at Stratford, makes it all make sense. The project is about the next millennium, planning for the future. This is the stuff of boldness, of vision, of government.

In economic terms, east London has for too long been the poor relation of the family that is our great city of London. Historically, the east end has been a starting point for waves of immigration—Protestant, Catholic, Jewish, black and Asian communities. In common with most other eastern quarters of cities in the United Kingdom, east London has been our industrial centre. With prevailing westerly winds, it was convenient for our Victorian ancestors to locate certain industries in our part of town, where the sensibilities of others would not be offended by the smell, which would be directed away from the City. Consequently, gas and sewerage works linked with business that was dependent on the docks, to create a potent cocktail. But times have changed.

We still have some important traditional industries, but, following the closure of the docks, regeneration of the area was addressed, and the industrial focus moved to a commercial one. In the past 20 years, thousands of jobs and many businesses and organisations have moved to east London. The benefits are yet to penetrate the poverty that many local communities still suffer, but that will happen. I repeat the suggestion that I made in the debate on the Greater London authority, that docklands would be a wholly appropriate home for the new mayor and the elected assembly.

As I said, there is high unemployment, overcrowding and homelessness in my constituency—all the indices of poverty. The Government's new deal programme and welfare reform, as part of their social exclusion strategy, are critical. That is where we can make a difference. East London is the gateway to Europe. For Britain to be successful, London must thrive. For London to prosper, we need continuously to renew. The symbolism of docklands, Canary wharf, the millennium dome and, yes, even baby dome, is our beacon. It says to Europe and the rest of the world, "This is our capital; This is our country; This is our future." If the channel tunnel rail link is not built now, it will delay our renewal by a generation—although not prevent it. When we look back at the Tories' 10 years of indecision, we say that they were weak and frightened, and that they failed. This Government must not fail.

The London borough of Camden and its advisers have calculated that not to proceed with the CTRL would cost £850 million. Additionally, the Thameslink 2000 project, which was part of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill, would be compromised by any decision either not to proceed or to phase the project. Waterloo is not a real option because it does not have the capacity, particularly if the hope to move more freight by rail rather than road is to be realised.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I assure the hon. Gentleman that my constituents in Beckenham and throughout Bromley will be supporting his and his colleagues' plans to ensure that the channel tunnel rail link goes east of London because, at the moment, they are suffering from the noise and disruption caused by Eurostar.

Mr. Fitzpatrick: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's support.

It is calculated that, as a regeneration engine, the CTRL could create between 80,000 and 120,000 new jobs. When in opposition, Labour endorsed the project and flagged up what were seen as flaws in the business plan, to try to ensure its success. We need to support the project now that Labour is in power because the reasons why we supported it then are as valid now, if not more so—even if that means more public resources and financing.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I am a bit worried by that. Is my hon. Friend really saying that we should commit a great deal more public money without getting something in return? I am sure that that is not quite what he means. We all want the project to go ahead, but I hope that the Government will look very closely at what the taxpayer will get in return.

Mr. Fitzpatrick: I am sure that my hon. Friend is correct in encouraging the Government to look very closely at the prospect of allocating additional resources. However, I believe that the benefits that will accrue to the UK in general warrant consideration of additional resources. If London and Continental Railways is unable to deliver a new financial package, the Government may want to look to such an option.

It is encouraging that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has afforded LCR extra time, because it seems to be making progress. I am aware from contacts with various businesses over the past 48 hours that at least three other international consortiums are queuing up in case LCR fails. Although I hope that extra public finance is not necessary, I do not think that the Government should disregard the option. The prize at stake is too great.

This issue is not an east London, a London or even a south-east one. It concerns the whole of the UK. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and his colleagues on the attention that they have given the matter so far and on their determination to make it work. I am sure that the whole House will join me in wishing them every success.

9.48 am

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I welcome the chance to speak in this debate while delicate negotiations are going on. I congratulate the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on suggesting the debate. I am glad that he steered away quickly from turning the issue into a party political one. At this stage particularly, that would be completely inappropriate.

Broadly, I endorse the thrust of much of what the hon. Gentleman said about the importance not only of the link being built but of the whole link being built, so that the full benefits can be obtained. The people of Kent, including those in my constituency and all along the route of the line, have suffered blight and uncertainty for many years because of both the prospect of the line and the many delays in building it.

What those people deserve is that when the link is eventually built it will be a great national project bringing regeneration. The benefits that the people of Kent deserve come into two categories. The first would be better commuter links for themselves, not only on the line itself but through the release of capacity on other rail lines that have become increasingly crowded as the Kent economy has improved over the past few years.

Secondly, the people of Kent deserve the knowledge that the project is an essential link in a national project—indeed, an international project—involving not only the urban regeneration that the hon. Gentleman described but the general upgrading of rail services throughout Britain and into Europe.

I want to talk about what seems to be happening, and the likely effects. I warn the Minister that if the Government cannot find the subsidy to build the whole link at once—I dare say that that is the most likely eventuality—warm words about building future phases, after a first phase stopping at Southfleet, will not be enough. The people who live along the route, and channel tunnel rail link enthusiasts throughout the country, will want to see a firm timetable for building the entire line, with penalty clauses written in so that the timetable can be enforced.

Almost the worst eventuality would be for part of the link to be built, with all the disruption that that would cause, followed by vague words about how the rest of it would be built in phases over the years to come, but for the years to tick by with phases 2 and 3 delayed. In my more pessimistic moments, that seems to me to be the most likely outcome. I hope that the Minister can give us an assurance that it is not.

Mr. Stephen Timms (East Ham): I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I wonder whether he has noticed that some newspapers, including the Financial Times, are suggesting that it would be a good thing if only the first section of the link were built. Does he agree that that would be a disaster, and that the Government must ensure that when an announcement is made about taking the project forward there is full confidence that the whole link will be completed?

Mr. Green: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and I reinforce it from my constituency point of view. Because people have had to put up with blight and uncertainty for so long, they will be angry if they feel that, after all the inconvenience and damage to housing and to businesses along the route, the only result is 10 minutes off the journey. That would not seem like a sensible equation of advantage and disadvantage.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): As I am now being allowed to intervene, I shall not endeavour to catch your eye later, Madam Speaker, because of the number of other hon. Members who want to speak.

The hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) and I have collaborated closely on the matter, especially concerning our mutual problems with business blight and the distressing circumstances of small and medium-sized businesses.

I have every confidence that everything that the hon. Gentleman is saying is what I would have uttered if I had caught your eye, Madam Speaker, so I want to associate myself with it, and acknowledge the way in which the hon. Gentleman and I have collaborated in making representations to the Minister about our local businesses.

I reinforce the idea not only that the link must be built in its entirety but that any slippage would be an abuse of Parliament, because the long title of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1996 makes it abundantly clear that Parliament's intention was for the whole link to be built with the maximum expedition.

Mr. Green: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman not only for those remarks, with which I agree, but for his share in the work that we have done together on behalf of small businesses in both our constituencies, which are often in severe difficulty because of the various delays to the link.

I ask the Minister to give me some assurances and to answer some detailed questions about the propositions now before the Government. It is about 12 hours since I was last in the Chamber, and at that point the Minister was sitting there replying to a debate—so may I congratulate her on both her stamina and her versatility?

The Minister for Transport in London (Ms Glenda Jackson): I was standing, not sitting.

Mr. Green: Yes, she was standing. One wonders whether she ever gets away from that place.

I should like to receive three assurances from the Minister. The first is that whichever new project comes forward and whatever consortium is building it, there will be no relaxation of the environmental standards imposed in the original Bill that went through both Houses of Parliament and was fought over in detail by many people in this House and in another place, as well as in local communities along the route.

Along the route there is much fear and cynicism to the effect that one of the ways in which money might be saved when a new project emerges would be to relax the environmental standards. The Minister could reassure many people by giving an assurance this morning. In that context, I take it as read that when a new project comes forward there can be no change to the route currently before Parliament.

The second assurance for which I should be grateful is that the delays will soon come to an end. One understands that we are talking about complex commercial negotiations, to which the Government are only one party, so perhaps it was over-optimistic to expect them to be wrapped up in the 30 days that the Deputy Prime Minister originally suggested.

None the less, I must tell the Minister that businesses along the route, including those referred to by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), are especially damaged by the lengthening uncertainty, and I urge her to move as fast as possible to a conclusion of the negotiations.

The third assurance that I seek is that no secrecy should surround the deal eventually struck. Railtrack is at times an inherently secretive organisation. For example, last year an accident—not serious, fortunately—happened in my constituency. When I wrote to Railtrack some months later asking for details of its inquiry, and what remedial measures it proposed to take, I was shocked at its reply that the information was not available to the public and it was up to the Health and Safety Executive to say whether it should be released. The HSE wrote back to me saying that it was not its responsibility but Railtrack's—and compounded the insult by accompanying the letter with a pamphlet on open government.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the greatest assurances that the people of Kent could have would be one from the Minister today that Kent county council will be fully consulted and involved in the decision-making process? We hope that the decision will be completed as soon as possible, but we should like the county council to be fully involved.

Mr. Green: My right hon. and learned Friend is right. Kent county council has played, and is playing, an active and constructive role in bringing the project forward, and it is important that its ability to represent the people of Kent is recognised by full consultation during the negotiations.

The Minister will recognise the importance of avoiding secrecy, because, speaking in the House about the deal with London and Continental, she said:

> "I understand that no one in the House is privileged to see the contracts in any detail or to discuss them, on grounds of commercial confidentiality. It is a curious commercial enterprise that is clouded in mystery in one direction."—[Official Report, 25 April 1996; Vol. 276, c. 629.]

I am sure that the hon. Lady will endorse her own words and will not wish such secrecy to surround the project in future. Will she assure the House that full details of any agreement will be put in the Library for the perusal of Members?

As well as asking for those three assurances, I shall ask the Minister three questions. First, what type of freight does the Department think will be carried? We hear a lot about the freight benefits of the link. I assure the Minister that this is a genuine search for truth. Many, perhaps most, of the questions asked in the House are questions to which the questioner thinks he or she already knows the answer, but in this case, I genuinely have no idea of the answer, and no one connected to the project has ever satisfactorily explained it. We all agree that the line as planned will not be able to take any kind of heavy freight, but there is vague talk of "high-value freight" being carried. I am not sure whether that means any more than parcel freight, and I should be grateful if the Minister would give some guidance.

My second question is whether it is feasible or practical for Eurostar to share the lines between Southfleet and London with the existing commuter traffic if we go for a phased project, with the first part of the line built to Southfleet and the rest built in stages afterwards. I have been assured by reasonably well-qualified railway engineers that the amount of commuter traffic using the lines from Canterbury and the Medway towns to London will mean that either we will have to cut the commuter traffic in the rush hour or Eurostar will not be able to run in the rush hour. If that is true, it suggests that the phasing of the project would be simply impractical.

My third question is whether the benefits of upgrading the existing track are being considered while the Government are looking at all the options available to them. Engineers say that, effectively, we could save 15 minutes from the journey for £1 billion. We are, broadly speaking, talking about spending £7 billion or £8 billion to save 35 minutes, and it seems that that proposal deserves full consideration.

We recognise that the channel tunnel is a great national achievement, but it is only half an achievement. Linking the tunnel to the rail network of this country is the other half. London and Continental has had many failings, not just the central failing of its passenger projections which has led to the current financial plight. More particularly, it has been determined to keep secret the fact that it is more convenient for the whole of the south-east of England to drive to Ashford and travel from there than to struggle in to Waterloo. Despite the best efforts of the excellent management and staff at the Ashford international passenger station, the marketing of the station by London and Continental has been inadequate. Perhaps that is a symbol of its lack of commercial acumen.

Many people—not just my constituents, but all the people of Kent and the rest of the country—hope that the consortium put together by the Government shows more sensitivity to the needs of people who live, work and run their businesses along the route. We hope that it will be able to complete the project so that the whole country can gain the advantages that will be available from it.

10.2 am

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): It is perhaps appropriate that I follow the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) because I shared the job of co-chairman of the all-party channel tunnel group with his predecessor, Sir Keith Speed, for many years.

I wish to make two declarations of interest. First, as a former railwayman, I am still a member of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers—one of the reasons behind my interest in this great project. I am also the chairman of Travel West Midlands, a bus company based in Birmingham which is a subsidiary of National Express—itself a member of the London and Continental consortium. I ask the House to appreciate that I am not speaking on behalf of National Express. I have never had anything to do with the railway side of its operation, but I feel that such a connection should be on the record before I speak in the debate.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on bringing this important subject to the attention of the House. In an able speech, he talked about the history of the project. However, he did not go back far enough. Those of us who have the doubtful benefit of old age can remember this project in the 1970s when, I must say, neither of our main parties came out with any great credit. The Channel Tunnel Bill was cancelled by the Labour Government shortly they were elected in 1974.

I say to my hon. Friend and other colleagues who feel that public money should be put into the project that one of the reasons given for the cancellation was that there were other priorities for public money. At that time, many of my hon. Friends were in favour of the cancellation of the project because they wanted public money spent on schools, hospitals and other matters with which the Government were directly involved. I must tell my hon. Friend that I would not hold my breath too long if he thinks that the Treasury is likely to come to the rescue of London and Continental, or anyone else.

I was more amused than angered by the intervention of the former Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who is no longer in his place. I do not know how any member of the previous Cabinet could jump up and defend his constituents against the effect of this project on their lives, given the enormous mess that the Conservatives made of it from beginning to end. I admire his cheek, if not the basis on which he made his intervention.

The hon. Member for Ashford and all of us are anxious that the link is built as quickly as possible. I attended the meeting in Birmingham last Friday to which my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town referred. The Fast Tracks to Europe group is unrealistic when it says that the project must not be phased. Whatever happens, it seems unlikely that the work will start at each end of the route and will meet in the middle. Some phasing is inevitable. It looks as if the southern section will be built first, because—let us be realistic—it is likely to be a lot cheaper.

I have seen the figures produced by Fast Tracks to Europe, which suggest that such an approach will cost money because of the loss of benefits, but I have yet to hear a real alternative. If no Government money is involved, and if the projections for Eurostar travel—receipts from which will go towards the building of the project—are accurate, some degree of phasing, unpalatable though it might be to us all, is inevitable.

Around 1991, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine)—that great social engineer of the previous Government—decided to change the route. I know that that decision suited some of my hon. Friends, and I congratulate them on the effectiveness of their campaign. When the right hon. Gentleman changed the route, companies such as Blue Circle found themselves to be sitting on valuable real estate in the Ebbsfleet area. Coincidentally, the public relations company involved with Blue Circle at that time had as one of its representatives the former vice-chairman of the Conservative party, Dame Angela Rumbold.

I wonder whether companies that made money out of the project have volunteered to put any of their extra profits into the cost of building the rail link—particularly that part of it north of their land which is more expensive because of the need to tunnel under London. Cynic that I am, I would be surprised if any volunteer had come forward.

All of us want the project to benefit the rest of the country. Those of us who represent constituencies in the west midlands are no less anxious to see that happy event come about. What we have at present is the worst of both worlds. We have all the uncertainty about the future of the link, and we have no through trains to Europe. Indeed, the connecting trains to Waterloo have been removed by London and Continental, although many remain on the timetable. Last week, the Birmingham Evening Mail and the BBC highlighted the absurdity of a local train being held for eight minutes at Birmingham international station to allow for one of the Eurostars that do not exist as far as the west midlands is concerned.

I understand some of the difficulties in getting a safety case for the trains north of London. As far as I understand, they still only run between Manchester and somewhere like Bletchley. I should be grateful to the Minister if she would tell us what progress is being made to introduce those trains north of London, and whether the newspaper rumours about the trains being leased to Virgin or any other train operator for incorporation into their service are valid. No one north of London, and few people in London, have benefited from the project so far.

As the hon. Member for Ashford said, the link is a great engineering project, and all hon. Members attending this debate want to ensure that the original intentions of the Committee dealing with the channel tunnel are carried out. I am sorry if this sounds like a plea for medals for a rather undistinguished career, but I served on the first channel tunnel Committee in the 1970s—I remember, to my amusement, that there were only about 60 objectors then. When I served on the subsequent Committee in the mid-1980s, there were 12,000 objectors.

The hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), who is no longer in the Chamber, illustrated the dilemma that arises from the channel tunnel rail link and the expansion of the railway system—all of us are in favour of expanding the network, until the trains run through our constituencies or past the bottom of our gardens. According to the hon. Lady, the prospect of an hourly train of 18 coaches going to Paris or Brussels makes life intolerable for her constituents. I think that she exaggerates. People who buy houses next to railway lines and then complain about the noise from trains do not endear themselves to me as a former railwayman, although some of my hon. Friends may take a different view. We want the benefits of the link to be brought to the rest of the country, as was intended, so I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can answer some of the points that have been made.

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town is as realistic as I am about subsidy—he knows that Treasury involvement is unlikely. The fact that, across the country, road bridges are being strengthened to take 44 tonne lorries—that is a direct subsidy to the road haulage industry by the taxpayer—yet both the previous and current Governments said that public money cannot be found for the great project that is the channel tunnel rail link is an illustration of how we treat different forms of transport.

I add, as an amusing aside, that when Lord Parkinson stood at the Dispatch Box as Secretary of State for Transport, he used to say, "There must be no public money for the channel tunnel or the rail link." Nevertheless, he popped up later as chairman of one of the consortiums asking for £1 billion of public money for that very rail link. That illustrates the awesome warning to all hon. Members—never say never. We should never say never about this great project.

10.12 am

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate. I start by running through some of the history of the project—not the whole history, hon. Members will be pleased to hear. The first reference to a high-speed link that the Library could identify came in a speech by Sir Bob Reid on 9 May 1988. He said that a high-speed link would be built if it brought

"the right level of profit".

Hon. Members may be interested to know what was happening in France at that time. Construction of the train grande vitesse north line began after the end of September 1989.

Nearly 10 years on, and many miles of new roads later, the House is debating a future high-speed rail link, while Eurostar ambles through south London—Brixton, Beckenham and Orpington—at an embarrassingly relaxed and leisurely pace. What progress has been made in France? As hon. Members may know, its high-speed link was opened in September 1993—four and a half years ago—at a cost of £2 billion. That is a sad indictment of the previous Government's obsessive love affair with roads and their indifference to the railways.

The White Paper to be published soon will confirm whether the new Government have a more balanced approach to infrastructure provision and whether they believe that there should be a level playing field for roads and rail. In the meantime, they have to contend with the thorny issue of the channel tunnel rail link.

Over the past few weeks, I am sure that the Deputy Prime Minister has been considering the pros and cons of allowing the project to sink or swim. I give three good reasons why the high-speed link should be built. First, it will make it easier to shift freight off the roads and on to rail by releasing network capacity for freight trains. Secondly, it will cut CO_2 emissions, as many short-haul passengers who currently fly will choose to travel by rail. Thirdly, as hon. Members have said, it will help to regenerate some of the poorest parts of east London, developing the recycled sites that the Deputy Prime Minister has prioritised.

There is also a good reason why the link should be built along the current route. We are already five years behind the French, so surely our national pride will not let us slip behind a further five years while new legislation is drafted to provide for a new route.

If the Deputy Prime Minister accepts that argument, he has the choice of four partners—London and Continental Railways, Railtrack, Bechtel and Eurorail—some or all of which could take the project forward. If he seeks a deal with LCR, he should not reward it for its past bad management and judgment. If he seeks a deal with Railtrack, he should offer no sweeteners—he should not allow it to impose higher access charges for all other rail users. If he fails to secure a deal with LCR, Railtrack or any of the other players, and chooses not to back the project, I would ask him a simple question—what is Government for?

Mr. Snape: You lot would not know.

Mr. Brake: We shall find out shortly.

Liberal Democrats believe that Government should protect people on some of the lowest incomes—such as people with disabilities or lone parents—provide free education and take the lead. Even if the Government do not agree on the first two points, I hope that they can agree on the third. If no commercial operator produces an acceptable package, the Government—through a public interest company, bond issue or other measures—must step in. The need for Government involvement in such a strategic project was recognised even by the previous Administration, who committed £1.4 billion to the rail link.

The country needs the high-speed rail link, and it needs it to be built in its entirety—a 17-minute reduction in journey time for the first phase is not a sufficient benefit. I understand that Department of Trade and Industry lawyers advised the Government that if they intended to build not the full length but only stage one, a new Act would be required, with all the delays that that would entail. The Government must, therefore, be committed to building the full link.

The channel tunnel rail link is the first real test of the Government's commitment to an integrated transport policy, to moving freight from road to rail and to meeting their own CO_2 reduction targets. It is now up to the Deputy Prime Minister to show us whether he can rise to that challenge, or whether, like his Conservative predecessors, he will falter and stumble.

Mr. Paul Clark (Gillingham): I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on securing the debate at such an opportune time. Hon. Members from all parties recognise the difficulties that face both London and Continental Railways and the Government in saving and developing something from this project—although we should not save just any old thing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town said, the project is not a local or regional issue; it is a vital national and transcontinental one.

The rail link will draw in business to the channel tunnel from the east and, via the west coast main line, from the midlands, the north-west and the west of Scotland. Businesses and individuals will be able to capitalise on the opportunities that the link provides. Other hon. Members may be able to point up the significance of the rail link on a national level.

The link will open up the Government-identified Thames gateway region, which extends from east London through Dartford and down the north Kent coast, and includes my constituency and the western boundaries of Sittingbourne and Sheppey. The area contains about 2.5 million people, 17 local authorities, 10,000 acres of business and industrial land, and three training and enterprise councils.

The Thames gateway is the largest European regeneration area. The Government's regional strategy identifies north Kent as a growth point for major development. Significantly, much of that development, in business and new homes, would be on an abundant source of brown-field sites, which is clearly in line with Government policy.

The development of the Thames gateway will unlock major locations that face directly the main European markets. To succeed, we need the infrastructure: the rail link must be developed in its entirety. A link that stops short of the new international station at Ebbsfleet and transfers to existing lines will not deliver the regeneration, unlock the brown-field sites and help the people of north Kent.

It is anticipated that the development of Ebbsfleet will bring up to 50,000 new jobs and allow 30,000 new homes to be built. For the approximately 300,000 people living in the Medway towns, it will be a catalyst for new opportunities, with direct rail links to jobs along the north Kent line.

In addition to the development, a new commercial zone will be created adjoining Ebbsfleet station. There will be sustainable journey-to-work patterns by public transport, rather than by car, which, again, is in line with our integrated transport strategy.

The full scheme, including the new stations at Ebbsfleet and Stratford, will afford the people of north Kent greater job opportunities, as they will have access to new areas such as Stratford and St. Pancras. Those jobs will be linked to far faster and more reliable rail services: Gillingham will be only 30 minutes from St. Pancras if the link is built in its entirety.

The link is essential for the regeneration and redevelopment policies of the Government and of Kent county council. Failure to complete it will send out the wrong signals. The private sector has already made huge commitments to north Kent. Failure to honour the promises that elicited those commitments will destroy confidence not only in the immediate area but, I fear, in other developments that are proposed along the entire route of the integrated link, including east London, Birmingham and the west midlands, and the north-west.

We should record our appreciation of the fact that the House has been kept quickly and reliably informed through the offices of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, in both a statement and a written answer. Our resolve to build the link, which will eventually connect the east, the west, the south and the north of our country to the European capitals of commerce must not weaken. Failure could mean that we end up as a branch line to Brussels.

We must remain true to the original agreements. The Deputy Prime Minister's statement last month informed us that there was no intention to consider an alternative alignment to that approved in the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1996. That is more than welcome. Any deviation would be the death knell of a realistically timed completion of the link.

Hon. Members who are far more au fait than I am with developments over the past 20 years—at least—said that various alternative routes had been canvassed. I whole-heartedly agree with what the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) said about blight and uncertainty, because those alternative routes caused much anxiety and concern among home owners and businesses; my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) also mentioned the business side. It is essential that competition should not reopen for the design, construction and operation of the link, as that would open a Pandora's box of alternatives and variations.

One benefit of the link will be to open up existing lines for other uses, increasing both passenger and freight capacity. I shall be interested in the Minister's response about freight, as there seem to be some differences of opinion. I understand that there will be increased capacity for freight on some existing lines, as well as along the link. That will have an important environmental impact in helping us to reduce traffic congestion.

The environmental impact of the link itself must be minimised. Debates in both Houses over two years have developed negotiations that have led to high standards and considerable sophistication in the plan, which incorporates measures embodied in the environmental minimum requirements and undertakings given by the previous Government and LCR. It is essential to adhere to that.

We must grasp the opportunities before us if we are to be a key player in the issues of integrated transport, commerce and the European Union. The development of the link gives us the opportunity to create the right balance and to implement the Government's sound objectives on issues such as the fight against poverty, social inclusion, the environment, integrated transport, the regions, and Europe.

This is not a local issue, as can be seen by the range of hon. Members who signed early-day motion 770 and by the membership of Fast Tracks to Europe, as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town, which includes many private sector organisations and the leaders of many local authorities throughout the country.

The message, specifically from the Medway towns, is that we must build the link in its entirety as quickly as possible, so that we can have the transport links that are needed for the 21st century.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on securing this debate. He has done the House a great service. It is a little sad that the bipartisan approach slipped somewhat. It is up to the current Government to decide how to proceed on the matters that face them, but it would be churlish of hon. Members not to note that the channel tunnel itself was built during the 18 years of Conservative government. I am proud to defend the record of the Conservative Government, which was democratically elected on four occasions.

Mr. Snape: There were also a few hot summers during the period of office of the previous Conservative Government. Is the hon. Gentleman going to claim credit for those as well? On the insistence of the then Prime Minister, not a penny of public money went into the channel tunnel.

Mr. Amess: That is exactly the point and it is something which has been learnt from the Conservative Government. I shall leave claiming the credit for hot summers to the Liberal party and new Labour.

[Mr. Amess]

I must also pay tribute to the noble Lords Parkinson and Channon, who did a great deal during their terms of office to drive the project forward. Our former colleague Michael Portillo, as Minister of State at the Department of Transport, also did a great deal to make the channel tunnel project the success that it obviously is. Finally, without the noble Baroness Thatcher none of it would have been possible.

My roots run deep and I suspect that I am the only person in the Chamber who was born in the east end of London—in Stratford. In the previous Parliament, it was my great joy to work with, among others, the hon. Members for East Ham (Mr. Timms) and for West Ham (Mr. Banks)—now the Minister for Sport—and Mr. Nigel Spearing, who has now retired. We worked together in a bipartisan fashion and a great deal has been achieved as regards our particular concerns in Newham.

I still have family living in Newham; indeed, that is where the tiny vote for the Conservative party comes from these days. Although I was less than satisfied for a long time with what went on there—I call those the barmy days of Labour—a number of projects are a great joy, particularly those in Stratford. I protested about the pyramid 20 years ago, saying that it was a waste of time building it and I note that last week it was blown up—my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) will have enjoyed that—so I was right in my protestations all those years ago.

The channel tunnel rail link is important not merely for Newham but for both our Essex constituencies, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is essential that the project is completed. For docklands and Stratford in particular the link is essential—it is the most important rail link.

I wish that I had time to touch on the excellent advice that I have been given by the London borough of Newham regeneration and partnerships division, which has done some great work on the subject. I must emphasise its point that:

"Without the CTRL being built in its entirety . . . to central London, there will not be the possibility of moving commuter trains from Kent from congested existing lines onto it between international trains and 'freeing up' capacity for more freight movement through Kent to the Channel Tunnel. Indeed given the growth figures already referred to, the Integrated Transport Strategy, on which so many hopes are built, especially that freight will be moved from road to rail, could face an immediate crisis of insufficient capacity. Phasing solely to Southfleet or Ebbsfleet could deliver the worst scenario of all—no possibility of increasing either the number of international trains an hour (from the current 3) and no extra capacity for freight trains unless the number of commuter services is reduced. It is already clear that the different train operators recognise the looming problem. However, with Railtrack—the track provider—set to be a major player in the CTRL rescue . . . they are reticent in voicing concerns when they may shortly be competing with other train operators for an insufficiency of train paths."

I realise that this is a difficult moment for the new Government—how best to approach the challenges facing them—but I hope that we will not be churlish and that we will rejoice in this great engineering feat. I hope in particular that the House will be minded to support the efforts of Newham council and Stratford in particular.

Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on securing this important Adjournment debate. He has distinguished himself as a first-class chairman of the all-party Thames gateway group. He and my parliamentary neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Clark,) make a formidable team in leading our group, which represents constituencies in London and the south-east. The success of the Thames gateway is fundamental to our opportunities to secure economic regeneration, as many of those opportunities stem from the building of the channel tunnel rail link.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): Is my hon. Friend aware that the opportunities for regeneration are immense in my constituency? As Opposition Members and my hon. Friends have already said, up to 50,000 new jobs could be created as a result of the creation of Ebbsfleet international station. Also, 90 per cent. of the 30,000 new houses proposed for the area would be built on recycled land, in line with Government policy, thus protecting the green belt for the area.

Mr. Shaw: That is an excellent point, and just the sort of example I was looking for, so I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention.

I will not discuss the route in its entirety, but I associate myself with all the other comments about that. I must focus briefly on an issue that affects constituents who live in and around the Medway towns—the M2 widening and the construction of the channel tunnel rail link, both of which were authorised in legislation. During the parliamentary process, the three authorities that represent my constituency—Rochester city council, Tonbridge and Malling district council and Kent county council—stressed the importance of the co-ordination of those projects. We argued that the construction of the bridges across the Medway valley had to take place at the same time. My constituents and the infrastructure in the Medway towns would suffer considerably anyway as a result of the construction and we recognised that, but to start one project across the valley, finish it and then start another would be a nightmare scenario. The estimated time scale for the channel tunnel rail link over the Medway valley is likely to be about three years and for the M2, three and a half years, which could mean six and a half years of disruption and chaos for my constituents. However, put the two projects together and we could reduce the time to four and a half years, which would be not only less destructive but more cost effective.

Understandably, we were pleased when the Government accepted that the two projects should be co-ordinated. Last year, the new Labour Government fulfilled the pledge to hold an early review of the road building programme. The M2 widening was contained within that programme and at the time we made representations to press the point about the delay and the effect that it could have on co-ordinating the concurrent construction that we had fought so hard to win. The matter was resolved and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions announced that the M2 widening would go ahead. He rightly pointed out that the project was part of a strategic transport infrastructure, in that the M2 would link up with the CTRL station in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford. Now, we face similar doubts about the other project.

The timing of those two nationally important transport schemes is vital to my area to limit disruption, keep down costs and to apply the principle of sustainable development. The CTRL has caused misery and blight in Kent—

Mr. Mackinlay: And in Essex.

Mr. Shaw: Indeed. There have been hard-fought battles for environmental safeguards, but I support the project and have always done so. We must build the link in its entirety, but I look forward to hearing some answers from my hon. Friend the Minister to my questions about concurrent construction.

10.38 am

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I congratulate the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick). His presentation of the argument, with which I disagree except for his strictures on the channel tunnel, was admirable and beautifully structured. However, this debate has seen the House at its most facile. It has consisted almost entirely of a series of clichés and trite remarks about the strategic plan, the need to send messages and so forth and national pride. I was interested to hear a Liberal Democrat Member, the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake), talking about national pride. All those points were synthesised in a series of mini soundbites which hon. Members uttered for the benefit of their local newspaper before they sharply and shortly left the Chamber.

The House has not been at its best during the debate. The most interesting contribution came from the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), who reminded us of the situation in 1983 when the channel tunnel project started, and of the colossal underestimation of building costs. Fortunately, because of the views of the then Prime Minister, the project did not attract public money and, therefore, it was the banks that took a terrific bath, which everyone enjoyed.

Now, we are faced with precisely the same situation: the contractor grossly overestimated traffic, and got the contract by one means or another, but almost immediately got into difficulties and has to be bailed out. It is perfectly clear that the private sector will not bail the contractor out, and the Deputy Prime Minister implied in his late-night statement that, if necessary, the taxpayer would foot the bill.

I caution the House against blithely accepting that. The sum involved is £8 billion—at the moment. We all know that figure could easily double. The House should consider this: on one hand, we have a colossal and environmentally damaging project, the real benefits of which no hon. Member has quantified; on the other, we have the putative expenditure of £8 billion of public money, which will probably increase to £16 billion. Hon. Members should ask themselves whether it would be better spent elsewhere, not on the usual clichés such as schools and hospitals, but on the transport system, and the rail network in particular. We should also ask what we would get for £16 billion, as an alternative to this ludicrous and megalomaniac project to drive a new rail link.

The trains run perfectly well at the moment. Because this is an unprogressive, slightly reactionary argument, hon. Members on both sides of the House regard it with mirth, but it is practical. I do not have time to develop my argument, but I say this: the money has been notionally ring fenced, so we should consider what other ways there may be of putting into the transport system.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): We are always pleased to hear from my right hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark), who has put the alternative view on these matters.

The channel tunnel rail link was announced in February 1996, and there was enthusiasm for and commitment to a project that would be fundamental to the economic enhancement of the south-east of England and the nation as a whole. Conservative Members still believe in the project, retain the same enthusiasm for it and think that it will bring benefits. We share that enthusiasm with the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick), and I congratulate him on securing the debate and on the balanced way in which he made his arguments.

We support the Government's attempt to find a solution to this problem. The project was never going to be easy to complete, and we wish them well. Many people have been embarrassed to travel through France at high speed, only to trundle across Kent at a gentlemanly speed. However, no contrast is more marked than that between north-western France and south-eastern England. The Picardie region of France is flat and empty, and the construction of the railway was not a technical or a financial challenge. In contrast, the route through Kent traverses some of England's most beautiful countryside and passes close to a substantial number of communities. They, and affected London communities, commented vociferously on the project during the passage of the legislation through the House.

Scrutiny of the Bill was intense, with a Select Committee considering thousands of petitions. The agreed route had the support of the vast majority and provided a much-needed framework for the economic regeneration of east London. There is to be a station at Stratford, and a special link to King's Cross and St. Pancras to provide a direct twin-track connection between the CTRL and the west coast main line.

The consortium that won the competition to construct the CTRL was London and Continental Railways, a partnership of six of the nation's leading companies: Ove Arup and Partners, Bechtel Ltd., Sir William Halcrow and Partners, the National Express Group, the Virgin Group and SG Warburg and Co. The key criteria for the evaluation of bids were the size and timing of the Government's financial contribution and the risk that each bidder was prepared to accept. The LCR bid was successful: it needed millions of pounds less in subsidy than the bid of its rival, Eurorail.

[Mr. Richard Ottaway]

Some people say that the project was given too little public subsidy. The then Labour Opposition made it clear that they considered the public subsidy to be too high, yet at the same time they believed that there should have been a public-private partnership with most of the assets given to LCR remaining in public hands. That ignores the fact that, under any public-private partnership, Government subsidy would have been inevitable and would have entailed an even greater public subsidy we are likely to end up with.

Faced with the harsh realities of office, the Deputy Prime Minister's initial reaction was to resist the further use of public funds, no doubt with encouragement from the Treasury. With the benefit of hindsight, we know that the main factor behind the current impasse was the passenger forecast of London and Continental Railways. When the bid was made, the annual passenger projection was 9 million; today, it is only 6 million. The forecasts were put forward by the best experts in the country, but no one could be certain about future passenger numbers and all estimates are subject to a degree of error.

Although LCR clearly overestimated the number of passengers, it is probable that the channel tunnel fire had something to do with that inaccuracy: a six-month delay and a reduced service cannot have helped in marketing the project. The good news is that passenger numbers continue to increase. We should retain our optimism that targets will be hit, albeit late: not even a revised scheme will work if they are not.

LCR is not in a position to proceed, because it cannot raise the necessary funds. We share the view of many people that the proposed route should not be altered. To alter it would require the reopening of the whole inquiry and would cause further unacceptable delays. There is every possibility that a two-phase solution may be found, with Railtrack, in a joint venture with LCR, constructing phase 1 from Cheriton to Ebbsfleet station by 2002, and phase 2 from Ebbsfleet to St. Pancras by 2005.

Despite the opposition of the Local Government Association and others, we give that solution a cautious welcome if it is to be the only basis for a successful outcome. I say to the hon. Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms)—and, indeed, to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who ably represented Newham council—that there may be a gulf between what he wants and what is achievable. He will have to face up to the realities.

We understand that phase 1 could cost about £2 billion, with Railtrack playing a major role. Such a tremendous achievement by Railtrack would confirm the previous Government's decision to privatise the company, leaving it as a strong, well-financed company which can pick up such projects at relatively short notice and make something of them. The whole House will agree that that is a tribute to the previous Government's privatisation policy.

The question of running Eurostar remains to be solved. Although the Deputy Prime Minister, egged on by Labour Members, was excited by the thought of taking the trains back into public ownership, the change in culture brought about by the previous Government will lead him to conclude that a private solution remains the best bet.

One of the more stupid suggested alternatives is the resurrection of the Central Railway scheme which was decisively rejected by the House in July 1996. The proposal was to drive a railway line from the tunnel through the heart of London, causing massive disruption as it went. I urge the Government, if they need urging, not to reintroduce that proposal.

Notwithstanding the deep complexities that remain and the need to find a solution to Eurostar's loss making, the main aim must be for all options to be explored to allow the project to go ahead. The failure of the project would be a great blow, not only to the rail link, which is an important integrated transport project, but to the much-needed regeneration of east London. We offer the Government our support.

The Minister for Transport in London (Ms Glenda Jackson): I thank the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) for his support, and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on obtaining the debate. As others have said, we are grateful to him for giving us this opportunity. The channel tunnel rail link has probably not had such a high public profile since the idea was launched, and it is a pity that such a level of interest has been generated for all the wrong reasons.

No one would dispute the fact that all the speeches this morning—with, perhaps, the exception of the somewhat curious contribution of the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark)—[Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) points out from a sedentary position, the right hon. Gentleman has just left the Chamber—presumably to publish his soundbite press release, an action for which he criticised other hon. Members in his speech.

In the main, the speeches have been both serious and informed. The importance of the CTRL, not just as a high-speed link with Europe but for its regeneration potential, was stressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It may assist hon. Members, however, if I summarise the events of the past six weeks, and explain how matters now stand.

London and Continental Railways formally notified my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on 28 January that it would be unable to meet the terms of its development agreement with the Government without the injection of some £1.2 billion of public subsidy over the next 10 years. That £1.2 billion was on top of the £1.8 billion of taxpayers' money that had already been committed. It did not include the public assets that were also part of the development agreement, which have been estimated to be in the region of £5 billion.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister rejected the proposal. He has left no one in any doubt that he wants the development of high-speed connections to Europe, but not at any price. I trust that that would reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who, regrettably, is not present. At a time when fiscal prudence is needed, it would be irresponsible—almost unthinkable—to commit such large additional sums of taxpayers' money, no matter how strong the wish for improved links.

LCR asked for more money because it vastly overestimated the number of passengers who would be travelling on Eurostar by now. The development agreement made those Eurostar projections a cornerstone of LCR's plans for raising project finance. The then Government and LCR should have realised that the forecasts were overblown and unrealistic, but they did not. That was a serious misjudgment, and the present Government should not and will not simply bail LCR out.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister came to the House with all speed, having heard LCR admit that it could not meet its obligations under the development agreement. As he explained in his statement on 28 January, the development agreement with LCR allowed for a 30-day period during which LCR could present revised financing proposals. LCR's shareholders subsequently constructed a framework of proposals, which they put to my right hon. Friend last week. The shareholders envisaged a role for Railtrack. After careful consideration, my right hon. Friend agreed to grant a further extension of the cure period to allow LCR more time in which to flesh out its ideas. The revised deadline is 31 March.

As my right hon. Friend intimated on 28 January, we would like LCR to come up with a solution allowing it to meet its obligations under the development agreement. Against the contingency that no satisfactory solution will materialise, we are still working to provide for an orderly transfer of Eurostar UK Ltd. to the public sector, as is required if the development agreement is terminated. Let me assure the hon. Member for Croydon, South that that would obtain whichever party was in power. It is part of the development agreement that was worked out and signed by the Conservative Government.

I am afraid that I cannot say much more about the point that LCR has reached. Its proposals simply are not developed enough. However, there has been considerable speculation in the press, and I want to put some of what has been reported in context.

There has been much talk of white knights galloping to the rescue. Given the size of the project, it is not surprising that organisations wish to become involved, but the formal position is that the Government have a contract with LCR and no one else. If LCR chooses to bring in other partners, that may happen, but only with the Government's approval. As I have said, it appears that LCR sees a role for Railtrack in the new structure that it is drawing up, but that is its business.

Much has also been written about the notion of phasing the construction of the link. It is important to remember that Parliament authorised a railway between Cheriton and St. Pancras which follows a very carefully defined alignment. Our contract with LCR requires the construction of the entire railway approved by Parliament. The Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1997 envisages a whole line from St. Pancras to the channel tunnel, so there must be an intention to build all of it when the powers are used. In case there is any doubt, let me stress that the environmental standards that have been set for the link will not be compromised. I trust that that reassures hon. Members who have expressed concerns this morning.

Ms Rosie Winterton (Doncaster, Central): Does my hon. Friend agree that the benefits that would be derived from making the link go all the way to St. Pancras would greatly help to regenerate areas such as South Yorkshire, which have suffered incredible manufacturing and industrial decline over the past few years?

Ms Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. The issue of regeneration inherent in the building of the line has been mentioned by all hon. Members this morning.

The excitement in the media has prompted an interesting and widespread public debate about the rail link. That reminds us just how many parties have an interest in the CTRL—partly because, as many hon. Members pointed out this morning, it is not simply a transport project. The key reason for routing it via the Thames gateway—also known as the east Thames corridor—was that stations along it could act as focal points for regeneration. The theme of regeneration has run through all the speeches this morning. In fact, the £1.8 billion of public subsidy promised in the development agreement with LCR was justified in part by the regeneration benefits.

Concern has been expressed that regeneration may be forgotten in decisions on the rail link. I assure hon. Members that it will not. In the last few weeks, the problems of the rail link have elicited views from those interested in each of the stations, and also from those concerned with access to the regions—such as my hon. Friends the Members for Poplar and Canning Town, for Gillingham (Mr. Clark) and for East Ham (Mr. Timms), and the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green).

Later this month, I shall be chairing a meeting of all local authorities affected in order to discuss their concerns. They will include Kent county council, which I trust will reassure the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard). I strongly agree with the view expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) about that intervention by a member of the Cabinet when the agreement was signed by the last Government.

I am aware that there is considerable concern that delays to the CTRL may jeopardise regeneration in London and Kent. As hon. Members will know, the CTRL has been seen as the vehicle for a number of regeneration initiatives, all of which have been mentioned this morning. Ebbsfleet station is the main node for regeneration of the eastern part of the Thames gateway. Substantial development is already taking place, but the rail link station is regarded as key to the redevelopment of some 2,200 acres of land, which has nearly all been used previously.

Stratford is the main node at the other end of the Thames gateway. Here the concept is of development on derelict or under-used land that can be of sufficient scale to act as a catalyst for other redevelopment on smaller sites in the general area. Stratford is also complementary to regional interests because it is proposed that trains can call there before running through to the west coast main line, without incurring the time penalty of having to stop at St. Pancras and reverse out again.

There is also the regeneration created by the rail link and Thameslink 2000 at St. Pancras. Seventy acres are available for redevelopment in one of the last potential areas on the fringes of central London.

As I am rapidly running out of time, may I say that I shall write to hon. Members on the issues to which they drew my attention. The hon. Member for Ashford and my hon. Friends the Members for Barking (Ms Hodge), for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), for Gillingham and for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw) have mentioned blight issues. The hon. Member for Ashford also mentioned freight and commercial confidentiality.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We must now move on to the debate on the benefit integrity project.

Benefit Integrity Project

11 am

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Many hon. Members have approached me to say that they want to participate in the debate so, despite the fact that I have briefings from organisations and individuals with which I could detain the House all day, I shall try to condense my remarks. This is a matter that interests all of us as constituency Members of Parliament and which we would wish to debate constructively.

The benefit integrity project was established after a survey of 1,135 people claiming disability living allowance, the report of which was published in January 1997. Forty interviewers carried out about 30 home visits each of adult or child recipients of disability living allowance. That project was undertaken when people were giving voice to fears about social security fraud. I, too, detected an undercurrent of feeling on the subject. However, snapshot assessments were made of individuals and little expertise was involved in the adjudication.

There was no follow-up of the 1.5 per cent. of cases that were designated confirmed fraud in the 1997 report. No prosecutions were made and no benefits were stopped. That suggested that people who were receiving disability living allowance were doing so because of their needs and that they were not doing so fraudulently, as the then Government feared.

Indeed, on 13 January 1998, when Baroness Hollis of Heigham, the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, first reported on the BIP findings, she said in another place:

"I am happy to confirm that the benefit integrity project has revealed no cases of confirmed fraud."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 13 January 1998; Vol. 584, c. 936.]

That finding was based on the receipt of about 30,000 replies from disabled people.

I therefore believe that at this stage we should be considering not the fraud issue, but the needs issue—the needs of the people involved.

More than 40,000 people have since been interviewed. According to a parliamentary reply that I have received, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency estimates that, in the financial year 1997-98, savings of £15.8 million may be made. Subsequently, 311 appeals have been received; as yet there are no figures on success rates.

As part of the benefit integrity project, another 400,000 people are to be interviewed in the next four years. My deepest concern is that fear and distrust have emerged in the community as a result of the project. Individual cases have been highlighted on television and in newspapers. I shall not rehearse all those cases, but every case that is highlighted sends a tremor of fear through other individuals who may be in similar circumstances and there is genuine anxiety that the project is Treasury led, not needs led.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Yes.

Mrs. Ewing: Although I hear Conservative Members saying yes, I remind them that the Conservative Government established the benefit integrity project.

All this is set against the background of an overall review of the social security system, but people who are in receipt of disability living allowance feel that they have now been singled out for a specific review.

I remind the House that many other important benefits—such as housing benefit and income support—hinge on disability living allowance. If at any time DLA is discontinued, those other benefits are discontinued and although, after a review or an appeal, the disability living allowance may be backdated, those other items of support to families are not backdated, so a great deal of distress results.

There can be a sudden drop in household income—and we must all budget according to our household income. This is a very difficult situation for many disabled people to be in. The review and appeal procedures are long and complex. Every hon. Member must have been involved in many such cases. We hope that our intervention will speed things up for the person involved, but I often wonder about the people who do not approach their Member of Parliament.

Other people are worried that, for them, reassessment may mean a return to residential care. We have all worked hard to try to ensure that care in the community works. Many people who, after being institutionalised for years, have emerged and rely on care in the community, are being reassessed. They fear that they may have to return to permanent residential care.

My excellent local citizens advice bureau in Moray experienced a threefold increase in inquiries about disability between 1996–97 and 1997–98. I am sure that that increase is mirrored elsewhere. It is a sign of the anxiety that exists. I worry about what is happening in places where there are no welfare rights workers, citizens advice bureaux, or people to whom people can turn.

The basic aim of disability living allowance was to give dignity and decency to people who suffer from disability, which comes in many different forms. I want, in a constructive speech, to make some proposals to the Government. First, I want to comment on the important issue of the assessment mechanisms.

In reply to a parliamentary question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney), the Secretary of State for Social Security said of decisions resulting in reduction or removal of entitlement to DLA:

"there will always be additional evidence to support the decision"—[Official Report, 9 February 1998; Vol. 305, c. 76.]

Interestingly, I found in my mail today a letter, dated 2 March, from the Secretary of State, in which some of these issues are raised. Immodestly, I should like to think that the prospect of the debate may have stimulated the writing of that letter, but I hope that this important letter has been circulated, not only to all hon. Members, but to representatives of voluntary organisations who are deeply involved in this crisis.

Having had only about 15 minutes to look through the letter, I ask the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who is to reply to the debate, to ensure that we have a detailed expansion of that letter. I also ask him to confirm that there will definitely be guarantees for those who want to ensure that medical evidence is submitted when decisions are taken that may result in reduction or removal of entitlement, because many of the issues pertaining to DLA are cocooned by the issue of medical entitlement. Assessment seems to take little account of day-to-day changes in the condition of many disabled people. In response to a letter from my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside, Peter Mathison of the Benefits Agency stated:

"The additional information may be factual medical evidence from a GP, hospital or other health care professional, a full medical examination by a qualified medical practitioner or information from a carer. The most appropriate source of additional evidence will be used in light of the individual circumstances of the case."

That does not guarantee a full medical assessment, which is what I seek.

Claimants do not always receive clear advice on issues pertaining to the project, such as the information that they may have advisers present. They may be advised that someone may be present but a claimant could take along a next door neighbour, a family member or a friend and not necessarily someone with the knowledge to advise them on how to respond to questions and state exactly what is being sought. It is not made clear that people can have access to previous claim forms against which they can compare their present circumstances to see whether there has been any change. In most cases, there is a deterioration. People also have a right to delay an interview until a more suitable time.

Information should be clearer for people who are being reassessed, whether it is provided in forms or by agency representatives who visit them. There are many public service advertisements on television; perhaps the Government could examine the clarity of the advertising on this subject. The training for visiting officers could be improved. We should aim for best standards and best training. Some people receive only half a day's training while others are trained for up to four days. In a letter to me, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency stated that there was no requirement for visiting officers to have medical knowledge.

Adjudication officers must look beyond the bald statements that sometimes appear on forms and they should always err on the side of the claimant rather than on the side of reducing benefits. It has been suggested that a disability benefits task force could bring together the expertise of voluntary groups. Over the past two days, I have met representatives from no fewer than nine such groups. Their expertise, with that of welfare advisers, could be brought to the heart of the Department of Social Security and to the heart of government. The people in those voluntary groups deal with people's day-to-day problems.

Perhaps the Minister can advise me on exemptions. Many organisations have told me that there is evidence that people who should be exempt from review have been reviewed. I have a list of the exemptions. What criteria can be established to ensure that people on the exempt list are not subjected to further review? Is there a possibility of extending the exempt list? I have received from the Cystic Fibrosis Research Trust a request for its clients to be considered for exemption. I need not go into detail, but all hon. Members will appreciate that people with cystic fibrosis fluctuate between well-being and illness. That is also the pattern of many other illnesses, and I hope that that can be considered. I should like to know how the criteria for exemptions are established and how they can be expanded.

[Mrs. Ewing]

I intend to be brief because other hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside wish to take part in the debate. I have highlighted only a few of the problems that are associated with the benefit integrity project. My final recommendation is, I think, endorsed by the vast majority of the organisations that work with disabled people. It is that the project should be suspended, at least for a time, to allay the fears of those who are most vulnerable and to give us all an opportunity to try to ensure that the disability living allowance is targeted at those who need it most so that no one has to endure the fear that is endured by many of my constituents.

I understand that the representatives of the Disability Benefits Consortium met the Prime Minister on 16 February to discuss that issue and that it was stated that it would be considered. Perhaps in responding to the debate the Minister will say whether the Department is considering the suspension of the project and whether we can expect an early announcement on that.

11.15 am

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): The debate is long overdue. I am sure that every hon. Member has been inundated with letters and telephone calls. It is important to understand how we reached the present situation. When disability living allowance was introduced in 1992, it was generally regarded as good news for disabled people because it included lower immobility and care components. I pay tribute to the former right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea, Sir Nicholas Scott, for his work in that arena. The new arrangements ensured that, in the first year, there were some 700,000 new claimants. Each year since there have been about 300,000 new claimants. That is a tribute to the scope of the benefit, but it constitutes a tremendous work load.

Hon. Members who were here in 1992 to 1994 remember the chaos over disability living allowance. There were massive delays, backlogs and complaints about claims not being processed. Hotlines were set up so that hon. Members could get through to the Benefits Agency, although the public could not. At one stage, about 800 temporary staff were drafted in from social security offices to try to deal with the problems. Care in the community was introduced in 1992; that led to a huge number of people being taken out of institutional care and placed in the community. Because they were no longer in institutional care, they were entitled to disability living allowance.

Because of all those factors, the Benefits Agency was grinding to a halt and somewhere along the line there was a ministerial nod and a wink to the effect that unless claims were patently invalid they should be approved simply to get rid of the backlog. That is part of the reason for the current problems. It cannot be overstated that the problems with disability living allowance relate to management and departmental error and not to disability fraud. The problem has been around for a long time and it has not been addressed either by the former Government or, so far, I am sorry to say, by the present Government.

By the end of last year, there were some 4 million claimants for disability living allowance and attendance allowance compared with 1.7 million under the old 1991 scheme. In one sense, the system has worked because the benefit has gone to many more people. I hope that it has done some good.

Of course, the previous Government panicked. In 1995, they said that the number claiming invalidity benefit had rocketed and that something had to be done about it. They introduced incapacity benefit as a way of cutting benefits for the sick, but they knew that they could not do the same with disability living allowance because there would be an outcry. They had to look for a way to curb the growing number of claimants without causing an outcry. Using some dubious evidence from the National Audit Office, combined with some reasonable evidence from the Department, they decided that there were significant errors in the system and set up the benefit integrity project to deal with them.

No training was provided for the people who were sent to visit claimants, but claimants were assured that the visiting officers were not the decision makers. That is correct, because decisions are taken by an adjudication officer—but he makes his decision based on the information on the claim form, which is the information extracted from the claimant by the visiting officer. The claimant has no idea how what they have said will be construed. Generally, the claim form is filled in by the visiting officer—the claimant simply signs it—so in fact the visiting officer has a significant input into the final decision. The failure to provide any training for visiting officers was criminal.

DLA is a self-assessment benefit, and some would say rightly so. If one third of the working population have self-assessment for their tax contributions, perhaps it is right for claimants to have some element of self-assessment for what they claim, but the capacity for error is enormous. Very few of us are sufficiently medically skilled to describe how an affliction of disability affects our daily lives. We would be hard put to do that. Many of my hon. Friends have afflictions, but I shall not talk about them today.

There is enormous room for error because people are not necessarily able to determine how their condition has changed over the years—whether for better or for worse. There are clear cases of people who should receive benefit for life, but the very nature of disability means that some people will get worse or better. It is virtually impossible for an individual to judge when he has crossed the line between entitlement and disentitlement.

Where should we go from here? A number of actions are required. I welcome the two announcements made by the Government during the past month. They go a long way, but we need to go much further. The claim and renewal forms need to be redesigned to make them much simpler and clearer so that claimants can more easily determine their entitlements. There is an argument for shorter award periods. One matter of concern is the number of lifetime awards that have been found to be wrong in some respect. A review period of, perhaps, two years might help to prevent many of the problems that have recently been prevalent.

There needs to be significant investment in staff training—and not only for visiting officers. I know that some people dispute the figures, but if they are correct some 50,000 cases have been wrongly assessed. That raises serious questions about not only the management of the unit, but the people making the original decisions. The evidence is that the training programme has not been good enough.

It is important to have people in local offices so that they can give advice and liaise with local disability groups. They can talk to claimants and try to get around the problems. That would be far better than the present remote operation at Blackpool, which deals with people only by mail or telephone. The personal touch can sort out many problems.

We need an absolute commitment that the project is not and never has been a cuts-led exercise. The purpose of the exercise should be to ensure that people get their entitlement. I have not heard anyone dispute the qualifying criteria for disability living allowance and I hope that we never change them, but there is a major problem with matching the entitlement to the criteria. The exercise should be about getting that right.

We should recognise that much of the problem lies within the DLA unit, not with claimants. Fraud is not an issue in the payment of DLA. There will always be the odd case of fraud, but fraud is not causing the problems with over or underpayment; the problem is departmental errors—and responsibility lies first with the DLA management unit, but also with us, as parliamentarians, for not getting it right in the first place.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on bringing this important and timely debate to the Floor of the House. There is obvious concern, across the parties, about constituency cases.

As a member of the all-party disablement group, during the past few months I have been twice to see the Secretary of State on this issue. I reiterate the request to the Secretary of State, made today by Lord Ashley, the chairman of the group, for a moratorium on the benefit integrity project. Although the Secretary of State has announced some changes during the past few weeks, there is still a great deal of confusion—not only among those who have had their claims assessed, but among those who are literally waiting for the knock at the door. Many people with lifetime benefit are anxious about the future. Although they have the words, "lifetime benefit" written on their benefit books, we have not yet been able to get an assurance from the Secretary of State that the benefit will be for life.

A moratorium is needed to give the Government time fully to revisit the way the project works. When disability groups visited the Department last September, at the Secretary of State's invitation, to discuss the benefit integrity project, they thought that they would have an input into how the policy would be implemented. Instead, they found that the project was already under way. Although they had a great deal of expertise and advice to offer the Government, they were too late to make that vital input into the way the policy would be implemented.

I want to raise a few of the issues that worry people who are subject to scrutiny. It is a fact that people are entitled to see the original documentation that they filled in when they first made their claim. I advise all my constituents to ask for the necessary paperwork either to be sent to them or to be brought to their homes if they are to receive a home visit. To date, among those who have written to me expressing concern about the way their cases have been handled, I have yet to find one person who has been offered that documentation.

There should be an obligation on the Benefits Agency to ensure that people are aware of their rights so that they have the opportunity, in advance of an interview, to look at what they wrote when they filled in the original application form many years ago. They are not voluntarily being given that opportunity, and that is wrong.

The Secretary of State has now said that the decision on whether a benefit is to be taken away or reduced will not be made arbitrarily on the basis of information provided by the claimant but that there will need to be some further input. It has been suggested that general practitioners should have an input. I would not disagree with that, but it presents some problems.

People with very long-standing disability—such as those with chronic arthritis who, sadly, usually do not enjoy a significant increase in their mobility for the rest of their lives—may be seen by their general practitioner only occasionally. Very often, an occupational therapist is the person who can best identify the state of their mobility and what, practically, they can or cannot do. I hope that we shall not create an arbitrary system in which a GP who may occasionally see someone in a surgery for five minutes is asked to submit evidence when the most appropriate person to submit evidence is an occupational therapist who has a much closer working relationship with the claimant.

I have asked the Secretary of State—and have now received a written reply from Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency—about people who, since the project began, have lost the mobility component of their disability living allowance, which was often used to fund their agreement with Motability. To my certain knowledge—in my constituency—three people have had to return their car because they cannot afford to make the payment. According to Mr. Mathison, there will be no retrospective examination of the cases of those who have already been through what has been an absolutely harrowing experience.

Re-examining those cases would be a matter not only of restoring benefits, because some of the people involved have now had to take legal advice—adding to their anxieties—to try to restore their benefit. They will also have the problem of determining how to find a deposit for a car if their benefit is reinstated. I urge the Minister to deal, in his reply, with those very real practical problems.

If the Secretary of State has recognised that there are problems with how the integrity project is being conducted, she must surely accept the need to examine the cases of those who have lost benefit since the scheme began and to determine how they should be compensated, particularly when they have suffered the loss of a vehicle. Even if some of those people receive tomorrow the good news that the benefit is to be restored, it would be a very long time before they could save up a deposit to get another car. Such practical problems lead hon. Members on both sides of the House to ask the Minister yet again, please let us have a moratorium while these issues are sorted out.

The hon. Member for Moray mentioned training, which is critical. If the Secretary of State is now admitting that GPs and others with professional medical advice should have an input into dealing with these cases, surely it cannot be right that someone with absolutely no medical training—indeed, with only a few hours training on how to tick the boxes on a form—can go into someone's home and remove a benefit that is critical to their everyday well-being.

I welcome this debate and hope that it will give Ministers another opportunity to reconsider very genuine and reasonable requests from hon. Members on both sides of the House. The all-party disablement group heard at our most recent meeting with the Secretary of State that finalisation of the benefits review and of the benefit integrity project is unlikely for some months, which simply means that the agony will be prolonged for those who are waiting to discover whether they can retain their benefit.

We have asked for a moratorium not because we do not want to eliminate fraud—of course we do—but because the Government have gone helter-skelter down one path with one objective. There must be a balancing of fairness and justice for those who have already suffered great pain and mental anguish about how the project has been conducted and for those who are waiting for their turn.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): There are several reasons why I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to speak in this debate: because my constituency has a higher than average number of disabled and elderly people; because of the concentration of benefit offices in and around my constituency, including the disability living allowance offices at Warbreck house, which have already been mentioned in the debate; and because of the number of complaints that I—like many hon. Members—have received in my surgery about the operation of the benefit integrity project.

I feel as though I have a two-way mirror on the project's operation. Like many hon. Members, I see its impact on recipients, who may have lost benefit or had it reduced, but I also see it also through the eyes of many of my constituents who are employees at the disability living allowance offices. It is important that tribute is paid to their hard work and dedication—often in very difficult circumstances, as hon. Members have said. I would not wish this debate or subsequent debates to turn into a Department of Social Security staff-bashing exercise, but significant aspects of the project's operation give me great concern.

The principles behind the review are unimpeachable. Who could be for fraud or against the incorrect awarding of benefits? I should, however, remind the House—as others have already—that Baroness Hollis said that the benefit integrity project has so far uncovered negligible evidence of fraud in DLA claims, yet benefits have been cut or reduced in between 15 and 18 per cent. of the cases that have been examined, eventually resulting, we are told, in cuts or reductions in 34,000 of the 400,000 cases that will be examined. The figures are startling and it is perfectly reasonable that we should more carefully examine the project's operation.

I do not want to repeat what hon. Members have already said, but the project has training deficiencies, particularly for adjudication officers, who often have to make critical decisions based on second-hand information. Moreover, the forms are complex, amount to 30 pages and often pose a significant barrier for the people who fill them out, whether the visitor or the claimant—who may well be elderly and possibly confused. The forms complicate the task of obtaining correct information.

We must also examine the project's mechanisms. I can cite a specific example because my mother—who receives disability benefit because of osteoporosis—was visited by a project member. Although I was not there, I have been told that the visit went smoothly and was conducted courteously. However, as appeals have shown, something goes wrong in a significant minority of cases.

The chief executive of the Benefits Agency has been anxious to reassure hon. Members about problems with the project. On 4 January 1998, in a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), he soothingly wrote:

"The onus for providing this evidence"— on DLA—

"lies with the customer. There has been a move away from the reliance on a medical assessment and more emphasis is placed upon a person's day to day care and mobility needs. The customer is considered best placed to know the practical effects of the disability."—[Official Report, 5 February 1998; Vol. 305, c. 798.]

One might think that that is all very soothing and sensible but the reality is often different.

Many disabled people's—especially older disabled people's—pride sometimes leads them to understate, or at least to give an optimistic assessment of, their condition on a particular day, leading to an understatement of their condition on the forms. The Minister and his team should urgently examine that matter.

All hon. Members can cite specific examples from their constituencies; I should like to give only one. Since 1978, a lady in my constituency has received the higher rate mobility and care components of DLA because of serious problems, including osteoarthritis and a prolapsed disc for which she is receiving treatment at Victoria hospital, Blackpool and which entails a need for virtually full-time care.

After a home visit by the Benefits Agency in November 1997, a decision was made to award a low rate mobility component and a nil care component. That decision was made despite the fact that the lady's condition had worsened since 1994, as demonstrated by installation of a chairlift and a bedlift and by provision, by Lancashire county council social services, of weekly help.

There is an appeals process, but it is often extremely lengthy. Another constituent, who was deprived of disability living allowance, had to wait in the region of 11 months after two postponements of appeal. The appeal itself is something of a lottery and depends on a claimant's access to welfare rights advice. Furthermore, the training and composition of the tribunals is something on which the Government might have cause to reflect.

I welcome the safeguards that the Secretary of State announced to improve the accuracy of any decision on entitlement, although I note that in answer to a written question from the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on 2 March, it was emphasised that it was not to be retrospective.

It is incumbent on us to remind ourselves why the DLA was needed. It was needed because of pressures on community care and cuts to the budget, to which the Royal National Institute for the Blind and other groups have referred, and because of the gross underclaiming of benefit in the 1980s. It is important that we do not believe that there is an enormous problem because of gross exaggeration. There may be exaggerations, but, as I said, there is limited evidence of fraud.

Ministers need to be extremely cautious about the progress of this project. Hon. Members should bear in mind the Child Support Agency fiasco. It was set up with the best intentions, but, far from catching the malingerers, it has often snared the innocent and, for that matter, the conscientious in its zeal to meet targets. Our welfare review may not be cuts driven, so it is rather rich of Opposition Members to remind us of the problems involved in this project when they were instrumental in putting it in place, but we should nevertheless have examined a little more carefully the bill of sale that we inherited from the previous Government. Perhaps we should have looked a little more closely at the country of origin before proceeding with the project quite so enthusiastically.

I urge the Government to review the project with the optimum care. I leave it to them to decide whether a moratorium is appropriate, but I warn Ministers that we are engaged in a very complex and delicate assessment of welfare reform. Our cuts may not be Treasury driven, unlike those of the Opposition, but it is extremely important that the wells of welfare reform are not polluted by a project that has been capricious in its operation and questionable in a significant minority of cases.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): Like other hon. Members, I welcome the opportunity to debate such an important issue. All of us who hold regular surgeries recognise that there is great concern among disabled people. As my party's spokesman on disability, I have spoken to many people involved with this matter and I know that there is also great concern among the charities working in this sector.

I agree with the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) that we have the beginnings of the type of fiasco that we experienced with the Child Support Agency. As the number of appeals increase, and as the delays in managing those appeals grow, I am beginning to realise that unless the Government do more than simply tweak the issue, we shall have another CSA-type crisis on our hands. Having said that, the debate so far has been constructive, and I will make some suggestions about how the crisis can be solved.

I begin by welcoming the announcements that the Secretary of State has made over the past couple of months to the effect that she has recognised the need for a review. The letter that hon. Members received this week is certainly welcome. The Secretary of State tells us that the benefit integrity project is not and that clarification is certainly welcome. We are also told that fraud is not rife in disability living allowance claims—something which many of us knew, although it is nice to have it in writing. The letter also states that the Government want to listen to the experiences of claimants. Many in this sector have been concerned that the Government were not listening, so we welcome unreservedly the Secretary of State's announcements in that respect. However, they do not go far enough.

At the moment, the Government are just tweaking at the edges of the project, but I believe that it needs to be halted. If the project continues as it is, it will end in a mire of inefficiency and injustice. The tragedy is that the BIP is undermining much of the good work that the Government are beginning to do elsewhere in the disability sector. It is creating a sense of mistrust.

I will draw the House's attention to four key areas of concern with the project. The first relates to the title itself. The name "benefit integrity project" implies a lack of integrity among claimants. This is not just window-dressing; there is a genuine concern that the thrust of the title is disrespectful to the people being reviewed. Clearly, disabled people want forms to ensure that there is value for money and that fraud is squeezed, but they are outraged by some of the labelling in the right-wing press which suggests that they are cheats. The very title of the project itself fuels that suspicion.

Secondly, the project is not being handled with the sensitivity that I am sure the Government wish. The level of errors within the project is alarming. I have had evidence of amputees being asked whether their condition has improved, as if the missing limb had grown back but they were keeping quiet about it. As of mid-February, the Department's own figures show that more than 400 severely disabled people, including 30 who are terminally ill, have been asked to take part in the project although they are clearly members of the groups that should never have been approached to do so.

The third concern relates to mobility. As the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) rightly pointed out, people who lose their car if the benefit is cut have major problems replacing it if their appeals are successful. However, it is not only the finding of a deposit that causes difficulties. There are two other factors that the Minister needs to bear in mind. People who are successful on appeal and get a car back have to spend considerable sums on it because they get a new car that needs to be adapted for their disability. In addition, they cannot claim back the costs of being housebound or of having to find other forms of transport while they were without a car.

Fourthly, the complexity of the forms also causes concern. I know that there have been moves to deal with this matter, but the forms are still too complicated. Indeed, the chief executive of RADAR—the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation—told me yesterday that it took him a whole weekend to fill out his own DLA form even though he understands the system and is used to filling out forms.

How can the Government restore confidence? I believe that the Secretary of State wishes to do that, and it is interesting that in her letter to hon. Members this week, she said three times, I think, that she was looking for suggestions about the way forward. We welcome that. I have some suggestions to get the project back on track.

As other hon. Members have suggested, we need to abandon the project as it stands. We then need to put in place a system of consulting disablement groups and disabled people on what they would like in place of the review. If the Government consulted those organisations, they would find widespread acceptance of the need for some form of review, but disability groups wish to have a say about how it is carried out. As I said, a good starting point to rebuild confidence would be a more neutral title. Disabled people have won the right to more respect than the term "benefit integrity project" implies.

One of the problems with the project is that it seeks to do two things at once—to tackle fraud and to review benefits. However, it has failed to do either. Any new system should formally separate measures to combat fraud and error and measures to introduce a review of benefits. It must be possible in a new system to deal with fraud and value-for-money issues via a separate fraud unit or an efficiency drive that does not involve every interview with disabled people being fraud driven. Once we have removed the fraud and value-for-money aspect from the review process, we can set up a separate new system for reviewing benefits with a new and positive aim behind it. It should be an on-going system, not a one-off project that few claimants find easy to accept or understand. It should review benefits constantly and have a new thrust behind it.

Currently, we have a wasted opportunity. Interviews are taking place up and down the country at great cost to the taxpayer, yet they could achieve so much more. It is an opportunity to sit down with disabled people and talk about a range of issues. That is happening now, while other agencies are doing the same. It is crazy for a disabled person to be assessed three or four times for different purposes by different agencies. Streamlining that under a new review system would be a great benefit.

Any new system should ensure that reviews are conducted to ensure that people receive their full entitlement. They should not be focused, as they are currently, on the recipients of higher-level benefits. By focusing on those receiving higher benefits, one invites the assumption that benefits are likely to be adjusted downwards.

The boundary between review and advice should be shifted in the direction of advice. Reviews should be tailored much more closely to individual needs. We know that some conditions—amputations, polio and loss of vision—are not likely to improve, so the people affected do not need such frequent reviews.

Another way in which to restore confidence in the system would be to give claimants a clear date on which their benefit will be reviewed when they are first awarded a benefit entitlement. That would overcome the problem of someone who believes they have a benefit for life finding out later that it is subject to review.

The groups to whom I have spoken in the disability sector have made clear to me and, I believe, to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, the grief and anxiety being caused by the current process. I have heard of charities setting up helplines where staff have been talking to many callers who are often in tears. Staff go home at the end of the day shattered by the experience. It need not be like that.

Confidence in the Government's approach to welfare reform is, sadly, at an all-time low and confidence among disabled people in the benefits system is being shattered by this process. I believe that the Government can start to correct the problem today by announcing that they will halt the benefit integrity project. There is still time to do that. The project has years left to run and it is not too late to close a chapter on what was, after all, a failed Tory project in the first place. I urge the Government to recreate something positive by consulting disabled people. They should announce today an end to the benefit integrity project.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): I welcome this timely debate introduced by the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing).

Disability living allowance is an important benefit which is needed and valued by millions of disabled people. It provides direct help to individuals to meet their care and mobility needs. We have heard that it is a complicated benefit to assess because it is based on self-assessment, not of medical evidence of disability, but of people's needs for care and mobility. We know that the system is not working well now.

As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I received a report from the National Audit Office which pointed out that there were incorrect assessments of DLA to the tune of an estimated £499 million. The report also said—this is a little-known figure—that there could be potential underpayments of DLA of £227 million because claimants were understating their needs. We are seeing error on both sides of the argument. That being so, the Benefits Agency is not getting it right first time, on time, every time as it is intended to do. Clearly, there is a problem about the operation of DLA that needs to be addressed.

The benefit integrity project was designed to try to deal with some of those errors. It is a project which we inherited from the previous Administration and, from the outset, as other hon. Members have pointed out, there was no effort to provide the quality training and support necessary for the staff carrying out the assessments.

My consultations with local groups, such as Corby Council for the Disabled and the East-Northamptonshire Council for All Disabilities, have shown that things are not working well either in the original award of the allowance or in the way in which the benefit integrity project is working. It is unhelpful that people who are undergoing an individual process of review and are distressed by that are also picking up a negative feeling about the Government's review of the welfare state. It is not helpful to taxpayers or claimants who need a welfare state to work effectively and efficiently in everybody's interests.

Although today's debate has been broadly constructive, we have heard from Opposition Members about people living in fear of a knock on the door in the night. That is at best unhelpful and at worst, is scaremongering by Opposition Members when the Government are making genuine efforts to put right the mess created by the same hon. Members.

There have been calls for the benefit integrity project to be suspended or abandoned, or for the setting up of a moratorium. I strongly advise my hon. Friend the Minister not to go down that route. What would we say to the 1,300 people who have had their benefits increased as a result of the project? We would have to say, "Sorry, you cannot have that increase." What would we say to the thousands of people represented by the estimated £227 million of underpayment? We would have to say, "Sorry, but there is no chance of having your benefit upgraded despite the fact that the DLA you have been awarded is wrong."

To abandon the project now, which was the request of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), would be to abandon those people who have not received the payments to which they were entitled, and I strongly advise against it.

We have heard a number of constructive proposals about how the project could be improved to ensure that people receive the benefits to which they are entitled and that we have a system that works in the interests of disabled people. I should like to hear some reassurance from the Minister that the conditions of entitlement to disability living allowance have not changed and that the benefit integrity project is not a cuts-led exercise, but is designed to get the right benefit to the right people. I want to know that, in future, disabled people will be treated properly and fairly, that the project will be put on a sound footing and that it will be carried out sensitively, with full and proper concern for each individual affected by it.

I welcome the new safeguards that have been introduced. I hope that we can see some real benefits—excuse the pun—coming through so that there is less error in the project and so that more people get the benefits to which they are entitled.

I should like to hear from the Minister some reassurance that consultation with disability groups is taking place at national as well as local level. Working in partnership with disabled people and with the groups and organisations that represent them is a good way in which to work.

Mr. Burns: I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's point about consultation. Does he believe that many of the problems we have seen over the past six months would have been avoided if, in September last year, when the disabled groups were summoned to the Department of Social Security, it had been for a consultation—that is what they thought it would be—rather than simply to be told by the Government what was happening, and what would continue to happen?

Mr. Hope: No. The problems that we have seen over the past six months would have been dealt with if the original project had not been established by a Conservative Administration, without proper training or resources, and without any partnership or involvement with disabled people.

The reassurances from the Minister will be important for hon. Members, for disabled people and for the organisations that represent them. They will show that the Government are putting the project back on track after inheriting such a mess. Disabled people and their organisations want to know that the Government will be true to their pledge of wanting to see justice and equality for disabled people in this country.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): Like other speakers, I welcome this timely debate and congratulate the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on having introduced a debate on such an important subject. Its importance is shown by the number of hon. Members who want to speak in recognition of the many complaints about the operation of the benefit integrity project that have been communicated to us via our postbags and constituency surgeries.

I should correct the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope), who made a disappointing and unfortunate speech. Although the initial sampling exercise in the review of disability living allowance was carried out under the previous Government, and the decision was taken to go ahead with the benefit integrity project as a result of that evidence, the project has been carried out by the current Government and the operation of the project is their responsibility. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman dismissed the valid point made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns)—that if the Government had consulted with disability organisations prior to carrying out the project, the results might have been very different.

Disability organisations are as keen as all of us to ensure first, that there is no fraud in the system and secondly, that people are paid the correct amount of benefit. As the hon. Member for Corby pointed out, some people are receiving less benefit than they are entitled to receive. We all accept that people should receive the correct level of benefit, and the disability organisations would be keen to work with the Government to ensure that the methodology used in the benefit integrity project will work properly. Those organisations know best what will work and how the system should operate.

It is important to point out to the hon. Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) and for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden), who commented on whether the current welfare reform was a cuts exercise, that one of the problems with the way in which the benefit integrity project is operating is that people with disabilities are made anxious on two scores. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) said, they are anxious about the possible knock on the door in connection with the project. Secondly, that feeling occurs against a background of general concern about what is to happen to disability benefits. That is a double whammy which makes people with disabilities feel great concern about their future benefits.

I mentioned the sampling exercise carried out under the previous Government which led to the estimate that incorrect overpayments were being made of slightly less than £500 million. I understand that current evidence indicates that that figure is an overstatement and I should be grateful if the Minister could confirm whether that is true. I should also be grateful if the Minister could respond to several issues that have been raised by hon. Members today and by the all-party disablement group in its two meetings with the Secretary of State for Social Security. I was part of the group's delegation on both occasions.

Our first concern relates to those who have their benefit reduced or removed and who then appeal, and the question of what happens to them while their appeal is in process. Several hon. Members have commented on the fact that the appeal process is lengthy and on the difficulties that people suffer while going through that process. The all-party disablement group requested that the rules should be changed so that claimants can retain their previous benefits until their appeal is heard, thereby preventing the hardship that occasionally results under the current rules. We also raised the question of the operation of the mobility component and the implications for those who have cars under the Motability scheme. I should be grateful if the Minister could respond on those points.

[Mrs. Theresa May]

The Secretary of State indicated a willingness to have exemptions listed on the covering letter, with a box that could be ticked by anyone who fell into one of the exempted categories so that the papers could be returned immediately. I should be grateful if the Minister could confirm that that idea is to be put into practice. The all-party disablement group also raised with the Secretary of State the possibility of what was described as a "health warning" being attached to the covering letter, so that those who are completing the form are fully aware of the implications of doing so. The hon. Member for Blackpool, South referred to the pride that many people with disabilities feel and their desire to overstate their abilities on the form, but they must understand the implications and recognise that doing so may lead to their benefit being cut. The provision of a health warning would enable them to see the matter in an entirely different light.

A number of hon. Members have mentioned fraud, and I hope that we can get an unequivocal statement on that from the Minister today. There is real concern that several statements have given the public the impression, first, that the benefit integrity project is entirely about fraud and, secondly, that vast numbers of people are falsely claiming to be disabled, purely to get disability benefit. I hope that the Minister will give a categorical and unequivocal statement today that that is not the case, and that all the evidence that the Government have shows that the level of fraud is actually extremely low.

In the letter from the Secretary of State dated 2 March, which most of us received shortly before the debate started, she states:

"Of the 40,000 or so cases examined up to the end of last year, around 9,000 people have had their entitlement adjusted."

As I understand it, that covers both upward and downward adjustment. She continues:

"Some cases have been referred to the Benefit Fraud Investigation Service and around 40 are currently being investigated."

That is an extremely small figure. The evidence totally fails to support the impression that has been given in several statements that many people are fraudulently claiming disability living allowance, and it is imperative that a clear statement is made in the House today. We are concerned about the mechanism whereby the benefit integrity project operates, which is leading to cases of real hardship among people with disabilities who have had their benefit reduced or removed. Our concern is not vast fraud within the system, and I hope that the Minister will respond positively to that point today.

When the all-party disablement group met the Secretary of State, we specifically asked her to consider suspending the benefit integrity project. The hon. Member for Corby should realise that it is not a question of preventing those who have so far been underclaiming and underpaid from getting the benefit to which they are entitled. The point is that the way in which the system is operating is causing real anxiety and real hardship, and it is necessary that the project should be suspended for a period so that its operation can be properly assessed. In today's debate, some excellent suggestions have been made about the way in which the project could be reformed to ensure that it operates fairly and justly. Part of that process should consist of consultation with disability organisations; they understand the problems and their input can ensure that the system works at grass-roots level.

Although the Secretary of State indicated to the all-party group that she would not suspend the project, it has been reported that the Prime Minister told the Disability Benefits Consortium that he would consider suspending it. I should be grateful if the Minister could tell us which of those positions the Government will take. I trust that they will suspend the project for a period so that an independent review can be carried out and the right systems put in place. In that way, we can be sure that people with disabilities will receive the benefits that they genuinely need.

12.8 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): I congratulate the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on securing this important debate, which has drawn together views, ideas, criticisms and comments from hon. Members on both sides. I hope that the Government will feel that the debate has been useful and helpful, as we try to sort out some of the problems that have emerged with the unit.

Comments from Labour Members, from my hon. Friends the Members for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) and for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), and from hon. Members from other parties have shown that there is considerable concern in many parts of the country about the effects of the project at the sharp end. The Government have not handled it in the best way possible. There is great confusion, fear and consternation among people with disabilities and the pressure groups representing them as a result of increasing uncertainty about the Government's intentions on disability benefits and the actions of the unit. If anything positive is to come from the debate, we should have assurances from the Government that those who rely on those vital benefits will not have them cut because of Treasury-imposed spending targets.

The operation of the benefit integrity project over the past nine months is a prime example of the Government's haphazard and unsatisfactory approach to the issue. Under the previous Government, expenditure on disability and sickness benefits increased dramatically over 10 years from £7 billion a year to £20 billion. In 1992, the categories of people who could claim disability benefits were extended. The measure was accompanied by a successful publicity campaign, which increased people's awareness of the benefits to which they were entitled. Equally importantly, that was part of a process of trying to take away the stigma from claiming benefits—a problem which is particularly prevalent among the elderly and disabled people, who often do not claim the benefits to which they are entitled, out of pride or a feeling that they are begging for help. That is a misguided view. Politicians and others should do everything that they can do to remove that perceived stigma.

The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) seems to be unaware of the history of the unit. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead dealt with the point, but I should like to put the facts on record, because, as success has many fathers and failure is an orphan, they are being forgotten. The benefit integrity project was proposed by the previous Government, who set up a pilot survey, because it was crucial to ensure that the benefits system for disabled people was monitored and that the right benefits went to the right people. The results of that pilot survey came forward in January last year. The general election intervened before the unit, in its current modus operandi, was put into place. That modus operandi was established by the current Government, not the previous one. That should not be forgotten by a Government notorious for spinning whatever line they want to avoid responsibility for their failures.

Under the Labour Government, the benefit integrity project has been turned into a purely cost-cutting vehicle for reducing expenditure on disability living allowance. That becomes clearer after even a limited examination of the project, which is targeted only at those on the highest or middle rate of the care component of DLA and the higher rate of the mobility component. It is clear that, after examination by the project, those on the highest rates of the two components can only have their benefits reduced. There is no way in which they could be increased. Limiting the scope of the BIP to those categories illustrates that it is part of the Government's policy of trying to reduce the benefits bill.

The Government's approach to disability benefits is in keeping with their overall approach to other aspects of welfare reform. It has become increasingly clear in the past few months that the Department of Social Security is working to the agenda of the Treasury and the Chancellor, which is designed to save a war chest for the Government to spend in the run-up to the next general election. The Government pay lip service to the rhetoric of an intellectually based welfare review which will seek to address the long-term problems of an escalating welfare budget. However, all that we have seen over the past nine months is a salami-slicing exercise for benefits picked by the Treasury, which has been implemented by the Department of Social Security on the orders of the Treasury.

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burns: No. I do not have much time.

The benefit integrity project is not the only means that the Government have used to target people with disabilities for savings on the benefit bill. In November, various proposals were leaked to the press, including the taxing, means-testing and time-limiting of certain disability benefits. There was also a proposal that the DLA cash benefit might be exchanged for care services administered by local authorities. We all understand the seriousness of the implications of such policies for disability benefits, particularly the DLA and disability working allowance. The principle behind those benefits is to level the playing field for those with benefits and those without by meeting the additional expenditure caused by the extra needs of people with disabilities. Denying someone those benefits would put them at a disadvantage and would eliminate the level playing field that we should all be seeking to create.

The leaking of such proposals and the floating of such rumours has done nothing but harm. There is still a great deal of uncertainty surrounding the issue, which the Government are doing little to allay. Only last week in the Social Security Select Committee, the Secretary of State and the Minister for Welfare Reform were unable to confirm or deny stories about the means-testing of DLA. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity of this debate to confirm whether the Government plan to means-test DLA.

The operation of the unit under the current Government has been geared towards saving money. That has been carried out in several ways. We are grateful for the Secretary of State's announcement on 9 February of changes to the existing system. We also appreciate the letter dated 2 March, which we got yesterday afternoon, which also recognises that there have been serious problems with the administration of the system. In an appendix, it lists extra ways in which the Government hope to safeguard the operation and the work of the existing unit. No doubt the Minister will elaborate further on the contents of the letter and the Government's proposals.

As many hon. Members have said, the problem is too confused and difficult for the Government to be able to carry on with a piecemeal approach, tacking proposals on at the edges of a system that they recognise is failing. We should suspend the activities of the unit until all the piecemeal proposals and changes have been announced, and a fundamental review of the system and the aims and aspirations of the unit can be thrashed out properly. We can then start again with a system that does not spread fear, confusion and anxiety, but is targeted at the realistic and right aim of ensuring that the process is being monitored and that those who are entitled to benefits get the right amounts of the right benefits. Even if the Minister is not able to give an answer during the debate, I urge him to give serious consideration to that proposal and make an announcement as soon as possible. He should not dismiss the idea out of hand.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): I welcome this opportunity to speak to the House about the benefit integrity project. I congratulate the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on obtaining this debate on a matter of wide public interest. I also congratulate her on setting a constructive and helpful tone, which has generally been followed for the past hour and a half.

I acknowledge that the benefit integrity project has been the subject of debate, controversy and concern, much of which has been reflected in speeches made from both sides of the House. I have had a great many requests to respond in my summing up to many specific issues. I shall not be able to do so in the time available, but I give an assurance that all issues raised about the delivery of the project will rightly be given careful consideration. In the time available, I will clarify the reasons for the benefit integrity project and, equally importantly, lay to rest many of the fears about its purpose and intent. I shall look at the experience of the project to date, and set out how the Government have responded and will respond to that experience.

First, and most importantly, I want, through this debate, to reassure disabled people. The benefit integrity project is simply about ensuring that disabled people receive the right amount of disability living allowance—the amount to which they are entitled. It is not an anti-fraud drive; it is not a cuts exercise by another name; it is not part of the Government's wider agenda of welfare reform, or a precursor of it. It is concerned with disabled people and their entitlement to benefit under rules that Parliament has laid down. No rules on the entitlement to DLA have been changed. The responsibility for decision making rests with the people who have always exercised that responsibility.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Will the Minister say why DLA has been singled out to be checked and clarified while other benefits have not? It leads to suspicion that the Government have some ulterior motive.

Mr. Denham: As I shall make clear, DLA has not been singled out in the process of action being taken on incorrectness and other problems in the Department of Social Security.

Guidance given to decision makers on the need to take into account all appropriate evidence remains unchanged. I want to reassure disabled people. We want to ensure that benefit payments are right. We want to act sensitively and we want people to have confidence in the actions taken as part of the project.

Why was the benefit integrity project initiated? I do not think that any Member would question the need to take action across all benefits to ensure that benefit payments are made to those—and only those—who have a legal entitlement to them. As the hon. Member for Moray said, we must, of course, recognise that even establishing that somebody is not entitled to benefit has an impact on their life, so the situation needs proper and sensitive treatment.

The previous Administration initiated a series of benefit reviews to establish the extent of error and fraud across all major benefits. In each benefit, the findings of the reviews have or will lead to appropriate changes in the way in which benefits are administered and entitlement is established. Disabled people and DLA recipients have not been singled out.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Denham: I will not give way because I have very limited time in which to answer at least some of the points raised.

The DLA benefit review was undertaken in 1996 and published in February 1997. It reported that 73 per cent. of people were receiving it at the correct rate at the time that they were visited, meaning that 27 per cent. of people were receiving DLA at an incorrect rate. Incorrectness may have arisen for a variety of reasons, and involved under-provision as well as overpayment. In line with other benefit reviews, the DLA review reported a headline estimate of fraud of 12.2 per cent. The sample was extrapolated to produce the estimate of fraud of about £499 million that has been used.

I should make it quite clear that it would be totally wrong to suggest that the majority of people receiving DLA are doing so fraudulently. There is absolutely no evidence to support that. I should go further. Although the benefit integrity project has broadly confirmed the level of incorrectness identified by the DLA benefit review, it has not sustained the suggested level of fraud. But—this is the critical point—even if the benefit review estimate of fraud can be debated, it none the less indicates a worrying level of incorrectness.

The benefit integrity project has broadly sustained the estimated level of incorrectness and has justified the decision to proceed with the project when we took office in May. I should make it clear that the BIP was already fully designed under the previous Administration—contrary to the history described by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns)—and we had to take some very early action to improve its design.

Hon. Members need to understand that the points that they raised about decision making relate not to the BIP, but to the fundamental nature of DLA as a benefit. It is a complex benefit. It is paid to provide help with the extra costs associated with a disabling condition. Entitlement is based on the effect of a disability, not purely on the fact that a person claiming benefit is disabled in some way. The same condition can, of course, affect individuals in very different ways. As part of the claiming process, we ask people to describe the effect of their disability on their daily life, and through an understanding of the need that they have for help with personal care and getting around, decisions are made about entitlement. The BIP uses the same process.

It is fundamental to the nature of DLA that we rely to a considerable degree—sometimes entirely—on the information that we ask people to provide about their daily lives. It is not easy for many people to describe accurately the precise levels of need which arise from their disability. That is not to say that people are setting out to mislead or exaggerate, although it is important that we recognise constraints in the assessment of DLA entitlement generally before we begin to look more closely at the operation of the benefit integrity project.

Mrs. Ewing rose—

Mr. Denham: I hope that I can make some progress because I have some important points to cover.

I have already mentioned the difficulties that disabled people may have in recognising when to let us know that their circumstances have changed. The focus of the benefit integrity project was dictated by the findings of the benefit review, and is focused on groups of recipients who are thought to be the least likely to contact the Department about change. The House will, of course, recognise that there is a strong incentive for people to let us know when their needs increase, but less so as needs decrease, and even less if it is unclear when they should take such action.

The project results so far have underlined the need for the exercise. Up to the end of January, 55,000 cases had been examined and more than 12,000 people had had their benefit changed. Almost 1,300 people have seen an increase in their award, while some 4,000 people have moved off benefit altogether. Of the 44,000-plus cases with an on-going award of benefit that have so far been examined, 16 per cent. have resulted in change to the benefit paid. Some 48 per cent. of awards in renewal claims are being changed. In total, the level of incorrectness found, at 21 per cent., is broadly in line with the level of incorrectness found in the review. I should stress again that the project is seeking to establish current entitlement against current rules. None of the rules has changed.

In seeking to reassure the House that there is a sound basis for the benefit integrity project—the integrity, of course, refers to the integrity of our system, not to the integrity of recipients—I do not want to give the impression that we are in any way complacent about the way in which the project is being carried out or the concerns of disabled people who receive DLA. It is essential that the project is carried out properly, sensitively and with full and proper concern for each individual disabled person who might be affected by it. Although I cannot comment on individual cases raised in the debate, I accept that we do not always get it right, despite our best intentions and—I genuinely believe—the best efforts of our staff to carry out their responsibilities properly and effectively.

From the outset, the Government have sought to address issues of concern, learn from the experience of the project and tackle problems that emerge. We are determined that disabled people should be dealt with properly and fairly, and that they should have sufficient information about what is required of them and the purpose of the exercise to allow them to provide the required level of information about the effect of their disability on their need for help with personal care and getting around. Most of all, we want the decisions that are made as a result of the project about benefit entitlement to be the right decisions.

When we inherited the project designed by the previous Administration, we discovered at the outset that no effort had been made to ensure that visiting officers had appropriate disability awareness training. The present Administration introduced that.

We have had several meetings at ministerial and official level to discuss the development of the project, and have recognised that some of the individuals contacted may not have understood the level of detail required about their daily lives. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security announced on 9 February that a new safeguard was being introduced. Details have been sent to hon. Members.

So far, we have kept the working of the project under constant review, and we shall continue to do so. We shall also continue to meet organisations of and for disabled people. It is important to understand that the project is about ensuring that disabled people receive the right amount of DLA—that to which they are entitled. I believe that the results so far endorse the need for the exercise, and that it would be difficult for us to stop taking action to secure the proper payment of benefits.

Irish People in Britain

12.30 pm

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): Astoundingly, this appears to be the first recorded debate in the history of the British Parliament specifically on the subject of the Irish community in Britain. That is all the more astounding because, as the House will be aware, Irish migration to Britain goes back as far as the first forays by Irish chieftains to Wales, during which they reputedly kidnapped a small boy who grew up to become our patron saint, Saint Patrick.

After the 12th century Anglo-Norman invasion of Ireland, emigration escalated, and by the 1600s there were sizeable Irish communities in most major cities. Some of that migration was the inevitable and natural movement of peoples, but certainly over the past two centuries the growth in the numbers of Irish people coming to Britain was overwhelmingly a direct result of the colonial exploitation of Ireland—a process which included discriminatory measures that suppressed and destroyed whole sections of Ireland's economic base.

Racism and discrimination are also tools of colonial oppression. The denigration of the Irish has been used not only to justify colonial invasion and occupation but to reinforce oppression. Liz Curtis's excellent book, "Nothing but the Same Old Story", charts the depiction of the Irish within British culture and the media as some brutish sub-species, from the earliest Norman tracts to the present-day Murdoch newspapers.

Over time, racism has been as effective a weapon of oppression as any sword or gun—more effective in some ways, because it is less overt and can even be internalised by the victims, undermining their feelings of self-worth.

Remarkably, however, until last year there had been no comprehensive investigation into discrimination experienced by the Irish community in Britain. Throughout the 1980s, a number of organisations, including the Federation of Irish Societies, the Irish in Britain Representation Group, the Action Group for Irish Youth and the Irish Women's Centre, campaigned to highlight the discrimination faced by the Irish in Britain.

Those organisations were joined by local authorities such as the Greater London council, Camden, Haringey and Lewisham, and the Association of London Authorities. To its credit, the Irish Post, under the editorship of Brendan McCluha and Donal Mooney, became the vehicle in which that anti-Irish racism was exposed.

The campaign culminated last year in the publication of an excellent and authoritative research project by Dr. Mary Hickman and Dr. Bronwen Walter, commissioned by the Commission for Racial Equality. The report examines the extent to which Irish people in Britain experience various forms of discrimination. I pay tribute to Herman Ouseley, the first chair of the CRE to take the issue of anti-Irish racism seriously.

To many, the results of the research project are startling. The researchers drew on the 1991 census data and consulted a wide range of organisations working within the Irish community. They also conducted a pilot survey among the Irish population in Britain. They catalogued the inequality that Irish people have experienced, and described finding in many people of Irish origin

"a powerful sense of hurt and unjustified exclusion from an equal place in British society."

The researchers demonstrated that

"deep seated Irish stereotypes affected many areas of the lives of Irish people, including workplaces, access to housing, treatment at benefits offices and interactions with neighbours and the police.

Drawing on the census data, the research confirmed that the Irish in Britain experience a range of social disadvantages compared with the white indigenous population.

The findings revealed that the Irish experience lower than average rates of upward social mobility, and that their housing provision is of significantly lower standard than that of the white population, with twice the level of overcrowding and the worst amenities of any major ethnic group.

Of all the ethnic minorities in Britain, the Irish have the poorest record of physical and mental health. That finding has been reinforced recently by a research report in the British Journal of Psychiatry that revealed that Irish men are the only migrant group whose life expectancy worsens on emigration to England. Those excessive mortality and morbidity rates persist into the British-born children of Irish migrants.

The research study's survey of Irish community groups and advice agencies consolidated the results extrapolated from the statistical data with the views of those working at the sharp end of dealing with the problems faced by the Irish community.

The survey exposed a widespread denial of specific Irish needs and a refusal by statutory bodies to include an Irish dimension in consultation on, and the planning of, service delivery, including community care plans and housing investment strategy. It depicted the stereotyped responses and comments by service providers that meant that Irish concerns were not taken seriously, and included reports of harassment ranging from violent physical attack on Irish individuals and organisations to the everyday occurrence of verbal abuse.

Regrettably, the survey also revealed an element of police harassment, sometimes triggered by the hearing of Irish accents of names, and often associated with the use of the prevention of terrorism Acts.

The research programme went on to survey a cross-section of the Irish population in Britain, and the researchers concluded:

"The most striking finding was the high levels of anti-Irish hostility routinely encountered by Irish people in Britain".

They revealed

"a catalogue of demeaning treatment which built into a cumulative picture of normal levels of harassment, punctuated by a number of more frightening and aggressive acts".

The survey showed that all aspects of Irish people's lives were affected by racism. That was manifested in many ways. For example, 25 per cent. reported negative responses from the police, ranging from verbal abuse to assault, 24 per cent. described discriminatory treatment at benefit offices, and 79 per cent. recorded that they were subjected to derogatory anti-Irish remarks, jokes and comments, which 70 per cent. of those surveyed found offensive.

Occasionally and increasingly, Irish people have resorted to legal action under the Race Relations Act 1976 to overcome racism and discrimination, and there is now a body of court and tribunal judgments against anti-Irish discriminatory practices. However, the survey found that the general response of Irish people when they encountered anti-Irish racism was to adopt a low profile or "heads down" approach.

That must not be the Government's response to the findings and recommendations of the research. We must develop a strategy that puts in place the policies, structures and resources that will enable us to take the first steps in eradicating anti-Irish racism in our community.

The CRE report and the contribution of many Irish community organisations to the debate has set a clear agenda for the Government, and for us all, to follow. The first step is to break through the barrier of the traditionally crude, "black and white", binary approach to tackling racism and discrimination in this country.

The debate about racism in Britain has been limited by the definition of ethnic status based on skin colour, and the belief that the white population is a homogeneous group. That denies the diversity of ethnic composition of the white population and the diversity of its cultural and historical roots.

The strong resistance, especially in central Government bureaucracies, in sections of local government and in Government-appointed agencies, to the acceptance of a distinctive Irish experience in Britain has meant that Irish needs are generally not accepted or specifically catered for.

If we accept that the Irish in Britain encounter particular problems and have specific needs, it follows that we can tackle those problems only if we have a sound body of information and research relating to the Irish experience in Britain. For that reason, I join with the organisations, including the CRE, that are pressing for the inclusion of an Irish category in ethnic monitoring systems and in the next census in 2001.

Unfortunately, the introduction of ethnic monitoring has been uneven across public bodies. It is vital, therefore, that the Government take the lead in insisting on the establishment of ethnic monitoring systems within all key areas of public service, and on the inclusion of an Irish ethnic category within those systems.

Given the deep-seated resistance of some public agencies to the very concept of anti-Irish racism, I do not believe that it can be left to individual Government Departments and agencies to decide on the principle or the practice of ethnic monitoring for the Irish in their respective spheres. Thus, I would urge the Government to co-ordinate the introduction of these systems, setting a definite pre-determined deadline for their implementation. That could be facilitated by the convening of a cross-departmental group, meeting representatives of the CRE and the major Irish representative community organisations to work through a programme for the common introduction of ethnic monitoring.

If we are to be a Government dedicated to providing equal opportunities to all in our community, we must ensure that the needs of the Irish are recognised in the development of our policies and the allocation of resources. That must include the firmer recognition of the housing needs of the Irish community by the provision within the housing association sector of a fairer allocation of resources to successful and effective housing associations, such as the Cara and Innisfree housing associations.

The strategy should also include greater support to the voluntary sector organisations and advice bodies that are struggling to work within the Irish community to provide culturally sensitive services and to develop self-help groups to tackle the problems faced by the Irish community.

If we are to tackle the disproportionate level of ill-health among the Irish in Britain, we need to ensure that resources are targeted to health authorities where there are concentrations of the Irish population. That would provide the basis for addressing the specific health needs of the Irish community, taking into account the particular problems identified recently among the elderly and the mental health problems of a migrant community. Integral to our approach to combating anti-Irish discrimination should be an exercise that provides training to staff involved in direct service delivery, raises consciousness on the issue among policymakers in all echelons of Government and develops that within other funding bodies.

Within the criminal justice system and police service, it is clear—regrettably—that some discriminatory attitudes remain to be changed and could be best addressed by training programmes, backed by performance monitoring. We do not want to repeat the cases of the Guildford Four and the Birmingham Six, but there are other cases outstanding that need to be tackled in the near future. I name Frank Johnson as one such case in which we must secure the release of an innocent person.

Change will not be effected unless structures are established to co-ordinate implementation. For that reason, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the establishment of a cross-departmental ministerial group to take forward a programme of policies aimed at addressing the needs of the Irish community and, alongside that, to set up a consultative forum between Irish community organisations and the Government.

I also recommend that close liaison takes place with the Irish Government, especially on issues such as mobility between Britain and Ireland and enabling housing transfer and exchange for many who may wish to return home on retirement or simply to be nearer their family. Such dialogue has commenced, but it may need resourcing to ensure its effectiveness.

Parliamentarians can also play a part in progress chasing the implementation of the Government's policy and overall programme, and in voicing the concerns and aspirations of the Irish community. To facilitate this role, I intend to seek support for the formation of an all-party parliamentary group devoted to representing the interests of the Irish community in Britain and to serving as a channel for the Irish community to voice its concerns to Parliament.

The Irish have made their contribution to British society over centuries. They have—literally—physically constructed Britain's infrastructure. They have served in every walk of life, but have made a special contribution to our health and education services.

The Irish have made eloquent contributions to our artistic and cultural lives—ranging from Oscar Wilde, Bernard Shaw and James Joyce to the brilliance of today's poets and writers, such as Seamus Heaney, Edna O'Brien and Ronan Bennett. In theatre, film and dance, we have recently been inspired by an Irish renaissance.

In politics, Irish leaders such as Bronterre O'Brien and Fergus O'Connor were the foundation stones of the modern Labour and trade union movement. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and others in the Chamber today who, at some personal cost, have faithfully represented the interests of the Irish in Britain over the years.

In return for the contribution that the Irish have made to this country, the Irish community at least deserves the right to live free from discrimination and in equality and respect. As a Labour Government, we must dedicate ourselves to securing this basic human right and to that end I pledge my support. I urge the Government to implement the recommendations of the CRE report, to establish structures for consultation and dialogue and to go forward to eliminate anti-Irish discrimination as a scourge within our community.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell) on securing this important debate on the Irish in Britain. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) is in the Chamber, and he and most of us in the north-west know of the considerable historical links between our constituencies and constituents and Ireland. Clearly, that has an impact on our feelings when we come to the subject.

We have heard about some of the problems that the Irish can encounter in this country. I will speak about those in a few moments. I would like to begin where my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington ended—by paying tribute to the successes of the Irish in Britain. The Government fully recognise the contribution that people of Irish origin have made to British society. Over the centuries, they have become an integral and essential part of our national life, and their achievements are visible in many walks of life.

Only last week, we read of the BMRB/Irish Post survey—to which my hon. Friend referred—which confirmed the successes of many Irish people in our society. It overturned some traditional stereotypes and painted a different, up-to-date picture of skilled, well-educated people coming to Britain to add their expertise to the economy. It suggested that one fifth of people born in Britain have a family member from Ireland, either directly or through marriage. A book detailing the 150 most successful Irish people in Britain was also recently launched. Clearly, the Irish influence in Britain is flourishing—something which I personally welcome.

My hon. Friend talked about the concerns of the Irish community, and the record of achievement and integration should not blind us to the problems that he raised. The Government are not complacent. While the very many successes are gratifying, they are no excuse for not paying attention to other real concerns.

[Mr. George Howarth]

The debate follows a report produced by the Commission for Racial Equality in June last year, entitled "Discrimination and the Irish". My hon. Friend dealt with that in some detail. When the report was launched, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary took the opportunity to congratulate the CRE on its efforts to raise awareness of the position of the Irish in Britain, and to welcome the research.

The report concluded that there was a lack of acknowledgement of Irish needs and rights, and that discrimination and disadvantage existed. A list of recommendations for action was produced, and my hon. Friend referred to many of those recommendations. The Government recognise that these problems exist and have taken them seriously across Whitehall.

Improving community relations and equality of opportunity is high on the Government's agenda. We are committed to tackling the problems of racism and discrimination—to creating a society in which everyone, regardless of background, colour or creed, has equal rights, responsibilities and opportunities. This is a policy of inclusion, not exclusion. We take seriously the concerns of every section of our society.

It should be re-emphasised today that Irish people already receive protection under current legislation. The Race Relations Act 1976 covers discrimination against anyone on grounds of colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins. The Act makes racial discrimination generally unlawful in the areas of employment and education, and in the provision of goods, facilities and services.

The Act has been an important tool in combating discrimination. It is now over 20 years since it was introduced, yet racial discrimination and hostility still exist. We intend to ensure that the legislation in this area is adequate to protect ethnic minorities and that it keeps pace with changes in our society. A number of organisations, principally the CRE, have put proposals to us for amending the Act; we are now looking carefully at those proposals. We need to ensure that all sections of the community can live their lives free from discrimination.

Measures to tackle racial violence and harassment are also contained in the Crime and Disorder Bill. We do not underestimate the harmful effect that such crime has on the victim, and the wider damage it can do to the trust and confidence that have built up between our communities. The creation of specific offences will send out a strong message that racial violence and harassment is unacceptable.

The Irish community will reap the benefits of a renewed emphasis on equality of opportunity across the board. We recognise that it has particular concerns—Ministers across Government have met representatives of the community to hear those concerns at first hand. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), has discussed the concerns with the Irish ambassador and with representatives from a wide range of Irish organisations.

The Federation of Irish Societies has met Ministers and officials at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and officials at the Office of National Statistics. The Department of Health is meeting Irish voluntary organisations to establish how it can support them in developing work on the health of Irish communities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington mentioned benefits. One of the initiatives that has been taken is that the Benefits Agency has held Irish-awareness programmes in targeted offices. We hope that the difficulties to which he referred will be dealt with at that level.

My hon. Friend also expressed concern about housing. My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing has met a delegation of the Federation of Irish Societies to discuss its concerns. The Housing Corporation has set up a black and minority ethnic advisory group and although the Irish are not listed in the group's title, their concerns are included—indeed, the chief executive of the Irish Innisfree housing association is a member of the group. I am pleased to say that its work is under way. My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing has asked the Housing Corporation to draw up a revised black and minority ethnic strategy, which will shortly be published for consultation.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): What my hon. Friend the Minister says is important, but we do not have the bare, raw statistics. Can he say whether the next census will include a specific Irish category? That is the key to progress, which will otherwise be haphazard, valuable and welcome though it is.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend raises an important issue, which I shall deal with in a moment.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary intends to create a new race relations forum, which will be at the very heart of Government. In keeping with the Government's practices, it will include new voices and provide new solutions. Individual membership has yet to be decided, but I can confirm that it will include a member from the Irish community.

The forum will be part of the overall development of a community relations strategy that has been instigated by the Home Secretary and is being developed by the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire. We are determined to take those responsibilities seriously.

My hon. Friends the Members for Hayes and Harlington and for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) both mentioned ethnic monitoring. I do not have time to talk in detail about all the issues that the CRE report highlighted, but I shall deal with the census and statistics. Ethnic monitoring and a separate Irish category in the 2001 census is a major concern of the report. We are aware of that concern from our meetings with representative groups.

The Registrars-General for England and Wales, for Scotland and for Northern Ireland are responsible for consulting census users in Government Departments, local and health authorities, academia and the private sector about their requirements for information from the next census of population and housing, which is planned to take place in 2001. The objective is to reach agreement on the questions that will be included in the census. Users have expressed strong support for the inclusion of a question about ethnicity, and for statistics that are, as far as possible, comparable to those produced from the 1991 census. A number of users support the inclusion of a separate Irish category.

The census offices are conducting an extensive programme of testing possible questions for the 2001 census, including ethnic questions incorporating an Irish category. They will shortly draw together the results of that programme, and assess customer requirements in preparation for finalising the questions that will be included. The Government's proposals for the 2001 census will be published in a White Paper in the autumn.

In making the final selection of questions, the Government will consider not only the strength of users' needs for information, but the acceptability of questions to the general public and the burdens placed on them in filling in the questionnaire. It is important that we consult people in local government, in health, in housing and in the private sector to assess the value of those questions. Part of the concern is that we are able to measure the success of policies that are targeted to deal with the inequalities highlighted in the report.

It is also important that we are as inclusive as possible. The proposal for the inclusion of an Irish representative on the forum takes into account the concerns expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Hayes and Harlington and for Hull, North, which I entirely appreciate.

Mr. McNamara: One of the most important strands of the current three-strand talks is the one dealing with the east-west relationship between Westminster and Dublin. Can my hon. Friend give any indication of the state of relations between the two Governments over the important question of the fate of Irish immigrants to Britain and of British people residing in the island of Ireland? After meetings between the two Prime Ministers, statements about intergovernmental relations have been printed at the margins, but has the Home Office been involved in such discussions?

Mr. Howarth: It is important to be careful and measured in any response to the detail of the points that my hon. Friend raises, but I shall consider whether it would be appropriate to put into writing the particulars of some of the discussions. More positively, in the difficult negotiations on initiatives in Northern Ireland, there has been a strong understanding between the two Governments on how the process should be taken forward—relationships between the Governments are good.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The debate has focused on the Irish in Britain, but it has encompassed the question of the census. Will the census refer to the Irish in Scotland? Will the question on ethnicity extend to Northern Ireland, or will it apply only in Britain?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman raises a wider issue, which is not in the compass of this debate, although it would fall within our consideration of ethnic monitoring in the census. As I understand the matter, however, we are specifically dealing with people whose origin lies in the Republic of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting side issue, which may be considered in the consultations on the 2001 census.

Mr. McDonnell: In the discussions that have taken place so far, the question of ethnic status has covered everyone from the island of Ireland—it does not distinguish between people from the Six Counties and people from the Republic.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification.

The debate has done a great deal to remind us all of what has been achieved and what remains to be done. We will continue to consider carefully the concerns raised in the CRE report and elsewhere, and we will ensure that the Irish community has full access to the rights and opportunities that we will create for all our citizens.

This has been a useful debate and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington said, it was probably overdue. It certainly gives us all in Government much food for thought. There are still issues to be resolved, but we are engaging with those issues, and I hope that, in due course, improvements can be made.

Insulin-dependent Diabetics (Driving Restrictions)

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): This is a debate about improving road safety in the United Kingdom and in Europe. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions road strategy document, "Current Problems and Future Options", dated October 1997, states:

> "There is no evidence that medical unfitness plays a significant role in causing accidents; indeed, accidents with medical factors involved are too few to show up in any of the statistics that are collated."

Nevertheless, there is a suspicion that people with a medical condition such as diabetes are less safe behind the wheel than others.

That suspicion lies behind European Community directive 91/439, the origins of which are in discussions that took place in 1980. There have since been 18 years of medical advance and improvements to diabetic control that have dramatically reduced the complications of diabetes through the encouragement of better blood sugar control. The suspicion is outdated, and neither the European Union nor the United Kingdom Government can point to any statistical or actuarial evidence to support the concerns underlying the directive.

The Government's own assessment of the medical impact of drivers' medical conditions on the total road accident rates puts the issue into context. According to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, between April 1995 and March 1996 there were 163 notifications of collapse at the wheel, of which only 27 involved insulin-dependent diabetics.

Compare that with the 16,050 drink-driving accidents or the 31,050 accidents caused by driver fatigue. To follow the logic—if logic is the right word—should not we impose driving restrictions on anyone who drinks alcohol at any time or on everyone who at one time or another will suffer from fatigue?

I am not here to embarrass the Government or to score points. I want to help the Minister to find a way out that improves road safety while being fair to those individuals who are insulin-dependent diabetics and can prove their fitness to drive. I declare an interest, in that I am an insulin-dependent diabetic. The DVLA has yet to write to me to impose its ban for the vehicles that I shall mention in a minute, but I also have an interest on behalf of constituents and others who have written to me on the issue.

The Government have introduced a blanket ban, preventing people with diabetes who inject insulin from driving vehicles in category C1, which covers cars weighing between 3.5 and 7.5 tonnes, and category D1, which covers vehicles with between nine and 16 seats. Those vehicles come under group 2, which is the category referred to in the directive.

The ban was not even required by the original EC directive, which clearly states:

> "In very exceptional cases may driving licences be issued to, or renewed for, applicants or drivers in group 2 suffering from diabetes and requiring insulin treatment, and then only where duly justified by authorised medical opinion and subject to regular medical check-ups."

Sadly, the Government have gone much further than the directive and introduced a policy that is not applied in other EU member states.

The Netherlands, for example, issues group 2 licences on an individual basis for one or three years, subject to independent medical examination. Finland and Sweden protect existing licence holders who use their licences as part of their employment, defining that as one of the directive's "exceptional circumstances".

According to the Danish Ministry of Transport executive order of March 1997, Denmark grants group 2 licences when a proper justified medical certificate is available, and provided that regular medical examination is carried out.

The Government have allowed discrepancies in the law in their interpretation of the directive. They allow people to drive vans, which are in category D1, on a voluntary basis but not professionally. That is surely proof that there was not sufficient evidence to introduce a complete ban. There was enough political pressure to protect voluntary drivers.

The Government have allowed the retention of licence rights to some drivers of even heavier vehicles, such as heavy goods vehicles, while preventing others from driving much lighter vehicles; they have allowed drivers from other EU states to come and drive over here in vehicles denied to United Kingdom drivers; and they have disregarded the rights of many drivers who have been driving for many years without any accidents or hypoglycaemic attacks at the wheel and who are now faced with unemployment without compensation.

People are already losing their jobs, and many more will follow as the DVLA notifies them of the ban. I have in my office a file of case studies from throughout the country. One concerns the BT engineer who will lose his job but will still be able to drive a minibus for cub scouts in his free time. Others concern employers who do not want to sack loyal, long-serving staff. I recently received a letter from an employer who asked:

> "Is there anything that can be done to help this very valuable, faithful, long-term friend and employee?"

The situation is ridiculous for a Government who promised to help people to move from welfare to work.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): Many hundreds, if not thousands, of people will be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue. Like him, I am an insulin-dependent diabetic. Tommy Wright, my constituent, is an HGV driver who became insulin dependent and lost his job. Because of his good record, the company kept him on to drive a minibus. Because of the blanket ban, he will now lose that job, even though he would be perfectly entitled to drive a minibus on a voluntary basis. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is totally unjust, and that the Government's blanket imposition of the ban is reprehensible?

Mr. Sanders: I agree entirely. I applaud the hon. Gentleman's work over the years on behalf of both insulin-dependent and non-insulin-dependent diabetics.

The situation is ridiculous. The Government promised to fight inequality in their new public health strategy and to tackle the problem of social exclusion, but this policy will have the opposite effect: it will drive people from work into welfare; encourage inequality; and lead to unemployment and further discrimination against, and social exclusion of, people with diabetes.

The Government say that they have taken the decision in the interests of road safety, on the advice of the honorary advisory panel on driving and diabetes, but that body is yet to reveal the sources of the information on which it based its decision; has not, to my knowledge, commissioned any review of the evidence; and did not even meet for four years, during the critical time when the previous Government were drafting the UK regulations.

In those years, new studies, from America and Denmark in particular, had not yet been published. The Federal Highway Administration evidence showed that the accident rate for diabetic drivers was lower than the United States national rate. In Denmark, a review of nearly 8,000 people with diabetes showed no increased risk of accidents, including road traffic accidents.

Surely the Government could consider more pressing and effective road safety measures rather than spending time discriminating against a small group that does not even figure in their own accident statistics and has been shown in some studies to be safer than other drivers on the road.

The new rules could compromise road safety rather than enhance it, because they will act as a disincentive to newly diagnosed diabetics to inform the DVLA of their condition. If the DVLA does not know about a person's diabetes, it cannot impose restrictions on his or her licence. The self-regulatory system has worked until now, with conditions being imposed on diabetic drivers of certain categories of vehicle, subject to medical tests. That regular assessment has undoubtedly led to poorly controlled diabetics being taken off the road. That may no longer be the case as a consequence of the legislation.

All we ask is that the Government listen to the medical evidence and instigate an urgent review. The insurance industry—not known for its altruism—has listened and does not impose higher premiums on insulin-dependent diabetic drivers. So, what would be the fairest way to protect the rights of drivers who are in complete control of their diabetic condition, while targeting the minority who are less well-controlled and who should be the target of legislation? It is possible to identify people with the highest risk of hypoglycaemia through three strong predictors: a history of unawareness; experience of frequent severe hypoglycaemia; and previous hypoglycaemic-related injury or accident.

The British Diabetic Association and I, along with the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) and my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand), recently presented a series of such proposals to the Minister. The association is also convening a group of medical experts to draft how a system of individual assessment might work, which will be presented to the Government and the honorary advisory panel on driving and diabetes. Its proposals already have the support of the Transport and General Workers Union, the United Road Transport Union, the Royal College of Nursing, the Employers Forum on Disability, the Drivers Action Movement, the Federation of Recruitment and Employment Services, Unison, the Road Haulage Association and the RAC.

That is by far the most sensible way forward. Can we have the Minister's assurance that individual assessment of fitness to drive is the fairest way forward and that the BDA's proposal will be seriously reviewed, in line with the evidence, by the Government in passing the law? Finally, will the Minister please say why individual assessment is not included in this legislation?

1.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): I thank the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) for affording the House the opportunity to discuss this extremely important issue. As he said in his opening remarks, it is essentially about road safety, although the main thrust of the hon. Gentleman's arguments has been driving restrictions for insulin-dependent diabetics and, as chair of the all-party parliamentary group for diabetes, the House would expect nothing less from him.

The Government are well aware, from representations from hon. Members, individual drivers and bodies such as the British Diabetic Association, of the strength of feeling among those who stand to lose their entitlement to drive medium-sized lorries and minibuses, particularly when they drive such vehicles for a living. We do not underestimate the consequences for those drivers and have every sympathy with their situation.

Of course, it is the duty of the Government to listen to all concerns and to consider all the implications. As the hon. Member for Torbay said, on 12 February my noble Friend the Baroness Hayman met representatives of the British Diabetic Association with him, my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand). Indeed, in an intervention my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire raised the case of one of his constituents and how the restriction is impacting on his life.

However, it is also the duty of the Government to take account of the wider interests of road safety and to make clear decisions, even if those decisions may sometimes have unwelcome consequences for some. It has been said that the change in the law that prompted these concerns is not based on well-founded evidence and that British drivers are being discriminated against compared with drivers from other European Union member states. Although I am sure that there is now general awareness of the effect of the new law, it would perhaps be helpful to say a few words about the background to the new requirements and explain how the change in legislation, which has been portrayed as being specifically directed against drivers with diabetes treated by insulin, has come into being.

For many years, the United Kingdom differed from the rest of Europe in that we had long-standing arrangements that allowed a person who passed a driving test in a car of any size to drive a wide range of vehicles, including lorries weighing up to 7.5 tonnes, category C1, and non-commercial passenger vehicles with up to 16 seats, category D1. If we were devising a new driving licence scheme for modern road, vehicle and traffic conditions, it is unlikely—probably unthinkable—that we would give entitlement to drive such a wide range of vehicles on the strength of a driving test that could be taken in the smallest car.

The second driving licence directive, which was adopted in 1991 and whose provisions the UK fully supports, requires anyone wishing to drive 3.5 to

[Ms Glenda Jackson]

7.5 tonne lorries or minibuses with 9 to 16 seats, to take separate driving tests and to meet the more stringent health requirements, which in the UK formerly applied only to drivers of large goods vehicles over 7.5 tonnes and buses and coaches. Given the size and weight of the vehicles in question, it is fair to say that those are sound and sensible requirements based on legitimate road safety interests. It is significant that during the consultations prior to implementation of the directive and in the period since it was implemented in the UK in January 1997, there have been almost no suggestions that anyone taking up driving for the first time should not have to comply with those requirements. Nor has the ban on people with certain medical conditions driving buses and lorries of over 7.5 tonnes and buses, which has applied for many years, been seriously questioned.

Also, if we were devising a driving licence scheme from the beginning, how would we decide which medical conditions should prevent a person from holding a licence or permit the driving of smaller vehicles yet preclude the driving of larger and heavier vehicles, bearing in mind the consequences if the person were involved in an accident? We would surely seek expert medical guidance on the risk associated with the particular medical condition. Assessment of medical evidence can be supported and supplemented by accident data, but lack of accident data should not invalidate the medical assessment.

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has a number of panels comprising experts in particular medical fields, which were set up to provide objective medical advice on the risk from driving by people with particular health conditions. One of those panels—the honorary advisory panel on driving and diabetes—has endorsed the decision that category C1 and D1 vehicles should be driven only by those who can meet the more stringent health requirements, which preclude among others insulin-treated diabetics. It would be irresponsible of the Government to ignore its advice.

Mr. Sanders: Can the Minister confirm that at the last meeting of the honorary advisory panel on driving and diabetes the majority of people on the panel were not medical experts but departmental officials?

Ms Jackson: I cannot confirm or deny that, but I will certainly inquire into the matter and respond to the hon. Gentleman by letter. As I have argued, it is unlikely that the Government would have taken any decision that was not based on objective, informed and particular medical advice.

We do not have comprehensive accident data that could alone support the medical assessment that insulin-treated diabetics should not drive the heavier, larger vehicles. That is because information on the medical circumstances of those involved in accidents is not routinely collected, nor would it be practicable to do so. However, there have been individual studies. It has been found that insulin-treated diabetes was responsible for 17 per cent. of 1,605 police-reported accidents involving collapse at the wheel in which the driver survived and was minimally injured to the point that driving could subsequently be resumed. DVLA records also identified 23 hypoglycaemia-related serious accidents from November 1997 to mid-February 1998. The hon. Member for Torbay contrasted those figures with those involving drink driving and driver fatigue. However, both of those conditions can and should be avoided. Collapse at the wheel due to hypoglycaemia, however, comes without warning.

Mr. Pickthall: May I point out to my hon. Friend that that is simply not true? Most diabetics get considerable warning of a hypoglycaemic attack. We are worried because the ban treats all insulin diabetics as if they were the same, which is not the case. Unlike other drivers, most of us have regular medicals, eye tests and check-ups. Insulin-dependent diabetics are often safer on the roads than other people.

Ms Jackson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, but I understand that the detailed and specific health checks to which he referred take place over three years. I apologise to the House if I have done so, but I do not believe that I said that all hypoglycaemic attacks that cause collapse come without warning. Attacks that occur without warning when a driver is at the wheel are the greatest cause for concern.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): What is the Minister's response to the telling point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) about the actuarial position taken by insurers? Insurance companies are not known for doing people favours and are happy to load premiums when they believe that there is a risk. The Government must be aware that insurance companies do not believe that insulin-dependent diabetics pose a significant risk. Is not that one of the best indicators that insulin-dependent diabetics do not pose a genuine risk?

Ms Jackson: It is worth repeating that accident statistics alone, on which actuarial tables are based, cannot be the deciding factor. The point at issue is whether people with a known medical condition that carries the risk of collapse at the wheel without warning should be permitted to drive vehicles that are of such weight and size that there could be serious consequences if they were involved in an accident. That assessment can be made only by those with the detailed medical knowledge to understand the implications and to look at the issue with detachment and objectivity.

For those reasons, we support the medical standards prescribed in the directive and the requirement that they should apply to drivers of vehicles weighing more than 3.5 tonnes or with more than eight passenger seats. Understandable concern has been provoked by the issue of whether those requirements should extend to drivers who already hold entitlements to drive such vehicles on the strength of the less stringent testing and health regime which, until the directive was implemented, applied in the United Kingdom. Is it reasonable for the Government to remove entitlements which, in many cases, have been held for years and, in some cases, are being used by drivers in their jobs? As I said during the debate on road safety in the House in January, it is better to err on the side of what some might call overcaution than to increase the risk of death and injury on our roads.

It has been said that the UK has implemented the directive over-zealously, and that that is not reflected in the approach taken by other member states. The directive prohibits the issuing or renewing of licences for the vehicles in question to those with diabetes treated by insulin other than in "very exceptional cases". The advisory panel has advised that there are no exceptional cases that medical opinion would recognise as being lower risk than others, and that, while modern treatments have improved the control of diabetes, they have not eliminated the possibility of a hypoglycaemic attack.

On the basis of that advice, we have decided against individual assessment of drivers—a point that the hon. Member for Torbay asked me to address—other than for the purposes of holding a licence to drive a car. Some member states may have provided for exemptions from that requirement, but only to a limited extent in most cases, and only for non-professional drivers. We do not know what expert advice those states took in making such arrangements, but it is right that we should take our own counsel.

The United Kingdom's enviable road safety record has largely been achieved by taking firm decisions.

Mrs. Jackie Ballard (Taunton): The hon. Lady says that the United Kingdom has an enviable road safety record. She talked earlier about increased risk. Does she agree that there will be no increased risk if current licence holders are not restricted? How could not imposing restrictions make our enviable record worse? I hope that she follows my argument.

Ms Jackson: I do, indeed, follow the argument, but our enviable road safety record is of no comfort to people who have lost children or family members in a road traffic accidents. Surely all Governments have the responsibility to try to improve our enviable road safety, and this Government are committed to doing so.

We do not underestimate the consequences for insulin-treated diabetics who drive these vehicles for a living, but the rules are based on medical advice that is generally accepted throughout the EU. I assure hon. Members that the rules will be kept under review, both by our medical advisers and through our representation on the EU committee set up to consider health requirements in the light of advances in scientific knowledge and treatment. Road safety will continue to underpin such consideration.

Green-belt Housing (Silsden)

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley): I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for making the time to reply to the debate.

I preface my remarks with a disclaimer: to put the record straight, I am not on the side of the hunting and gun lobbies which paid for and organised the demonstrations in London last Sunday. I have large rural areas in my constituency and, for the sake of my constituents, I wish that they had organised their march 18 years ago. They might have saved rural bus services from deregulation, and our farmers from the enormous problems of BSE, which were brought about by the deregulation of the preparation of animal foodstuffs. They might also have prevented the selling off of nearly all our once much-admired village council housing and the closure of village schools and other facilities. However, village schools in the Keighley area have survived due to the support of our local authority.

I shall discuss the question of the erosion of the green belt at Silsden. I hope that such erosion can be avoided.

Nearly three years ago, friends at Keighley asked me to let my name go forward to Keighley Labour party, which was in the process of selecting a parliamentary candidate. I was already aware that many people in Keighley were still struggling to come to terms with the fact that the Conservative Government of 1970-74 had pushed the old borough of Keighley, the urban districts of Silsden and Ilkley, and the rural district parishes of Steeton, Eastburn and Addingham into the Bradford metropolitan district council area.

For me, the bolt from the blue was the Bradford unitary development plan, especially the main point at issue: the allocation of a beautiful area of the Aire valley around Silsden for the building of about 1,500 houses. Straight away, I questioned the need for using such a massive amount of green belt. I was told by the chair of Bradford planning committee that the Conservative Government had put a great deal of pressure on the committee to make large amounts of land available for housing. The three Bradford constituencies were heavily built up and there was little room for development, so the committee had to consider Keighley and the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie).

I was regarded as a nuisance for raising the issue. It was explained that none of the councillors for the Keighley area, including Craven, which takes in Silsden, had made representations on the proposals. The majority of Keighley wards, five years ago, were represented by Conservative councillors. Most are now Labour, and their councillors take a view similar to mine on the erosion of the green belt and the use of green-field sites.

People in some political circles take the view that the pressure put on councils by the previous Government to release land in attractive rural areas was not completely detached from the generous contributions to the Conservative party by companies involved in housing development. I have been discussing and corresponding about the unitary development plan with Bradford council for three years. After the general election on 1 May, my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley and I took the matter up with the Department of the Environment,

[Mrs. Ann Cryer]

Transport and the Regions. They all tell me the same—that it is too late. The plan has been approved, and nothing can be done.

As Silsden is only one of the areas with whose allocation for housing I disagree, I realise that—along with the various action groups—I shall have a very busy time in the next few years arguing against developments as and when developers come along with their detailed plans. Although I am disappointed that our Government can do nothing to revise the UDP, I am encouraged by the possibility that my constituents and I will be helped by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister when we argue against individual developments.

The Secretary of State has said:

"We are resolute in our desire to avoid unnecessary encroachment into the countryside. The presumption against development in the green belt will remain as strong as ever. But this does not mean that there will never, ever be any building on green field sites."

I can accept the need for green-field sites in some areas to infill between already developed areas, but large encroachment on the green belt, as at Silsden, or removal of village green space—as the UDP proposes for Manor Garth, Addingham or Leeming at Oxenhope—is unacceptable if we are to retain our green and pleasant land.

The two developments on village green space were opposed by Bradford council, but the council was overruled by the inspector following an appeal by the landowners, one of whom has since sold his plot at an enhanced value.

I applaud the Secretary of State's comment:

"The vast majority of our people live in cities and towns. I want to see a renaissance of our cities. That will mean using existing empty houses, offices and warehouses for new affordable flats, not just for city yuppies."

The type of housing that will be attracted to the new UDP areas will not help my constituents who are living in overcrowded or sub-standard housing in the middle of Keighley. They would be helped if we could return to the system of many years ago, when local authorities could lend money for home improvements that would be repayable on the death of the owner and/or the sale of the house. That was particularly helpful to older people and poorer families who were unable to raise a second mortgage on their homes.

The proposed new developments are likely to be four-bedroom, two-garage detached houses that most of my constituents could not afford or even consider in their wildest dreams. They will be bought by well-paid professionals working in Leeds, Bradford or even Manchester. They will be dormitories, generating the sort of traffic and environmental problems that our Government are trying to plan against.

In an excellent edition of "Panorama" on 19 January, the Silsden town action group presented its arguments with clarity and intelligence. We saw the splendid Lister's, Manningham Mills, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh). Yes, it would take a great deal of money, imagination and enterprise to convert that memorial to West Yorkshire's magnificent industrial past into flats for people, but it could and should be done.

There are many smaller mills and warehouses in Keighley that could be converted. The once elegant but now rotting royal arcade was to be given new life by our local authority in a living-over-the-shop scheme—an idea that would not only breathe new life into the centre of Keighley, but combat crime and vandalism. I hope that problems with the owners of the arcade will eventually be overcome, and that the scheme will reach fruition.

A few months ago, I was shown derelict but still sound warehousing on various stretches of the Leeds-Liverpool canal. Some were in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie).

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): My hon. Friend called the debate in order to talk about housing problems in her constituency, with specific reference to Silsden. My neighbouring constituency—also a rural area—contains many examples of the way in which dormitory, executive, spec-built housing developments of the sort that my hon. Friend has described have begun to encroach on green-field sites.

The whole of the Bradford UDP was framed in the last Conservative Government's planning legislation. It is very unfortunate that so much green space was set aside, never to be recovered once it had been built on. I am glad that the new Government have indicated that they will encourage more use of brown-field or recycled sites.

My hon. Friend has mentioned recycling existing buildings. As she has said, my constituency also contains many mills and listed buildings that need to be reused. I hope that the Government will consider giving local authorities some support, helping them to intervene proactively in the market, to find developers and to match them up with derelict sites. If we leave it to the market to find recycled land—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a very long intervention. If he has the permission of the hon. Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) and the Minister, he may make a brief contribution when the hon. Lady has stopped speaking.

Mrs. Cryer: The regional manager of the British Waterways Board tells me that the board is anxious to dispose of the derelict warehouses, and has asked for my assistance. Although intact, the warehouses are looking a little decrepit, but they would make very attractive flats. They would not be suitable for families with small children, because of their position near the canal, but in other respects they are beautifully positioned, with lovely views.

The warehouses would be suitable apartments for others, if only we can persuade developers to consider that sort of challenge rather than the easy profits of green-field sites. Perhaps a levy on green-field site development will remedy the imbalance about which I understand my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has some ideas.

I look forward to the provision of new or improved council housing following the release of council house receipts, which is already in our programme, and the redressing of 18 years of Tory neglect of our towns and cities to make them again into places where people want to live.

All those changes must—and, I hope, will—come. I only hope that the shift from rural to urban housing does not come too late to save the lovely green areas around our towns, without which we, our children and our grandchildren will be much poorer.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) for giving way to me earlier. When she did so, I raised the whole question of green-field development throughout the Bradford district. Incidentally, when we talk about the Bradford district, people tend to forget about Keighley and Shipley. In fact, Bradford is the fourth largest metropolitan district in England and Wales. It is a significant piece of land in the Yorkshire region, and also a very built-up area in which half a million people live.

My hon. Friend has made some valid points. In a built-up area such as Bradford district, there are planning pressures to develop incrementally, by attrition, on the surrounding green-field sites. Part of the difficulty encountered by Bradford council relates to the calculation of the amount of land that must be set aside for development. The last Administration gave the council a calculation that it met virtually in full, but, unfortunately, it did so largely by allocating large chunks of green-field land.

I am concerned about Warren lane and Clarendon road in Gilstead, and Sty lane in Micklethwaite. These are valuable spaces, separating communities. As my hon. Friend pointed out, Silsden has a community integrity that is all its own. Gilstead, Eldwick and Micklethwaite also have long histories, but those villages will be subsumed in the growth of commuter-type housing in an area that does not really have a town centre. There are no proper planning considerations for village or town life—even for shopping facilities—and there is very little consideration for traffic generation. The Bradford area is very hilly, and narrow valleys cause transport problems.

The local authority has allocated many sites, including Silsden, in its unitary development plan, but I hope that, when it considers planning applications in the light of sewerage constraints, highways constraints and so on, it will go through the details with a fine-toothed comb, and possibly adopt some of the arguments that my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley are using, to say that development should not go ahead on those sites.

1.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford—

Mrs. Ann Cryer: Keighley.

Angela Eagle: I am sorry—I meant my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer). I must have the Bradford unitary development plan on my brain. I congratulate her on securing the debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) on his contribution to it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley has raised some important issues relating to planning policy and the way in which it has been developed in Bradford. She has also rightly pointed out that the background against which these often complex and difficult issues are decided is in the process of being changed by the new Government. However, until we can put the changes into effect, these issues must be decided according to the existing planning rules. My hon. Friend also knows that unitary development plans evolve on a rolling programme; I hope that that gives her hope that she can start to have an effect on the way in which the plans become reality.

The issues are complex, as my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley acknowledged, and they are by no means easily resolved. Therefore, the planning system attaches considerable significance to development plans, which are formulated after examining local issues in great detail. Such plans provide the framework for resolving development issues at local level.

Responsibility for Bradford's UDP rests with Bradford city council. In preparing the plan, the council is required to take account of development issues throughout the metropolitan district; to follow established procedures; and to consider objections made to its proposals.

The city council started work on the current UDP before 1993. In November that year, the draft UDP was published and made available for objection by the public. I understand that many objections were made, including a considerable number about the proposals for Silsden to which my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley refers. More than 1,500 objections each were made to the four sites zoned in the plan for housing development and to one that was earmarked for industrial use.

Those proposals meant that about 50 hectares of the green belt would be taken at Silsden. I know that it will be of no comfort to those in the Aire valley, but I believe that the matter must be viewed in perspective. It is worth recalling that the total green belt in the metropolitan district as a whole is more than 23,000 hectares, so between 0.2 and 0.3 per cent. of the green belt is involved.

The development plan system is subject to rigorous procedures. A very important safeguard is the right for anyone who has made an objection to have it considered by an inspector at a public inquiry. The inspector is independent, and reports directly to the local planning authority.

In Bradford, the UDP inquiry was held between May 1995 and February 1996. Any local planning authority must give very serious consideration to what an inspector has said about a plan. I know that Bradford city council accepted almost all the inspector's recommendations, including those about Silsden. Although he noted that some sites are subject to constraints on their development, the inspector considered that the principle of development at Silsden was justified.

In the inspector's view, the needs for effective long-term planning and economic regeneration constituted exceptional circumstances to justify the removal of the land from the green belt. Acceptance of that view then became a matter for the council's judgment. Decisions about planning issues in local areas are usually best taken locally.

Obviously, there is a debate about whether the council has the detail of its planning strategy exactly right for the metropolitan district, but I am firm in my view that the development plan system is the best way of reconciling all the different views that there may be about the way ahead in each locality.

[Angela Eagle]

Inevitably, some decisions will not be to the liking of objectors; but the system allows for open discussion and independent arbitration about them. Any plan that takes more than four years to complete is testimony to the thoroughness of the process. Although our document "Modernising Planning" considers ways to speed up the process, the process will not be speeded up at the expense of safeguards and people's rights to object to a plan and to have those objections fully considered.

It is important, too, that each local planning authority sticks to the correct procedures for the preparation of its development plans. I understand that, for some proposed development sites in Bradford, there is concern that the council decided not to hold a second public inquiry, but that is a matter for the council, which has a duty to follow the statutory regulations.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister carefully considered arguments made to him in the light of existing guidance regarding ministerial intervention in development plans—I emphasise "existing". The powers of intervention in plans are used very sparingly and as a last resort, such as when a plan raises issues of national or regional importance or gives rise to substantial controversy—for example, extending beyond the area of the plan-making authority.

In this case, our considered judgment was that it would not be appropriate to intervene. The Bradford UDP was formally adopted by the city council on 23 January 1998, so, as I am sure hon. Members recognise, my right hon. Friend has no further jurisdiction regarding the policies contained in Bradford's UDP.

That is not to say that we are unconcerned about the general issues that arise from the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley. She has drawn particular attention to the location of land for housing, arguing for greater attention to housing and development opportunities in the urban areas. The planning system allows for assessment of those issues in deciding how best to accommodate future development.

In March 1996, the previous Administration published regional planning guidance for Yorkshire and the Humber region. That is being reviewed, and we shall ask for views about its content. The review will take account of better information about the capacity of the region's urban areas to accept new development. More important, it is our intention that there will be much more of a regional contribution to the guidance, and a greater regional input in the way in which we plan for new housing.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley has campaigned vigorously on behalf of her constituents in Silsden to express their concerns about the UDP, and I congratulate her on her attention to their views and her determination in ensuring that we know what they are. She has contributed to the debate on planning for the communities of the future, and she has written several times about the issues for Silsden, notably on behalf of the Silsden town action group, while raising issues for other parts of her constituency.

Hon. Members will recall that, in a statement on 23 February 1998 on planning for the communities of the future, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister set out a range of measures to meet future housing needs. I need not repeat that statement, but I would respond to a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley raised about recent decisions.

In the case of Bradford city council, the UDP has been adopted, so my right hon. Friend has no further jurisdiction in the matter. However, we propose to move as quickly as possible to the new approach set out in my right hon. Friend's statement, and the reviews of regional planning guidance that are under way provide an early opportunity to put that into effect.

When new regional planning guidance is ready, it will be open to local authorities to review their development plans. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley has already made a few suggestions for that review. She came up with some interesting ideas about recycling land and putting it to housing use, which is the essence of the policy change that the Government have inaugurated.

However, it is important to remember that green belts are not a national designation. They are established by local authorities by means of development plans. The general extent of green belts is fixed in structure plans, taking account of regional planning guidance. It has always been open to local authorities to propose changes to green belt boundaries; but exceptional circumstances are required to justify alterations. That happened several times under the previous Administration.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley spoke about the strength of feeling in her constituency on the issues that she raised today; my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley did likewise regarding his constituency. The Government have set out their proposals for tackling the issues at the heart of this debate, which are about regenerating our urban areas and looking for the most sustainable solutions to meet our long-term development needs.

Our statement of 23 February charts the course for taking this issue forward. We have emphasised that we want to stimulate debate, particularly at local and regional level. I have listened carefully to the debate, and I am sure that Bradford council will pay careful attention to it. We shall continue to listen and to provide strategic leadership in what will, I am sure, be a continuing debate in the coming months.

It being before Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor was asked—

Freedom of Information

1. Miss Melanie Johnson: What responses he has received to his White Paper on freedom of information. [30864]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Dr. David Clark) rose—

Hon. Members: Where are the Tories?

Madam Speaker: Order.

Dr. Clark: It is nice to see at least one Conservative Back Bencher coming into the Chamber. I welcome him.

The freedom of information White Paper, "Your Right to Know", has excited a massive response at home and abroad. I have received more than 500 responses so far from individuals and organisations, and the numbers are increasing day by day.

Miss Johnson: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response and for the very full consultation on the much-welcomed White Paper. What is the timetable for the proposed draft Bill, which will be one of the first Bills to go through the new pre-legislative Select Committee procedure? I am sure that the Select Committee would like to receive the Bill in early June so that it can carry out much of the necessary scrutiny before the summer recess.

Dr. Clark: The consultation period has just ended and we are carefully considering the responses. However, as parts of the Bill are non-controversial, the information on those parts has already been sent to the parliamentary draftsmen, in the hope that we can ensure that the Bill is ready by early summer. It can then go before the Select Committee, which may be able to complete its consideration in time for the Bill to be included in the Queen's Speech.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Among the many responses that the right hon. Gentleman has received, is there one from the senior official to whom he entrusted the leak inquiry? Will he tell us what has been discovered, if anything—and in telling us that, will he also say how many copies of the White Paper were legitimately circulating within Whitehall at the time of the leak?

Dr. Clark: The preliminary leak inquiry has been carried out and I have seen the report. It concluded that too many copies were distributed to enable the inquiry to ascertain where the leak came from. The information gained in the inquiry has been passed to the Cabinet Secretary, with suggestions about how to minimise circulation and reduce the potential for leaks.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The right hon. Gentleman said that many copies were circulating; could he say precisely how many?

Dr. Clark: Three drafts of the White Paper were in circulation. I cannot be absolutely precise, but I understand that the number was in three figures.

2. Mr. Baker: What steps he has taken to ensure that new initiatives in the operation of central Government comply with his proposed freedom of information legislation. [30865]

Dr. David Clark: Last month, I published substantial background information on the White Paper "Your Right to Know", to exemplify our freedom of information commitment to active disclosure.

Mr. Baker: I have no doubt of the Minister's, or the Government's, commitment to freedom of information. However, may I ask the Minister to investigate the compatibility with freedom of information legislation of the strategic communications unit that has been established by the Prime Minister? Is the Minister aware that the Prime Minister refused to provide detailed answers to questions on the strategic communications unit tabled by me and by other hon. Members? Is he aware also that the unit seems to be operating in a manner that restricts Departments in issuing press releases, that it is acting as a filter, and that it is therefore contrary to the principle of freedom of information?

Dr. Clark: Currently, we operate under a code, which obviously does not have statutory authority. We believe that the code is inadequate, which is why we require further legislation. The strategic communications unit is a means of ensuring that information circulates in Whitehall, helping us to ensure good government. That is its purpose.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will my right hon. Friend examine the mechanics of the distribution of information technology, particularly in Departments? There are very real worries that some of the systems that are currently operating, and some of the new ones that are supposed to be introduced into Departments, will not be capable of carrying the information or providing the access that he and I definitely want them to.

Dr. Clark: One of the unfortunate legacies that we inherited 10 months ago was the chaos in IT within government. Some Departments cannot speak electronically to other Departments. We plan to enhance the CabEnet system. I hope also that, before too long, we will have a secure intranet through which Government information can be passed electronically. It is ludicrous that, in this modern day, we have been left with a ramshackle machine in which Ministers cannot e-mail fellow Ministers.

Better Government White Paper

3. Mr. Mackinlay: When he expects to publish the White Paper on better government. [30866]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. Peter Kilfoyle): My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster intends to publish the White Paper on better government later in the spring of this year.

Mr. Mackinlay: The Minister will understand that the Government's package of measures will be most welcome to the increasing number of our constituents who are bewildered by the plethora of agencies that have been created, particularly in the past 18 years. Constituents are sent from pillar to post trying to exercise their rights and get satisfaction. Will the Minister ensure that public sector unions and other representative organisations are included in the consultation process on the White Paper? Those organisations are the providers of those services, and they often—very unfairly—receive blame that should be apportioned elsewhere. There is a need for sensitivity in dealing with public sector unions, so that the White Paper and package of measures will be a success for our constituents.

Mr. Kilfoyle: To make public services more readily accessible to more people, the Government are considering many proposals, such as one-stop shops. I have been consulting public service providers, which work at the sharp end in delivering public services. Only yesterday, I consulted public service providers in Edinburgh, and we have already conducted similar exercises in London, Leeds and Southampton. I intend to continue that process in other parts of the country, to effect the fullest possible consultation with those stakeholders who work at the coal face in providing public service.

Mr. William Ross: Does the Minister agree that the democratic principle provides the basis for the best form of government in any state? Does he understand that hon. Members in my party are delighted that that standard will apply to the devolved institutions in Scotland and Wales? Do the Government intend to apply the same standards to any devolved institution in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Kilfoyle: The principles underlying attempts to effect better government apply equally in Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and England. We shall apply the same principles of transparency, accountability and accessibility in Northern Ireland as we do elsewhere.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I listened carefully to that answer. What importance will the proposed White Paper attach to parliamentary democracy? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the better government White Paper should end his Government's practice, which has been established in just 10 months, of bypassing the House and making announcements via leak, press briefing and the media? What proposals will the White Paper contain to restore parliamentary democracy which has been destroyed by his Government in just 10 months?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I am sure that the right hon. Lady can anticipate my reply. I think it is a bit rich for the Conservatives, after 18 years of inspired leaks and 18 years of circumventing parliamentary due process, to make such an accusation against us. The Government will ensure that the better government White Paper does exactly what it is intended to do, which is to ensure that small businesses and citizens, who were ignored for 18 years, are given the opportunity to access government service in a simple, open, transparent and efficient way.

Freedom of Information

4. Mr. Grogan: If he will make a statement on the representations he received during the consultation period on the freedom of information White Paper. [30867]

Dr. David Clark: It is clear that the White Paper on freedom of information has caught the imagination of many people, not only in this country but overseas. The consultation period ended only last week, on 28 February. Most of the overwhelming number of responses have been positive. We are now studying them and are greatly encouraged by the positive suggestions that they make.

Mr. Grogan: In the spirit of freedom of information and open government, will my right hon. Friend say what measures he is taking to encourage Government Departments to be more open in their practices in the period leading up to legislation?

Dr. Clark: I believe it is very important that the Government themselves are pre-emptive in their approach to the release of information. In that respect, I intend to publish on the internet and to place in the Libraries of both Houses the consultation papers that I have received, except where people have requested confidentiality.

Mr. Soames: What representations has the right hon. Gentleman received from the civil service about advice tendered by civil servants to Ministers? Does he agree that it is of the utmost importance that if officials are to give the best possible advice to Ministers, that advice must remain confidential?

Dr. Clark: We have made it quite clear that the Government cannot operate in a goldfish bowl. We have provided some protection for the advice on policy given to Ministers by civil servants, but we believe that much of the factual and analytical background information can be published. I have already done that in respect of the preparations for the White Paper.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not a good indicator of our seriousness about freedom of information to be found in the answer that my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack)? When my right hon. Friend gave him details of a leak inquiry in a way that was unprecedented in the House, he revealed information that Ministers in previous Governments had ducked giving in Parliament.

Dr. Clark: I am glad that the House has appreciated the openness and frankness with which I tried to approach this matter, as I believe it was the right and proper thing to do. Indeed, we need to build bridges between Whitehall and Westminster, and I hope to be in a position in the next two or three weeks to announce various initiatives that may help to build those bridges.

Mr. Ruffley: Is the Chancellor aware of our great concern at the fact that he has failed to discover the source of the leak of the White Paper earlier this year? In the interests of openness, will he disclose to the House who the leak inquiry officer interviewed? If he has not interviewed the Minister without Portfolio, why not, as most of the Lobby seem to think that he was the source of the leak in the first place?

Dr. Clark: It really is a bit strong for the Conservatives to say that, given that, when they were in government, they gave us no information whatever about leak inquiries. I have been open with the House. There was a full preliminary leak inquiry, and a number of people whom the independent interviewing officer judged it necessary to interview were indeed interviewed.

EU Presidency

5. Dr. Starkey: What discussions he has had with his EU counterparts on (a) simplifying EU rules and (b) reducing bureaucratic requirements imposed by the EU during the UK presidency. [30868]

Mr. Kilfoyle: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, last month attended the informal meeting of internal market Ministers in Cambridge for discussions on better European Union regulation. It was agreed to establish, before the end of the UK presidency, pilot test panels of businesses in some member states to comment on EU legislative proposals. It was also agreed to have regular exchanges of information on our national simplification initiatives and to give renewed impetus to Commission work to cut EU red tape for business.

Dr. Starkey: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. He may be aware that in my constituency of Milton Keynes a large number of small businesses have been active in expanding their level of exports to the European Union. Excessive regulations bear particularly heavily on small businesses. Can the Minister say whether any actions are being taken specifically in the interests of small businesses?

Mr. Kilfoyle: Small businesses suffer disproportionately from too much bureaucratic red tape. Within the SLIM initiative—simplification of legislation within the internal market—moves are afoot, which we support within the Commission, to minimise the effect of over-regulation on small businesses within the European Union and the single market.

Mr. Hogg: Is it not true that complexity and bureaucracy are the inevitable hallmarks of EU legislation, and that, if we are to achieve the objectives of the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey), we need to reduce the scope and probably the competence of the EU?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I disagree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. My right hon. Friend has already flagged up three areas and we will continue to pursue them throughout the presidency. First, we must raise the profile of the problem of burdensome regulation. Secondly, we must look at those areas within existing legislation that can be simplified. Thirdly, we must ensure that in future a minimal amount of regulation is imposed on business within member states. All those initiatives are being promoted and pursued now under the UK presidency.

Data Management

6. Mr. Todd: What steps he will take to improve the efficiency of data management in Government. [30869]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The central information technology unit in my Department has established a Government secure intranet service, which will enable the secure exchange of electronic communications between Government Departments to improve the efficiency of data management in government.

Mr. Todd: In an earlier answer, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster referred to the shambles of information technology management left as a heritage by the previous Government. One of the critical areas in dealing with that is the imposition of coherent standards in data management. What steps are being taken to ensure that we not only set standards but enforce them and that we collect information on the various technologies used within government to store data?

Mr. Kilfoyle: My hon. Friend will be aware that there are about 132 separate registrations for a simple matter like a name. We are seeking to simplify that in a way similar to that used by our competitors in Asia. In Singapore, one can have one's name and address changed through the information technology that is available with one call on government. Currently there is a plethora of different systems. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is taking forward the work of maintaining the information technology with the millennium bug in mind and we are taking the opportunity to look at information technology across a whole range of Government Departments.

Mrs. Gillan: May I suggest that the Minister starts with his own Department when improving the efficiency of data management? Is he aware that the summary of departmental plans to deal with the year 2000 computer problem does not tally with the back-up papers provided by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which contain omissions and vague information? Will the Minister ask his right hon. Friend to withdraw the quarterly statement that was slipped out yesterday by way of a written answer and to give to this critical and increasingly costly programme the detailed attention that it requires? If he cannot transfer data accurately from one piece of paper to another, how can we have confidence in his ability to solve the 2000 problem?

Mr. Kilfoyle: First, I remind the hon. Lady that it was not on paper—it was on CD-ROM. The important point for Opposition Members to recognise is that this is too serious a matter for them to try political point scoring from it. We are making all the appropriate efforts to ensure compliance in respect of the millennium bug problem, which is a problem that raised its head long before 1 May 1997. To charge my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster with anything less than the appropriate industry and application in trying to resolve the problem and make information available to the House is churlish of the hon. Lady.

Reports (Publication)

7. Mr. Simon Hughes: If it is his policy for reports commissioned by Government from outside individuals or agencies to be published; and if he will make a statement. [30870]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Work commissioned from outside individuals or agencies is subject to the same criteria for publication and disclosure as other information held by government.

Mr. Hughes: That is not a very helpful answer. Does the Minister agree, for example, that, if the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions commissions, at taxpayers' expense, a report from independent academics about the electoral system for London, that report should be published in the form in which it was submitted, rather than being sent back to the authors, altered at the Government's request and published only when it more accurately reflects the sort of messages and information that the Government want it to contain?

Mr. Kilfoyle: First, the specifics of that question would be best answered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and I shall bring them to his attention. The presumption in Government is that, unless there are good reasons to the contrary, such analytical information at least would be published.

Freedom of Information

8. Mr. Dalyell: What representations he has received on his freedom of information White Paper in relation to whistleblower activities. [30871]

Dr. David Clark: I met my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) on 22 January. In addition, a small number of responses received to the White Paper on freedom of information have raised issues concerned with whistleblowing.

As the House will know, the Public Interest Disclosure Bill is about safeguarding the interests of employees who make unauthorised disclosures in very specific circumstances and it has the support of the Government.

Mr. Dalyell: I thank my right hon. Friend for the manner in which he and his senior officials entered into dialogue with us on 22 January. Does this help legitimate deep throats?

Dr. Clark: Yes.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's response, but does he share my concern that an attitude still seems to prevail among some senior civil servants that frowns on any civil servants speaking—even as a citizen—to their Member of Parliament and sharing their concerns about what is happening?

Dr. Clark: I said earlier that I believe that it is time to build bridges between Whitehall and Westminster. It is my intention to bring forward certain suggestions which will improve standards and contact between Members of Parliament and civil servants.

Mr. Paterson: Following consultation and legislation, would the right hon. Gentleman like to see more freedom of information established in this country than currently prevails in the United States of America?

Dr. Clark: It is widely acknowledged that the freedom of information White Paper marks the next stage of freedom legislation throughout the world. In that sense, I believe that it will offer a much better opportunity for the people of Britain to find out information that may relate to themselves and which they may want. I believe that that will make a huge difference to the political culture of Britain and that it will bring the government of our country closer to our citizens.

Electronic Service Delivery

9. Mr. Alan Campbell: What representations he has received on the potential use of smartcards to deliver Government services. [30872]

Dr. David Clark: The Government believe that there is a need to use smartcards and commercial smartcard services for electronic Government transactions. Such cards would not function as identity cards. My officials have reported to me on a number of meetings that they have had with representatives from manufacturers and other interested groups on smartcards.

Mr. Campbell: I am grateful for that answer. Is my right hon. Friend aware of the excellent work being done by Siemens in my Tynemouth constituency to develop new smartcard technology? Does he agree that there is great potential for the use of such technology to deliver public services in a cost-effective and user-friendly way?

Dr. Clark: I agree that we can use smartcards to improve services to our citizens. If we can bank 24 hours a day, why cannot Government services be available 24 hours a day? I am aware of the work of Siemens just across the river from my constituency. The Government cannot afford to miss out on a system that has improved customer services in the private sector. It should be applied to Government services as well.

Mr. Hawkins: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the smartcard technology developed by Siemens was approved when the cross-party information technology committee saw it in Germany last summer? Will he confirm that the use of smartcard technology can help to cut crime, particularly benefit fraud? That is one reason why many Conservative Members want that technology extended so that one day we shall have proper identity cards to help cut crime.

Dr. Clark: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's general points, but I do not agree with him on identity cards.

Smartcards are not identity cards and we do not see them as such. By using smartcards and other cards with magnetic strips, we can improve services to our citizens. That should be the aim of all hon. Members.

10. Mr. Hoyle: What pilot projects are currently under way to develop the technology used in delivering Government services. [30873]

Dr. David Clark: As part of my work on the better government White Paper, I am encouraging IT initiatives in central and local government. We will use technology to cut red tape and make life easier for businesses and citizens. We are making imaginative use of touch screens and electronic forms to get rid of the notion that government is just about queuing and filling in forms.

Mr. Hoyle: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that there should be closer links between central and local government using IT? Such links would benefit the people of Chorley.

Dr. Clark: My hon. Friend is correct. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has established a joint working group between central and local government, which is trying to work out ways of co-ordinating services to our citizens. The use of IT and one-stop shops throughout the country can bring Government services closer to our citizens, making life more comfortable for them. Information technology is the key. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. It is far too noisy. It is all right agreeing with what is said, but let us have quieter conversations.

Mr. Ian Taylor: I am pleased that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is carrying on the good work of the previous Government on IT. Has he extended the work that we were doing? Is he still getting support from industry for his efforts? Has the central information technology unit been able to advance any further ideas on how to distribute kiosks and other centres so that the public have easy access to them?

Dr. Clark: We are trying to develop the use information technology through various approaches. That will result in a better end product than the route followed in the United States, which has largely used the internet.

By using a mixture of touch screens and the internet, we will be able to provide IT that is not only very friendly to our citizens but will revolutionise their lives.

EU Presidency

11. Mr. Alan W. Williams: If he will make a statement on his Department's objectives for the UK presidency. [30874]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Three departmental objectives for the UK presidency have been set. The first is to convince our European partners, the Commission and the European Parliament of the importance of better regulation. That is vital if we are to free business to create jobs and wealth. The second is to ensure simplification of burdensome rules. Simpler EU rules will help bring the EU closer to its citizens. The third is to improve the EU's regulatory processes to ensure better quality regulations for business and citizens in future.

Mr. Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and for the initiatives that he has taken to simplify European recognition for business and the citizen. At the risk of being too pessimistic, may I ask whether he agrees that European regulation is over-bureaucratic and obsessed with red tape?

Mr. Kilfoyle: Although, as my hon. Friend says, there is certainly too much red tape, there is a commitment in the EU to overcome it. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will host a presidency event this weekend in Manchester—which will be attended by more than 200 people from throughout the EU—that is dedicated to supporting the European business test panel and the simple legislation for the internal market initiative, for example.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1.[30894] Mr. Corbett: If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 4 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. Later today, I shall have further such meetings.

Mr. Corbett: In offering our sympathy to the families of the two men who were so brutally and senselessly murdered last night near Newry, will the Prime Minister confirm that he will not allow criminal fanatics to derail the peace process, which people from both communities so very much want to succeed?

The Prime Minister: Yes. We can all use the normal and right but ritualistic language about an evil atrocity, those appalling murders, and how senseless and wicked they are. They are all of those things. I think that the two men who were murdered last night—two friends across the community divide—in a sense symbolised the future in Northern Ireland. The gunmen, in the evil atrocity that they committed, symbolised the past. We have now got to make progress—real progress—in the talks. That should be our mission, so that the hopes of the future drive out the demons of the past. That is what we intend to do.

Mr. Hague: On behalf of the Opposition, may I echo and support the Prime Minister's remarks?

On a different subject, the Prime Minister says that he made clear throughout the election campaign that he would implement the Dearing recommendations on higher education. We have made clear that, if he does, we will support him. Why has he broken his promise?

The Prime Minister: We have not broken a promise at all. We have accepted substantially the Dearing proposals, with this change, which was, in fact, made quite clear during the election campaign: we believe that it is better to replace the maintenance grants with help for lower-income families with tuition fees. There is a choice. We can have either no maintenance grants but help for low-income families with tuition fees or a flat-rate tuition fee, which is what Dearing suggested, and help with maintenance grants. I am afraid that we cannot have both.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister is breaking his promise. He said that he would implement the recommendations of the Dearing committee and he is not implementing the recommendations of the Dearing committee. Does he realise that, by not implementing Dearing, his proposals will mean that the poorest students will either be £2,000 worse off in total or will not go to university at all? What is his justification for that policy?

The Prime Minister: No, precisely the opposite is the case for the reason that I shall explain to the right hon. Gentleman. I repeat that we did not break any promise on this. We made it clear that we believe that the maintenance element should go. Under our proposals, one third of students will be exempt from tuition fees and another third will pay a reduced amount, so a large proportion will pay either no fees or reduced fees. Under the Dearing proposals they would all, irrespective of their income, have to pay the £1,000 tuition fees. That is why our proposals will help lower-income students, not harm them. In addition, as a result of the proposals that we have announced, whereas Dearing said that contributions should be repaid when people reached an income of £5,000 a year after leaving university, our figure is £10,000 a year, so we are giving additional help to low-income families in that respect as well.

Mr. Hague: Let us get this clear for the Prime Minister, because he clearly does not understand his own policy. It is no good his saying that he is not charging the worst-off students tuition fees. They do not pay tuition fees now—but they do get grants, and the Prime Minister is abolishing them. If one abolishes a grant that is most generous to the worst-off people, the worst-off people will be the hardest hit. Anybody in the country can work that out. If that is not the case, why have overall student applications fallen by 4 per cent. this year and applications by mature students fallen by 18 per cent? So much for lifelong learning. For the sake of thousands of students and families, will the Prime Minister now, before it is too late, implement the actual recommendations of the Dearing report, as he promised to do?

The Prime Minister: Let me explain it to the right hon. Gentleman again. The Dearing proposals, which he says we should support, are that everybody, irrespective of income, pays a flat-rate tuition fee. Under our proposals, one third are entirely exempt and another one third pay reduced fees. That is why our proposals are better for lower-income families. Secondly, we have to introduce the reform because under the Conservative Government there was a cap on student numbers, which means that only 30 per cent. of school leavers are entitled to go to university. As a result of our reforms, we shall get about 500,000 extra students into further and higher education over the next five years. That is why our reforms are a better deal for universities, for students and for the country.

Mr. Hague: The facts do not support the Prime Minister. Under the previous Government, higher education was hugely expanded, but now the number of applications is falling. Students and their families feel betrayed, and they are right to feel that way. They are right to be angry at the Government's deceit and double dealing. The Lords amendments passed on Monday night would give some help to the worst-off students. Even the Prime Minister cannot argue about the fact that those amendments would give more help to the worst-off students. Will he now acknowledge that the Government have got that part wrong and agree to accept the amendments?

The Prime Minister: The answer is no, for the very reason that I have already given the right hon. Gentleman—but let me give it to him again. Under his proposals, students who under our proposals will be exempt would pay tuition fees. He must accept the fact that they would pay that extra money. In addition, under his proposals, as under the previous Government, there would be a cap on student numbers—but we can now raise that cap. Also as a result of our proposals, an extra £165 million will go into higher education next year. That is why the vice-chancellors have welcomed our proposals.

The choice is simple. The right hon. Gentleman says that applications have fallen, but there will be more students in further and higher education next year because of our proposals. If we were to return to the system that he proposes, fewer students and less money would go into universities and fewer people would get the chance of a university education. That is why our proposals are better for Britain.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister talks only about tuition fees; he neglects to mention the grant, which he proposes to abolish. That is a key part of the equation. Before the election, the right hon. Gentleman said that he had no plans to introduce tuition fees; during the election campaign, he said that he would implement the Dearing report; after the election, he broke both promises. As soon as the Government got into office, power went to their heads, their principles went out of the window and their promises went in the bin. Is not their treatment of students a shabby tale of deceit from beginning to end?

The Prime Minister: As I explained in my very first answer, there is a choice. Either the situation is left as it is, with maintenance grants and full tuition fees, or we do not have maintenance grants but exempt the poorest students from tuition fees. We have chosen the latter course because it is better and fairer. As for lectures from the Tories about student poverty, they introduced the most discredited student loans scheme that the country has ever seen. Students know perfectly well about the raw deal they got under the Tories. That is why they will not believe a word of what the right hon. Gentleman says now.

Q2.[30895] Mrs. McGuire: Given the image of pastoral tranquillity before 1 May 1997 that has been painted by the Conservative party, would the Prime Minister be surprised to find that one of the last pieces of research on rural affairs from the Scottish Office under the Conservatives showed significant decreases in gross domestic product and incomes, and a massive increase in homelessness? Would it not have been more appropriate for the Conservative party to reflect on their government than to don a corporate Barbour jacket and plunge headlong into collective denial?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Conservatives are in a state of denial about their record over 18 years. Following the Conservatives's period in office, 450 rural schools have been closed, only one in four parishes now has a bus service worthy of the name, crime is up, poverty is up and they gave the country BSE. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Let me repeat it—they gave the country BSE.

On that point, fortunately, I have good news to report from Brussels today. There has been a majority for the Commission proposal which, if held at the Agriculture Council next week—I very much believe that it will—will mean that the export certified herds scheme is through. At long last, after long years of Conservative failure, there is at least some light at the end of the tunnel.

Mr. Ashdown: Can the Prime Minister tell us in what year of this Government he expects to start to make progress on his early pledge to reduce NHS waiting lists?

The Prime Minister: I want to make progress this year and further progress next, but that must be done against the background of keeping a tight discipline on public spending, sorting out the structural budget deficit we inherited and making sure the public finances are sound. As soon as that is the position we will be able to put into health the investment that we need to get waiting lists down.

Mr. Ashdown: The Prime Minister knows that he has not made progress this year—in fact, waiting lists have gone up by 100,000. Is he aware that NHS waiting lists went up by 250,000 during the whole term of the previous Government? It is predicted in a recent and respected report that this Government will achieve an increase of 250,000 in NHS waiting lists by the autumn. Does the Prime Minister understand the gravity of that? If that were to be achieved, would he count it a success or a failure?

The Prime Minister: Of course I do not want that to happen. Before the election, the Liberal Democrats asked for £1.1 billion extra health spending. We put in £1.5 billion, but they say it is not enough. We want to get waiting lists down, and we shall. I hope that when we achieve the reduction that we have promised we will get cheers instead of the cat-calls we get now. We have to do that against the background I described. The Conservatives doubled the national debt and we will now pay out in interest payments on that debt this year more than we spend on the whole schools system of the UK. It is precisely for that reason that the Chancellor—I entirely agree with him—has made it clear that investment in our schools and hospitals has to depend on sorting out the public finances.

Mr. Hayes: Tell that to the sick and the dying.

The Prime Minister: The Conservative party spent 18 years letting those people down. It will take time, but I can assure the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) that, at the next election, the pledge we made will have been fulfilled.

Q3.[30896] Mr. Livingstone: Will the Prime Minister confirm that he has been lobbied by members of the Confederation of British Industry who want Labour to drop its commitment that trade union recognition should be granted when a simple majority of those voting in a ballot vote for recognition? The CBI proposes instead that there should be no change in the status quo unless an absolute majority of all workers—even those not voting—vote for it. Will he point out to the CBI that, if such a system had applied in the general election last year, the Conservative party would still be in government and that we have no intention of having one rule on ballots for ourselves and a different one for trade unions?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I think that we were both elected under the first-past-the-post system, but perhaps that is another argument. It is important to realise that I have been lobbied by all groups, not only the CBI, on this matter. The Government are considering the matter—we shall make our views known in due course. I hope very much that a different approach by the Government can bring business and trade unions together—as we have found on many issues, not least the social chapter and the minimum wage—on trade union recognition. If there are outstanding questions, we shall have to resolve them in the Government. We shall make our views known once that decision has been reached.

Mr. Pickles: Does the Prime Minister's new-found enthusiasm for the countryside apply to rural hospitals? If so, will he send a message of support to the staff of the Ongar War Memorial hospital and the surrounding community? Until 1 May last year, the hospital had a safe and secure future in the national health service, but, under the Labour Government, it faces closure. Do community hospitals have a safe place in the NHS?

The Prime Minister: It certainly was not the case that they had a safe and secure place until 1 May. As I said, we have spent £1.5 billion more than the Conservative Government were going to spend. In respect of the services that the hon. Gentleman mentions and others, we will do our very best within existing spending constraints. When we can, we shall put in the extra resources that are needed, but the Conservative Government, whom the hon. Gentleman supported, closed hundreds of community hospitals.

Q4.[30897] Mrs. Fyfe: As we approach International Womens Day, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm the Labour party's commitment to the principle of an equal number of men and women in the Scottish Parliament? Has he come across the advice of Noreen Burrows, the professor of European law at Glasgow university, who said that Europe would help, not hinder, our efforts to achieve that? Will he take such views into account before final decisions are made?

The Prime Minister: We certainly shall take those views into account. We fully support equal opportunities for women. Indeed, it is as a result of the changes that the Labour party made that so many women Members of Parliament are sitting on the Labour Benches. It is a change that we want to see elsewhere in the United Kingdom as well.

Mr. Keith Simpson: Will the Prime Minister admit that he misled the British public about students and that, as a consequence of the Government's action, the poorest students will now be worse off?

The Prime Minister: No, I will not confirm that, as it is not true. Moreover, our proposals differ from those of the Conservatives, not only because, as I said earlier, the Conservative party would charge everybody tuition fees, but because, under its proposals—if it accepts the Dearing report—students will start to make repayments after earning £5,000 a year whereas, under our proposals, they will do so after they have earned £10,000 a year. Our proposals will help, not hinder, the poorest students.

Q5.[30898] Mr. Llew Smith: The Prime Minister has expressed the importance of tertiary colleges in developing skills for the local work force. Will he comment on the tragedy facing Gwent tertiary college, which was probably the most successful in Wales? The previous principal, Sue Parker, with the support of the college's corporation, turned the college into a financial disaster almost overnight—indeed, it is now accused of misusing European funds. Will the Prime Minister support our demands for the corporation to be sacked and insist that investigations are carried out to ensure that projects that expect European money receive that money—and that that money is not spent on general running costs? Will he also support our demand that such corporations should be taken out of the hands of big business and put into the hands of democratically elected and accountable local authorities?

The Prime Minister: I certainly support what my hon. Friend says about the misuse of public funds. I am well aware of his long-standing interest in, and concern about, the situation and of the fact that he raised it in a recent debate in the House. I understand that the chair and the vice-chair of the college have resigned and that the principal has left. I understand that a recovery plan is in place and that the college is determined to turn things round.

I want to reassure my hon. Friend and the House that Welsh Office Ministers intend to keep a close eye on the situation. I understand that there is to be a meeting between one of those Ministers and the Gwent Members of Parliament within the next few days. I shall certainly insist that I am kept informed.

Miss McIntosh: The Prime Minister referred earlier to the certified herds scheme. Will he give us an assurance that the cost of setting up and running that scheme, not only in Northern Ireland but throughout the United Kingdom, will be met by the Government?

The Prime Minister: The limitations of the help that we have offered were set out in the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food last week. We are well aware of the difficulties that farmers face because of increased costs on top of all the problems with BSE. That was the reason for the statement last week. I shall certainly consider how that fits in with the hon. Lady's point.

Q6.[30899] Mr. Mullin: When the time comes—in the distant future, one hopes—for my right hon. Friend to publish his memoirs, may we take it that he will be giving HarperCollins a wide berth?

The Prime Minister: That question might possibly be a trifle premature. I shall certainly seek my hon. Friend's advice. He may even merit a chapter; who knows? I understand that the Leader of the Opposition's biographer is having a little difficulty finding a publisher. Perhaps they can apply.

Q7.[30900] Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: It is clear from earlier exchanges between the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that the Prime Minister broke an election pledge. I say that because the Dearing report did not present a choice between the abolition of the maintenance grant and the introduction of tuition fees. Does the Prime Minister accept that the choice was made not by Dearing but by the Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: No. I do not accept that, for this reason: the same amount of money can be made to go only so far. If we did not have tuition fees for all students and we retained the maintenance grant, there would be something like a £500 million hole in the budget for student finance. That is why there is a choice between keeping the maintenance grant system or having tuition fees but exempting low-income pupils.

We decided that it was fairer to have exemptions from tuition fees so that two thirds of students will pay no fees or lower fees and will be in a better position on repayments, not having to repay any money until they are earning £10,000 a year or more. That is a choice within the given budget. It is the best choice for students and it is entirely in line with what we said in the general election campaign.

Q8.[30901] Mrs. Gilroy: Given the Government's key commitment to attacking poverty by rooting out long-term unemployment, will my right hon. Friend join me in thanking the 77 businesses that recently signed up to support the new deal in Plymouth, following the employers' launch? Will he also join me in congratulating the Employment Service staff in Plymouth on the energy, enthusiasm and determination with which they are making a success of the new deal, in partnership not only with business but with the private, public, voluntary and community sectors?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I congratulate the staff and the businesses that have participated. Indeed, we are getting a superb response from businesses and people around the country. In the new deal so far—[Interruption.] I am sorry that the Conservative party opposes the new deal, but it is supported by the vast majority of businesses and the country. As a result of the new deal, 5,000 young people are already in unsubsidised jobs and more than 1,000 lone parents are off benefit and in work. That is a huge saving for the Exchequer, quite apart from an opportunity for them.

Q9.[30902] Mr. Bercow: Given the Prime Minister's—[Interruption.] I recognise that the children must settle down, Madam Speaker. Given the Prime Minister's professed support for a business-friendly Europe, can he give the House a specific example of one European directive or regulation that he will fight successfully to have repealed during the United Kingdom presidency of the European Union? Does he understand that if he cannot, for all the soundbites it will show that he has no influence in Europe?

The Prime Minister: As a matter of fact, I can. Last week, as a result of the work done by my noble Friend the Minister for Trade, we have secured a considerable liberalisation of the telecommunications regime, which means changing and getting rid of the European legislation that was hindering the development of the market. I very much hope that we can join hands across the divide and welcome that.

Mr. Bradshaw: Does the Prime Minister agree that the situation in Kosovo is extremely worrying? Does he also agree that it could become the worst thing that Europe has seen since 1945? Will my right hon. Friend tell the Foreign Secretary that when he meets Mr. Milosevic tomorrow he should leave him in no doubt that the international community has learnt the lesson of appeasement in Bosnia and that we will not stand idly by while he ignites another ethnic war in Europe?

The Prime Minister: The Foreign Secretary will give that message to Mr. Milosevic very strongly. The situation in Kosovo is extremely grave. That is why the Foreign Secretary has extended his programme to see Mr. Milosevic tomorrow and he will deliver him that message. That shows again the importance of the role that Britain can play, not merely in Bosnia but in the whole region in stabilising it, bringing peace and attempting to prevent conflict growing. I have no doubt that if there is substantial conflict there, or indeed in Bosnia, it will have an impact on us and on the whole of Europe as well as on that part of the world.

Ministerial Visits

Q10.[30903] Mr. Baker: When he next plans to visit the Lewes constituency.

The Prime Minister: I fear that I must give the hon. Gentleman the same reply as I gave him last time. I have no plans to visit his constituency yet. I am sorry about that.

Mr. Baker: I am disappointed and I shall keep trying. It is a great pity because many of my constituents who rely on public transport would like to meet the Prime Minister. Is he aware that, since 1974, the cost of rail travel has increased by 78 per cent. above inflation and the cost of bus travel has increased by 57 per cent. above inflation but the cost of private car travel has decreased by 6.5 per cent? Is not that an indictment of the previous Government and a green tax in reverse? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that in the weeks ahead the Government will take action to ensure that bus and rail fares are cut?

The Prime Minister: I cannot give that undertaking, but I can give an undertaking that the White Paper on the integrated transport strategy will deal precisely with how we ensure that the different forms of travel fit in with one another and how we make a regulatory system that matches the needs of consumers. What impact that will have on fares in the long term it is too early to say, but that approach is the right one—rather than leaving it to market forces—and I hope that it will be welcomed by the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

Engagements

Q11.[30904] Mr. Bill Michie: I welcome my right hon. Friend's answer to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) on industrial relations and the forthcoming Bill. May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 826 which concerns 350 workers who have been sacked by management even though they went through the proper legal procedures? Will the new legislation ensure a level playing field for workers and employers and prevent the present problem of the unions having to obey the law while, for some strange reason, employers can flout it?

The Prime Minister: The purpose of the proposals is to make it clear that there has to be fairness in the workplace. I know about the Magnet dispute since it happened just outside my constituency. I very much hope that the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service can be involved. I know that it was at one point, but it is not at present. I hope that the negotiations can resume. That is easily the best way to resolve the dispute.

Dr. Fox: Responsibility for abortion is not to be devolved to the Scottish Parliament, yet on 29 January, Hansard reported the Under-Secretary as saying—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he may not use quotations at Question Time.

Dr. Fox: The Under-Secretary said that if there was to be change to the abortion law in Northern Ireland, it should be considered by a devolved assembly. Why should there be such a difference between Northern Ireland and Scotland?

The Prime Minister: Scotland and Northern Ireland need not necessarily be treated in the same way across the various programmes for devolution. One of the points of devolution is that what happens in Northern Ireland or in Scotland is a matter of debate and can be decided in different ways.

Q12.[30905] Ms Beverley Hughes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the deal brokered by Kofi Annan to allow access to presidential sites must be tested as soon as possible to ensure that Saddam Hussein does not renege on commitments that he has entered into? Does my right hon. Friend also agree that it is important that the policy of diplomacy backed by force remains in place?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Contrary to speculation, the Security Council resolution is a big step forward. It makes clear that the severest consequences will flow if there is any breach of the agreement. That is written into the resolution and it sends the clear message to Saddam Hussein that he must allow inspectors in, and testing to begin, or force will inevitably follow as a result of his breaching the agreement. The mixture of diplomacy and force has got us to where we are, and it is right to continue to use it. British troops, with American troops, will remain in the Gulf to ensure that the agreement that Saddam Hussein's Government have entered into is tested, adhered to and obeyed.

Legal Aid

3.31 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to repeat a statement on improving access to justice that is being made in the other place by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor.

At present, the legal aid system is failing us all. The system is failing the millions of people on modest incomes who do not qualify for legal aid and simply cannot contemplate going to law because they would have to pay legal costs if they lost, and it is failing people on legal aid, because the Government cannot direct money to those who need it most and to those cases where there is a public interest in seeing justice done. Finally, the system is failing the taxpayer, who, year on year, is being asked to pay more and more, but can rarely get help from legal aid when it is needed.

Although legal aid is costing us more and more as costs run away, ahead of inflation, it is helping fewer and fewer people each year. It is, therefore, our intention to modernise the way in which civil cases are paid for. We want a system of civil justice which is there for everyone when they need it, not just the rich or the very poor. We intend to transform the legal aid scheme to ensure that we get good value for money from lawyers who are paid from legal aid, and so that we spend taxpayers' money on those who need it most and on those areas where it can do most good.

Achieving all our reforms will require the approval of Parliament through new primary legislation, but, even using existing powers, we can start the process of change. It is on that first stage that I wish to concentrate today.

The publication of the consultation paper marks the first stage of our modernisation of legal aid and legal services. When my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor announced the programme of reform at the solicitors annual conference in October last year, he said:

"it is essential that the details" of our proposals

"are right . . . We shall be consulting widely and openly".

That is precisely what we have been doing in the four months since October, and will continue to do for a further two months of the formal consultation period. This is a listening Government: we are listening to views on these proposals, and will continue to do so. We have had detailed discussions with the legal professions and with many interest groups—and more are planned. Their comments have contributed to the development of the proposals, but we shall not confine our listening to the legal profession, because our aim is justice for all.

The consultation paper invites views on a proposal that will allow the majority of people in England and Wales to secure access to justice. We propose to allow conditional fee agreements—no win, no fee agreements—to be used in all except family and criminal cases.

Conditional fees offer a new way for people to bring their cases. Lawyers share the risk of litigation with the client by agreeing to work without a fee if the case is lost. If the lawyer is successful, he is entitled to a success fee in addition to his normal fees. Although the maximum success fee can be up to 100 per cent., normally it is 50 per cent. or less. In nearly all cases, the lawyers also voluntarily limit the success fee to no more than 25 per cent. of the damages in any event. Conditional fees have been available since 1995 for a limited range of proceedings—personal injury, insolvency and human rights cases—and they are working well.

More than 30,000 people have taken advantage of this approach to bring personal injury claims. Many would have been unable to afford to pursue their claims without conditional fees. I refer to people who are only just above the legal aid limit—people who are far from well off. They constitute the great majority of the population who are in work, with families, mortgages and savings—or other assets—that mean that they are not eligible for legal aid, but who cannot contemplate the open-ended commitment of meeting lawyers' bills. Only the very rich can face the thought of lawyers' bills without any financial fears, and even they must worry sometimes. To continue to restrict narrowly the use of conditional fee agreements is to deny an avenue of access to justice to the majority of people.

The consultation paper seeks views on any changes to the current law and practice that might improve the operation and use of conditional fees—for example, by allowing the success fee and the insurance premium to be recoverable from the losing party. It also invites views on the Government's plans to begin modernising legal aid. Over the past seven years, the cost of civil and family legal aid has tripled to some £671 million. The average cost has grown from £1,442 to £2,684—53 per cent. above the rate of inflation. The number of acts of help funded in 1996-97 fell by about 39,000. Taxpayers are paying more and getting less. That cannot be right, and it cannot continue.

We need a modern legal aid system, in which only cases that cannot reasonably be funded in any other way, and which have the necessary priority, are backed by the taxpayer. It has never been our intention to abolish civil legal aid, as has been wrongly claimed. We want to focus taxpayers' money where it is most needed and can do most good—on matters connected with social welfare, such as employment, housing, dealing with debt, state benefits and actions against officialdom and bureaucracy. To achieve that clear focus on social welfare issues, the Government intend most money or damages claims to be funded through conditional fees in future. Consequently, they propose to transfer most money and damages claims currently supported by legal aid to the conditional fee system.

However, as my noble and learned Friend told the other place on 9 December, we do not intend to remove legal aid from housing cases, in which the main purpose of the action is often to achieve a home fit to live in. That is precisely the kind of case to which legal aid ought to be directed.

In addition, the ability to challenge public authorities through judicial review is a necessary check on the use of the power of the state, and a positive encouragement to maintain high standards in public administration or public bodies. The poor must also be able to exercise that right of challenge.

Legal aid will remain available for those who qualify. We also believe that legal aid must continue to be available when a person claims to be the victim of wrongdoing by public authorities—for example, the police. There, too, the ability to challenge misdeeds is an encouragement to maintain high standards and proper behaviour to those over whom public bodies exercise authority.

The extension of the availability of conditional fee agreements will provide an alternative means for people to bring most money or damages claims without public funding. Our aim is to create conditions in which anyone—regardless of financial status—can use conditional fees to bring cases, across the whole range of litigation in which the main remedy sought is money or damages. However, we recognise that the current financial structure of solicitors' firms may not allow that, and that the insurance and finance industry needs time to develop products to assist in the expansion of the use of conditional fee agreements. The Government therefore propose a measured approach to encouraging this change to take place.

The Government propose to remove most personal injury actions from the scope of legal aid by the middle of the year. Lawyers working in that area have considerable experience of taking cases using conditional fee agreements. Similarly, the insurance industry has developed products, with premiums that, in most cases, are about £155 or less. The Government will work with the insurance and banking industries to help them develop more and even better products to allow everyone, regardless of their financial standing, to bring cases using conditional fee arrangements. That combination—the experience of lawyers in that area of litigation, and developed insurance products—is sufficient to allow such cases to be alternatively financed through conditional fee agreements.

In addition, there are certain categories of proceedings that the Government believe no longer have sufficient priority to command continued public funding. It is important that scarce public funds are directed to where help is most needed. The Government are not persuaded that cases that involve, for example, disputes arising from the course of running a business, inheritance, partnerships or trusts meet that criterion. Nor do we believe that taxpayers' money should be used to help neighbouring landowners to settle boundary disputes. In those cases, there will be assets at issue, which would allow the case to be taken with a conditional fee arrangement. In any case, the issues will generally be too narrow or too specific to deserve the use of public money, when such support means less for other matters of greater public importance. The consultation paper seeks views on the proposals to remove those categories from the scope of legal aid.

The Government have been listening carefully to comments that we have received regarding medical negligence cases. The Government believe that many lawyers practising in that area need to modernise the way in which they run their firms, so that they can structure their finances to enable them to take cases on behalf of clients, regardless of their financial standing. However, we accept that it will take time. Therefore, the Government do not propose to remove such cases from the scope of legal aid for the present.

However, we intend to do what we can to reduce the high failure rate of such cases. It cannot be right that only in as few as 17 per cent. of the cases that are supported by a legal aid certificate is more than £50 recovered in damages. Medical negligence cases should be conducted by practitioners who are experienced in that field of litigation. We cannot any longer allow inexperienced practitioners to take such cases. I have no doubt that part of the reason why the failure rate is so high is that lawyers take such cases without the necessary experience. Therefore, they are unable to make timely, informed decisions on the merits of a case, or on whether an offer of settlement is appropriate, or reasonable in amount.

It serves no one's interests if cases are brought with little prospect of success—least of all the victims of the alleged negligence. Therefore, the consultation paper invites views on a proposal to allow only experienced practitioners to take cases on behalf of assisted persons in that field. We propose that the Legal Aid Board should establish contracts only with lawyers of sufficient experience. Anyone who is granted legal aid to pursue a medical negligence case will be required to use a lawyer who holds a contract with the board. We are keen to hear what criteria could be used to establish whether a lawyer is sufficiently experienced to hold a contract to take cases on behalf of those receiving legal aid.

We intend to remove the remaining money or damages claims from the scope of legal aid as experience of conditional fees among lawyers and insurers develops and they become more widely and readily available.

The Government recognise that, during a transitional period, help will be needed to assist in the transfer of funding away from legal aid. There may be some extraordinary cases among the categories to be removed that lawyers may not initially be able to support fully on conditional fee arrangements. The Government believe that, in time, it will be possible for such cases to be financed solely by conditional fee agreements. Therefore, the Government intend to establish a limited transitional fund. That fund would provide support, for example, in cases involving very high costs—few lawyers' firms are financially structured to carry such cases, because they could not afford the risk of losing—or where there are high investigative costs of establishing the merits of the case.

We expect the need for the fund to support such cases to cease because we believe that, in the long term, those cases will find lawyers whose practices are financially structured to take them on under conditional fee agreements. The transitional fund would also provide help in cases that we exclude from legal aid but which demonstrate a significant wider public interest. That would allow us to start to provide assistance in that type of case under the transitional arrangements, ahead of primary legislation to establish a public interest fund. The size of the transitional fund will be set each year according to other priorities for spending legal aid money and the diminishing extent to which the fund is needed.

The Government will develop a modernised legal aid system. We are working toward a system in which we can control expenditure; obtain good value for public money; and target legal aid where there is the greatest need and it will do most good.

In future, the Government's main priority for using public money to provide legal services will be to assist those who are excluded from society because they are unable to exercise their legal rights. The Government will achieve that through the legal aid scheme and through the creation of a community legal aid service.

The consultation paper sets out the steps towards that goal that can be taken now: making conditional fee agreements more widely available; targeting civil legal aid on social welfare matters; and creating a special fund for public interest cases.

We shall welcome responses to the consultation paper and will consider them carefully before arriving at considered decisions on specific proposals to bring before Parliament.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I begin by thanking the Minister for giving me an advance copy of his statement after lunch, and for giving the press an advance copy after dinner last night. Does he accept that the Lord Chancellor's plans, which were announced at the Law Society conference in Cardiff in October, were ill thought out, socially divisive, economically illiterate and politically inept? Does he not recall that the Lord Chancellor proposed to abolish legal aid for money claims, largely personal injury cases, and to replace it with conditional fee arrangements? Does he agree that everyone, apart from the Lord Chancellor, knew that, far from increasing access to justice for the least well-off, his proposals would deny access to justice to a great many people who, thanks to legal aid, are currently able to get to court?

Does the Minister not agree that, far from staunching a financial haemorrhage in the legal aid budget, the Lord Chancellor was intent on abolishing the very part of the system that the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), an experienced personal injury lawyer, says makes the Treasury a profit, while doing nothing at all about legally aided family and criminal law cases which most certainly need to be looked at? That still seems to be the case, judging from the Minister's statement.

Does the Minister further agree that the Lord Chancellor launched his new policy in October without having had any real discussions with the insurance industry, the professions and consumer and welfare groups? Is it not the case that they are all deeply sceptical and that, as a result, the Lord Chancellor is deeply unpopular? The Minister will recall the speech by the present Lord Chancellor at the Bar conference in 1996 when he said:

"Supporters of legal aid must never cease to emphasise that it is a highly successful public social service."

Does he not recall the Lord Chancellor, then the shadow Lord Chancellor, saying:

"In civil cases which reached judgments in 1995 to 1996, there were judgments in favour of the assisted person in 81 per cent. of the cases. The proportion of cases where there was either a settlement or judgment in favour was 91 per cent"?

Does he not also recall the then shadow Lord Chancellor saying:

"Personal injury litigation as a category was conspicuously successful. Obviously the greater the success rate, the closer the legal aid system can approach self-funding. These success figures tell against any argument that legal aid is generally granted too readily"?

No doubt the Minister recalls those words very well.

The Minister says that, over the past seven years, the cost of civil and family legal aid has tripled to £671 million. What analysis has he done to discover the reasons for that increase? He made a similar complaint in the House in November. Surely by now he should have done his homework and found out why there has been that increase.

May I congratulate the Minister on having finally grasped the point that I put to him in November, which is that many solicitors' firms, especially those in the smaller towns and urban communities outside the big centres of population, cannot afford to carry conditional fee arrangement claims, and there is also no adequate insurance available to protect litigants? He says that the Government will work with the insurance and banking industries to develop products that will enable everyone, regardless of financial standing, to bring personal injury claims. Why did not he start that work last year?

I welcome the Minister's decision to think longer and harder about medical negligence cases—which, again, he should have done last year. Will he also look at industrial diseases claims in the same light? Will they remain within the scope of legal aid?

Will the Minister tell us more about the transitional fund? How long is "transitional"? How big will it be? Are there to be restrictions on its use? For example, will it be available only to assist in claims for £100,000 or more? The Minister says that it is available for public interest cases. Will they also be limited to claims for £100,000 and over? When will the preliminary legislation come before Parliament?

The Minister also referred to his consultation paper. In the context of the Lord Chancellor's Department, that must be an oxymoron. When, precisely, will the consultation period close? Last November, I described the Government's proposals—accurately, as it now turns out—as a thorough mess. Yesterday, the Lord Chancellor said that other events that he was being questioned about by the Public Administration Committee were no more than a storm in a tea cup. Does the Minister agree that if the hand on the saucer were a good deal steadier, we would not have to put up with these troubles, and nor would the hon. Gentleman have had to make this statement?

Mr. Hoon: I am just a little disappointed that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) chose to prepare his case on the basis of the rhetoric that he might use to address a jury, rather than on homework that he might have done were he to address a High Court judge.

On the hon. and learned Gentleman's first point, if he had read the Lord Chancellor's speech at Cardiff a little more carefully than he appears to have done, he would have noticed that my noble Friend said that it was the Government's intention to abolish legal aid for most money claims. Most money claims does not mean all money claims. Indeed, our proposals, if carried through, will result in 60 per cent. of money or money damages claims being removed from legal aid.

I am also disappointed that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not give the Government credit for listening carefully to the responses to a four-and-a-half-month period of consultation. In his speech at Cardiff, my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor stressed on no fewer than 12 occasions his determination to consult all those affected. Precisely because we have consulted and listened, we are able to bring forward this consultation paper today—which, in any event, will allow for a further two-month period.

[Mr. Hoon]

In answer to one specific question, I anticipate that the consultation period will end on 30 April, after which the Government will reflect upon the answers to the questions set out in the paper and bring forward proposals for Parliament ultimately to decide upon.

There is no doubt that the Government intend to look more carefully at family and civil law cases in general. I anticipate that, whenever opportunities arise, the Government will bring forward further proposals for primary legislation that will affect the existing rules on the granting of legal aid in this area.

I continue to be impressed, if I may say that, by the hon. and learned Gentleman's ability to avoid answering any questions on the subject. In particular, the House would be interested in his observations on legal aid and whether he judges that its present cost is too high, too low, or about right. In the course of the various opportunities that the Government have afforded to the hon. and learned Gentleman, he has not answered those quite important questions. It is quite easy to come before the House and criticise; I have yet to see any example of the hon. and learned Gentleman explaining the Opposition's policy in these important areas, which affect the great majority of citizens in our society.

The purpose of the transitional fund is to make available financial support for important cases between now and whenever primary legislation is approved by Parliament. That will not necessarily be limited to cases involving costs of more than £100,000, although clearly that is a useful guideline for the sort of support that might be available. In particular, the purpose of the transitional fund—as, indeed, will be the purpose of a public interest fund, assuming that Parliament approves such a proposal—is to allow those who have cases that are dependent upon important matters of public interest to bring those matters before the court and have those important issues resolved.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I welcome the Minister's proposals on legal aid, particularly as they affect housing cases. Perhaps we should consider whether, when a housing case is won against a public corporation or other body, it should be beholden upon lawyers to obtain costs on behalf of the legal aid fund. Is he aware that if, as is proposed, the small claims court extends its jurisdiction to cases involving up to £5,000, there is a risk that some housing cases might fall within the category in which legal aid would not be available and costs would not be recoverable?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. I appreciate his concern, and assure him of the importance of housing matters to the Government. However, the jurisdiction of the small claims court is a matter for separate consultation. We are carefully considering the matter and have received representations on it. I shall certainly take his views into account.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Will the Government let us know, first, what research they have made into conditional fees—a system that is riven with conflicts of interest? Last year, the Policy Studies Institute concluded that it was far too early to gauge the effectiveness of those fees.

Secondly, who will pay the insurance premiums of the poorest and most deprived in our society, who will now be denied legal aid?

Finally, what are the Government's views on using a contingency legal aid fund as the best means of opening access to justice to middle-income Britain?

Mr. Hoon: Research has been conducted—the hon. Gentleman mentioned the PSI research, which was not nearly as depressing in its conclusion as he suggests. PSI's report stated:

> "Many of the potential problems identified before conditional fees were introduced seem to have been successfully addressed."

On balance, the institute felt that the operation of conditional fees had been successful.

I add to that a further piece of evidence: more than 30,000 cases have now been agreed to be taken under conditional fees. Moreover, the rate of negotiation of those agreements has increased month-on-month and year-on-year, presumably as lawyers get more accustomed to operating under such agreements.

My Department has not received a single complaint on the operation of conditional fees funding—in contrast to the complaints that I receive daily on the deficiencies of legal aid. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will have had constituents writing to them and appearing at their surgeries to complain about the operation of legal aid, whereas, in my knowledge, constituents have not been complaining about the operation of conditional fees funding, which seems to be remarkably successful.

We continue to study carefully proposals on the operation of various contingency funds which have made to us by the Bar and by the Law Society. However, as our consultation document says, we are concerned that if we allow development of conditional fees and the creation of a fund, there is a clear danger that the best cases will be dealt with on a conditional fees basis, leaving weaker cases to the fund—therefore making it unlikely that the fund will be financially self-sustaining. Both the Bar and the Law Society are attempting to deal with that problem, and we await with interest the outcome of their efforts.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does the Minister agree that one factor in the escalating cost of legal aid is the reduction in union membership? The fact is that, 20 years ago, there were 30 million trade unionists, every single one of whom would be represented free of charge—either by their union representatives, or by lawyers paid for by their representatives—in cases of personal injury at work, allowing them to make their case. Now, the number of trade unionists is just over 6 million, creating a gap that has undoubtedly made a massive contribution to the number of people in various types of employment who have to go to legal aid. We will have to take that factor into account.

Will the Minister take it from me, and from others, that one of the biggest issues in legal aid that the Government will have to address is that, regardless of what legal aid system is introduced, we are not convinced that people such as the Maxwells and the Levitts will be deprived of large legal aid sums—which should be going to the many thousands of people who want to fight their little case on its merits with the help of the legal aid system? That is the problem. How will the Government deal with multi-million pound fraud cases? Will those cases continue to get those sums?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the excellent schemes operated by trade unions and their lawyers, which provide effective, specialist representation to a wide range of people who receive support as a result of their trade union membership. Indeed, my hon. Friend may well have seen towards the end of last year an interesting suggestion from John Monks on behalf of the Trades Union Congress that those schemes should be extended to people who are not trade union members, so that the expertise available could be used to benefit the generality. That is something to which we refer in the consultation document. It is an interesting development which I hope my hon. Friend would welcome.

On my hon. Friend's second point, about people in receipt of legal aid in large-scale fraud cases, I assure him that the Government will continue to bear down on those who seek to secure legal aid when they are not financially eligible. It is vital for the integrity of the scheme that we channel legal aid to those who need it, not to those who are disguising their assets overseas or elsewhere.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): May I welcome the Minister's statement that his Department is looking further at the contingency fee fund concept? Within the profession, there is a feeling that if a choice has to be made between contingency fee funds and conditional fee agreements, there would be a strong preference in favour of the contingency fee fund because it avoids the conflict of interests already referred to and because it avoids the necessity of plaintiffs having to find the insurance premium.

On the question of medical claims and legal aid being confined to lawyers who have special expertise in that sphere, does the Minister understand that he will be creating monopolies, and that in many areas—for example, rural areas—there will be no lawyer to whom a plaintiff can turn for advice and assistance?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for the right hon. and learned Gentleman's support. On the question of a fund, I suspect that he is speaking unconsciously on behalf of the Bar, which would probably prefer a fund to the arrangements that are currently in place. I am not entirely sure that the Law Society would prefer a fund in place of the opportunity for its individual members to take forward conditional fee agreements. However, that is clearly a matter for the professions, and we would await with interest the outcome of their deliberations.

I also suggest that it might well be possible to create a fund in a narrower category of cases, that it might be appropriate to establish a fund in discrete areas of litigation. Indeed, the Government are seriously considering taking appropriate powers, whenever Parliament might approve such a course, that would allow the creation of such funds. That might well be a way of reconciling the right hon. and learned Gentleman's concerns with mine.

I appreciate the right hon. and learned Gentleman's comments about medical negligence cases. These are sensitive and difficult cases which require extensive investigation before any return can be made. That is why the Government are convinced that it is appropriate only for those who are experts to conduct such litigation. While the right hon. and learned Gentleman makes a good point about the importance of securing access to local justice and of having a lawyer available nearby, I hope he will agree that it is much better to have a lawyer available who knows what he or she is talking about and who has dealt with that kind of case before, rather than simply to go down the road to someone who might recently have done one's conveyancing but who knows nothing about medical negligence.

Mrs. Sylvia Heal (Halesowen and Rowley Regis): Having been a magistrate for more than 20 years, I am well aware of the value of legal aid and, indeed, of the rising cost of legal aid. However, I am also aware that many people do not qualify for legal aid. Can my hon. Friend assure me that the Government's proposals will be fair to those people who currently do not qualify for legal aid?

Mr. Hoon: I very much appreciate my hon. Friend's comments. The complaints that I referred to earlier, which people bring to their Members of Parliament in writing or at their surgeries, generally turn on financial eligibility for legal aid. The way in which successive Governments have controlled the cost of legal aid has been by bearing down on eligibility. Clearly, one option available to this Government to restrict the cost of legal aid is simply to continue to bear down on eligibility; to take out more and more people so that, ultimately, only a handful of people would qualify for legal aid. That was not the course on which we decided. We believe that it is much better to try to find the appropriate means of funding cases. That is why we propose an extension of conditional fee agreements. That will make the legal aid fund go further and allow us to concentrate it on those people and areas of real need. I hope that, in that way, I will be able to satisfy my hon. Friend's concerns.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): The Minister will know that I have an interest in expert witnesses in personal injury cases. I wonder whether he can say more about how expert witnesses will be paid for. Some lawyers are telling them, "You should share the same risk as me, whether we win the case or not." That is inappropriate because the expert witness is supposed to be giving unbiased evidence to a court. What will the Minister do about that and how will he ensure that the losing litigant will not face a massive bill at the end? We must remember that the Department of Social Security is the first to be paid after a personal injury case is paid out.

Mr. Hoon: I shall confine my remarks to personal injury and I hope that that will satisfy the hon. Gentleman's concern about expert witnesses. Expert witnesses appear in a range of cases. I share the hon. Gentleman's reservation at the prospect of such witnesses sharing in the costs of a case. One of the great weaknesses that we have identified about the way in which civil litigation operates is the development of an expert witness industry, where expert witnesses are available for any argument that a lawyer wishes to advance. Too many cases are made expensive simply because both sides have teams of expert witnesses and, inevitably, have to pay for them.

[Mr. Hoon]

I look forward to a day—these are proposals contained in our consultation document on reform of the civil justice system—when expert witnesses are genuinely expert and give objective advice about a case. In those circumstances, it is important that their fees—as the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) said, they can be considerable—are paid for. That is why we believe that it is important to establish the conditions in which lawyers, the insurance industry and, where appropriate, the banking industry can work in partnership to fund certainly the more expensive cases, and to seek the development of the insurance products that will allow for the cost of expert witnesses to be properly met.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I broadly welcome my hon. Friend's statement. The fact that he has obviously taken on board many of the representations made in the past few months is a cause for celebration, not criticism. It was always inevitable that there would be teething troubles with such a radical change. As long as he is prepared to listen to the representations made from benign quarters, I see no long-term problems with the changes.

On medical negligence, should not we be moving towards no-fault compensation for the most serious cases? They can sometimes drag on for up to seven years and that is in nobody's interest except the lawyers.

Mr. Hoon: Benign is not a word that I have often associated with my hon. Friend, but I can see that I am wrong. I appreciate his support. The figures for recovery in medical negligence cases show that only 17 per cent. of cases produce recovery of more than £50. The average recovery appears to be about £4,000, with £4,000 paid in costs to achieve that. That makes a strong argument for no-fault compensation.

There are other difficulties about no-fault compensation that we would have to address. This might be one of the areas where such an approach is appropriate and, together with colleagues from other Departments who have a clear interest in this matter, we will be considering carefully whether that is the appropriate way of taking these cases forward.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): While I welcome the Government's aim of reducing the burden of legal aid on the taxpayer, is not the Minister concerned that making solicitors' firms bear the financial risk in some cases is an unbearable burden for smaller firms and makes the lawyer personally involved in his or her client's case? Is he not concerned that there is a danger that the objective nature of the legal profession itself will be undermined?

Mr. Hoon: May I deal first with the point about whether solicitors can afford the costs of this sort of approach? The Government have commissioned some research by KPMG into the business case for solicitors' firms undertaking much of their litigation under conditional fees. The report has been received and will be published in due course. I hope that the hon. Lady will study it with care and decide, in the light of the research conducted, whether or not it is possible for small firms to conduct widespread conditional fee arrangements. We must bear in mind the fact that lawyers earn their money from a number of different sources, of which legal aid is one; and legal aid will continue to be available in range of cases.

Conditional fees, particularly as we propose to extend them to the great majority of cases, will extend the opportunities of the great majority of citizens to take legal cases before the court. I said that only the very rich and the very poor are currently in a position to take cases before the court. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that our proposals will open up access to justice for the great majority of people in our society. That should provide lawyers with financial opportunities that are not currently available to them.

I appreciate the hon. Lady's concern about lawyers being involved in their clients' cases and that potentially affecting their judgment of what is appropriate. However, I hope that she accepts that there is no evidence so far of that happening under the conditional fee agreements that have been concluded to date.

Moreover, the fears to which I referred when replying to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) have not been borne out in any of the research. Indeed, in the more complex cases, there will in any event be a member of the Bar who ought to be able to bring a degree of objectivity to bear on the assessment of the case. We should see a degree of partnership developing between solicitors and barristers in the assessment of risk in given cases and the appropriate level of recovery.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. We cannot continue with these long questions and very long answers. I understand the complexity of the statement, but I should like to call as many hon. Members as possible and for that we need to have shorter questions and answers.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): As a specialist personal injury solicitor, may I ask my hon. Friend whether he agrees that, if fewer cases succeed under the revised proposals, the Government could be a net loser; and that the acid test will be whether more cases succeed? In that context, I welcome the proposal to extend the recovery of the success fee and insurance premium from insurance companies, as opposed to taking them out of the victim's pockets. Will my hon. Friend comment on whether block contracting will still be permitted as part of these developments?

Mr. Hoon: We anticipate that more successful cases will be brought as a result of these proposals, because one of the advantages of allowing lawyers to participate and risk their own funds in the prosecution of cases is that they will have an interest in selecting good cases to take forward. We believe that that is a good thing. As for my hon. Friend's various more technical points, I hope that he will accept that we are concerned to take forward a modernisation of the justice system and that contracting will be a feature of it.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): The Minister used the word "modern"—naturally—several times in his statement. Why is it necessarily modern or right to move in the American direction, towards a highly litigious society plagued by unscrupulous lawyers, in which doctors and others who work in the public interest are saddled with huge insurance costs?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept for a moment that we are moving in the American direction. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that we are seeking to achieve a situation where only good cases are brought before the courts and our courts are not occupied by cases of dubious merit that are drawn out over weeks, months or even years. That will be precisely the opposite of the American experience. We do not intend to go down that route.

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): One of the attractions of conditional fee agreements is that they should free considerable resources to enable us to extend our community legal service. That will be of great assistance to my constituents in the inner city, where legal advice is often thin on the ground. Will my hon. Friend tell us about the time scale for the community legal service and when we can hope to see some flesh on its bones?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's observations. Unless we can control the cost of the existing traditional legal aid system, we shall not have the resources to create a community legal service. Work is being conducted as a matter of urgency in the Department. A team has been established to develop proposals for a community legal service. I hope to be able to tell my hon. Friend the outcome of that work as soon as possible.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): The Minister skated over the crucial issue of the affordability of insurance premiums for those poorer households that want to go down the conditional fee route. Which insurance companies has he spoken to? Have they given him reassurances that they can price insurance policies so that the premiums are affordable to the poorest?

Mr. Hoon: Ministers and officials in the Department have had meetings with a range of insurance companies. The speech in Cardiff last October in which my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor set out the principles has concentrated minds remarkably. Lawyers are thinking more constructively. The insurance industry is interested in such work. The average cost of PI insurance is in the order of £155. Insurance products are being made available that will avoid those costs being borne by individual litigants who are unable to meet them. There are a variety of ways of funding insurance. A partnership between insurers and lawyers to sustain the costs of litigation in this developing market should satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): I congratulate my hon. Friend on having listened and on making it clear that this is not a cost-cutting exercise, but a means of redistributing the funds available. When litigants cannot afford to take out insurance, would it be possible for the premiums to be paid from the transitional fund? Would it be possible to extend legal expenses insurance, perhaps by tax relief, so that many more folk could choose solicitors without personal cost?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made valuable suggestions in the past. I am grateful to him for acknowledging that we have listened to him. I hope that he accepts that I cannot give him an answer today on his further suggestions, but we shall look at what he has said.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I have mentioned previously two savings that the hon. Gentleman's Department could make without affecting anyone. First, an appointments system in magistrates courts would save £42 million at a stroke. Secondly, in family and ancillary relief cases, arguments over the slightest issues can often result in lawyers' fees 10 or 12 times greater than the sums being argued about. May I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to those economies before he hits people who validly want to make personal injury claims and have no lawyer to take them on?

Mr. Hoon: The process of modernisation of the justice system will continue on a number of fronts simultaneously. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall consider carefully any proposals for saving money in the magistrates courts and on family cases. We shall establish a system of contracting, which will bear down on the considerable costs of family work.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in most areas of public expenditure, there are robust mechanisms to ensure the quality of the service that the public are paying for? Is the proposal for allowing perhaps only a limited number of expert firms to take on medical negligence work a first step so that in other areas where specialist legal knowledge is needed, we might examine ways of ensuring quality for people who depend on legal aid?

Mr. Hoon: That is exactly the direction in which the Government intend to go. I hope that the use of experts in relation to medical negligence cases will establish a useful precedent for the use of expert lawyers elsewhere. Once Parliament has approved any legislation that we bring forward, contracting will allow us to contract only with those who are expert and knowledgeable in particular areas of law. That seems a wholly welcome development, for the benefit of practitioners, and, above all, for the benefit of those whose cases go before the courts.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The Minister will be aware that many disadvantaged people use law centres to access the legal system. Law centres depend on voluntary workers, solicitors and bits of local authority spending. Does he envisage direct Government support for law centres as part of his legal aid reform package?

Mr. Hoon: Very much so. Indeed, in the summer, Parliament approved changes in statutory instruments that allow legal aid money to be used to pay the salaries of lawyers who work in law centres and for citizens advice bureaux and similar advice-giving agencies. As part of the community legal service, I look forward to an extension of that provision, to move the traditional legal aid away from simply supporting particular cases towards supporting institutions that are providing advice and assistance to those most in need.

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): I, too, warmly welcome my hon. Friend's statement. Does he agree that, parallel to the changes in the legal aid system, we need to be thinking about new ways of resolving disputes? I know that his Department is involved in developing protocols, for example. Does he agree with the Woolf inquiry recommendation that private ombudsmen or alternative forms of dispute resolution need to be encouraged?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend was a very distinguished member of the inquiry. He probably knows rather more about the details of the preparation than even I do. I am most grateful to him for his suggestions. The Government are determined to develop alternatives to going to court. Mediation is certainly one. A range of other options are available to us. Anything that can reduce the cost and time taken in litigation must be welcomed.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Does the Minister agree that one of the consequences of the proposals is that the power of the state will be greatly increased? The system will involve discrimination by the state about which categories of litigation should command state support through legal aid.

In that context, the Minister made a differentiation in ring fencing housing cases but excluded, as an example, disputes between neighbours over boundaries. It is my experience that disputes over boundaries often involve the harassment of a person with no means by a neighbour with considerable means and a willingness to resort to litigation, which makes the life of the former a complete misery. How is the distinction between the two categories of housing and boundary disputes to be drawn?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Member will forgive me for saying so, I did not entirely follow his reasoning about the power of the state. That may be my fault. I assure him that legal aid will continue to be available to those who wish to bring actions against the state in its various guises.

On neighbourhood disputes, the issue is not whether the state has an interest in determining who should or should not bring a case but whether it is possible to fund such a case—whether by legal aid or some other means. We are simply proposing—I hope that the hon. Member will respond to the consultation—that, in disputes between neighbours, particularly over where a fence should be or how much land is owned by one party or the other, a fund is available which allows such litigation to take place on the basis of conditional fees, rather than having to expend taxpayers' valuable and scarce resources on paying for such private disputes.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): May I welcome my hon. Friend's statement? Those who have been involved professionally in this area know that radical reform to improve access to justice is long overdue. However, as I am sure that he would agree, difficult questions need to be resolved. Will any fixed costs under any fast track for litigation which may be developed take into account the fact that, to some extent, solicitors will be using successful cases to subsidise unsuccessful cases?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend knows that the question of fixed costs and the regime that will operate are subject to separate consultations. He has made his views on the matter known on previous occasions. We are still considering the results of that consultation, and will continue to do so before bringing specific proposals before Parliament.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): On affordability, the Minister suggested that the figure of £150 or so, which would be way beyond the means of the poor, might be covered by some sort of further insurance for legal expenses. However, as the poor typically cannot afford to insure even the contents of their homes, would not taking out further insurance—unless they were forced to do so—be the last thing that they would think of doing?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry if I gave that impression to the hon. Gentleman. What, essentially, I would say about such cases is that there is no reason why innovative insurance products should not take up the cost of the up-front insurance—it is not always absolutely necessary for someone to pay the £150 in advance of litigation. Alternatively, there is no reason why a firm of lawyers, confident of the outcome, should not meet the cost of insurance in an appropriate case. I sought to explain that we expect partnerships to develop between lawyers and insurance companies, perhaps involving the banking sector, too, to allow such cases to go to court for such litigants.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): Like other Members, I am worried about medical negligence cases, especially the serious cases involving the death of a young breadwinner. Is my hon. Friend aware that many such cases are carried all the way almost to the day of entering court, when everything is almost proven, but that, at the last minute before the court hearing, solicitors try to put pressure on plaintiffs to drop cases or to accept paltry damages out of court, on the ground that the legal aid, which appears to have been capped, is running out? Does he agree that when so much legal aid money has been spent and the case is almost proven, it should go to court so that justice is seen to be done? I have given my hon. Friend an example of such a case, although obviously I cannot cite the details now.

Mr. Hoon: I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern, and I would certainly welcome from him in writing the details of any particular case; I hope that he will accept that it would not be appropriate for me to comment on a particular case at this stage.

It is unlikely that a legal aid certificate will run out. One of the problems with legal aid is often that once it is granted it supports a case to the conclusion of a court hearing, even when those who have heard the case might judge that it was not entirely appropriate for it to have been brought in the first place. The Department has received several representations from judges questioning whether legal aid should ever have been granted in certain cases.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that our proposals for medical negligence cases will guarantee access to legal aid for the moment for those who presently enjoy it, but will also point the way to significant change by ensuring that only those who are expert and specialist in the field will be able to act on behalf of plaintiffs. I hope that that safeguard will satisfy him that we are carefully considering the position of such plaintiffs.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): Several hon. Members have made suggestions about the best use of any savings to public funds that may result from conditional fee agreements. Can the Minister confirm that such savings will be available for use, rather than being returned to the Treasury? If so, what will be the role of regional legal services committees in deciding their own regional priorities on such matters as extending eligibility and paying for more local law centres?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his observations. I have made it clear that to fund our manifesto commitment to create a community legal service, the Government need first to bring the costs of traditional legal aid under control. When we have done so, we can consider ways of funding the community legal service. We see the regional committees as providing a local element in terms of identifying the needs of different parts of the country. In rural areas, there may be different needs and priorities, and we expect that the regional committees will be in a position to identify those and to communicate local needs and concerns to the Legal Aid Board.

Welfare of Broiler Chickens

4.29 pm

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to protect the health and welfare of broiler chickens kept in indoor husbandry systems.

It is almost two years to the day since my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) proposed a similar Bill. I thank him for his endeavours, and I pay tribute to Lord Beaumont for his work in the Lords on this matter. I should also like to thank Compassion in World Farming, and its legal and political officer, Peter Stevenson, for their assistance, advice and encouragement.

To avoid any confusion, I should point out that two flocks of hens are reared in this country. One, battery hens, is reared purely to provide eggs. That involves birds being kept in small cages. I have seen this, and I was not terribly impressed by the system. The other flock is broiler chickens, which are raised purely for meat. Over 80 per cent. of those birds are kept indoors in captivity.

I propose the Bill because the only legislation on the matter—which, in my view, is totally inadequate—is the Welfare of Livestock Regulations 1994. Although the regulations cover battery hens, cattle and pigs, there is no regulation covering broiler hens. This matter needs to be addressed and corrected. All we have at the moment is a Ministry of Agriculture code of practice which is inadequate in the way in which it addresses the density of birds on the ground and, according to the British Poultry Meat Federation—which is not sponsoring the Bill—is not adhered to and has no legal status.

There can be up to 40,000 birds in large sheds deprived of natural light. As long ago as 1992, the Farm Animal Welfare Council advised legally binding regulations, rather than leaving the matter to what is little better than self-regulation by the breeders.

The underlying problem is the selective breeding and rich diet feeding of the birds, which enables them to reach maximum weight in only six weeks—twice the speed of 35 years ago. This leads to endemic problems with the strength of the legs of the birds, and the failure to match the increasing body weight leads to crippling leg failure. Academic research has estimated that as many as 180 million birds per annum suffer in this way. The Farm Animal Welfare Council working group found such problems on practically every farm it visited.

Professor Webster, of Bristol university's veterinary school, has been particularly scathing after carrying out extensive academic research on the matter. It has been found that rapid forced growth affects the heart and lungs of the bird, and that the problem of dirty litter exacerbates the leg injuries. However, the British Poultry Meat Federation has objected to the wording of the clause in the Bill which refers to clean and dry litter.

I do not want to get bogged down in statistical nit picking. That has been used for many years in this House, and everywhere else, to try to cloud arguments. I will go no further than to refer to a judgment made last year by Mr. Justice Bell, who was dealing with the McDonald's libel case. He found that the overcrowding of the birds was "intentional and unnecessary", and, in his judgment, cruel. He found that the leg problems affected at least 7 per cent. of broilers. He also said that the welfare of between 7 and 31 per cent. of the birds was compromised by leg problems. I am not too concerned whether the percentage is seven or 31—whatever it is, it is too much. Regulations are needed to eradicate this unnecessary and cruel system.

The judge also examined the issue of broiler breeders—the small number of birds that are kept only for breeding. As they are fed so intensively in the early part of their lives, they have, in effect, to be starved so that they do not become too weak to breed, which leads to intense hunger and great discomfort. The judge said that it was highly likely that the birds felt hungry in human terms, because they spent an inordinate proportion of their time foraging, and consumed large amounts of litter.

Finally and most damningly, he stated:

"My conclusion is that the practice of rearing breeders for appetite, that is to feel especially hungry, and then restricting their feed with the effect of keeping them hungry, is cruel. It is a well-planned device for profit at the expense of suffering of the birds."

In his summary, he said:

"I find that there have been cruel practices relating to . . . the restriction of feed for breeders, the leg problems of broilers bred for weight gain, the stocking density in the last few weeks of the females' lives at least, the catching and handling of the broilers when caught for slaughter".

He also criticised some aspects of slaughter, although I shall not refer to them, as that is not the subject of the Bill.

I have given a copy of the Bill to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, although he has not commented on it to me. I have also given copies to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—which, when I have talked to it, seemed to be in favour—and to others. I urge all hon. Members, if they have not already done so, to watch the video produced by Compassion in World Farming, which shows graphically, far better than I could hope to describe, that the industry is barbaric.

The industrial spokesman of the British Poultry Meat Federation, Mr. Bradnock, did not invite me to visit any of the farms to which he referred. I accept that there have been improvements—largely because of public pressure; the public now perceive more clearly than ever before the value of animal welfare—but the industry and its representatives have totally refused to endorse any of the Bill's provisions.

The Bill would ensure that "the broiler chickens are stocked at a density which does not exceed 21 kilogrammes per square metre; the flock size does not exceed 3,000 broiler chickens".

It would also ensure that the chickens have legs that are strong enough to bear their weight, so that they can live in comfort. Density needs to be reduced so that flocks can be thoroughly inspected at least twice each day—any chicken that shows signs of discomfort can then be dealt with humanely.

Another of the Bill's provisions is that the litter should be kept clean and dry at all times. I should have thought that all hon. Members would accept that—unfortunately, the poultry meat industry will not. I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, who is present, will introduce Government legislation, because, as everyone knows, ten-minute Bills have little chance of being enacted. Nevertheless, I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bill Etherington, Mr. Vernon Coaker, Mr. Ivor Caplin, Mr. Ken Livingstone, Mr. Chris Mullin, Dr. Nick Palmer, Mr. Harry Cohen, Angela Smith, Mr. Terry Lewis, Sir Richard Body, Mr. Roger Gale and Mr. Nigel Jones.

WELFARE OF BROILER CHICKENS

Mr. Bill Etherington accordingly presented a Bill to protect the health and welfare of broiler chickens kept in indoor husbandry systems: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 13 March, and to be printed [Bill 136].

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not outrageous that we should have only 50 minutes left to discuss by far one of the most important parts of the Scotland Bill, because of the deliberate positioning of a long Government statement before it? Is there any way in which, in the interests of the House, the time can be extended?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point, but we are governed by a resolution of the House.

Orders of the Day

Scotland Bill

[6TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Considered in Committee [Progress, 23 February].

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Clause 81

SCOTTISH REPRESENTATION AT WESTMINSTER

Amendment proposed [23 February]: No. 258, in page 37, line 32, to leave out from the word 'is' to end of line 33 and insert the words

'120 per cent. of the electoral quota for England.'.—[Dr Fox.]

4.41 pm

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): I remind the Committee that with this we are discussing the following: clause 81 stand part.

Amendment No. 259, in clause 114, page 52, line 13, at beginning insert—

'Subject to subsection (3) below,'.

Amendment No. 260, in clause 114, page 52, line 17, at end add—

'(3) With the exception of an order relating to section 81, no order may be made under subsection (1) until each House of Parliament has approved any draft Order in Council which may be required to give effect to the first report of the Boundary Commission for Scotland to be submitted after 31st December 1997 under section 3(2) of the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986.'.

New clause 6—Restrictions on voting rights of Scottish members of House of Commons—

'As from the day on which the Parliament first meets, no member of the House of Commons representing a constituency in Scotland shall be entitled to vote in that House on any matter certified by the Speaker as relating solely to another part, or other parts, of the United Kingdom.'.

New clause 16—Restrictions on voting rights of Scottish members of House of Commons (No. 2)—

'Members of the House of Commons representing constituencies in Scotland may continue to participate in any vote in that House unless the Speaker deems the vote to relate to matters exclusive to England, or to England and Wales.'.

New clause 19—Restriction on voting rights of Scottish Members (Committees on English Affairs)—

'.—No member of the House of Commons representing a constituency in Scotland shall be entitled to vote in, or participate in any other proceedings of, any committee of that House established under any enactment or by the Standing Orders of that House, the functions of which are to consider matters exclusively in relation to England which are not reserved matters within the terms of Schedule 5 to this Act.'.

New clause 22—Voting rights of Scottish members of the United Kingdom Parliament—

'.—Scottish members of the United Kingdom Parliament shall by standing orders be entitled to speak but not to vote on matters which arise in that Parliament affecting only those parts of the United Kingdom other than Scotland.' amendment No. 259, in clause 114, page 52, line 13, at beginning insert—

'Subject to subsection (3) below,'.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The guillotine falls at 5.30 pm, so we have 50 minutes. I hope that the Lords have a serious discussion of the clause, because it represents a geological flaw in the Bill.

With the benefit of the marvellous advantage of hindsight, we can see that it is perhaps unfortunate that, in 1977, the late Enoch Powell invented the sobriquet "the West Lothian question" as shorthand for the real dilemma with which I wearied Michael Foot and the late John Smith, who was doing the job now performed with less overt bad temper by my hon. Friend the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution. If my hon. Friend entertains exasperations when I speak, he is better at concealing them than John Smith was.

I have come to believe that Mr. Powell did the argument a disservice, because the shorthand tends to camouflage the real dilemma, which is not about parliamentary niceties or, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State put it, the Schleswig-Holstein question, but about the exercise of power and the principle of direct relations between government and the governed. Power devolved is not power retained.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend says, "Hear, hear," and his interpretation is important; we do not want him, my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) and my other hon. Friends to feel deceived.

In practical terms, I do not suppose that matters will come to a head during this Parliament, in which one party has a majority of 180. The size of the majority submerges the problem. As soon as Holyrood, or Strathclyde house, or whatever we call it, is inaugurated, the Chief Whip will have to get along without my vote on purely English business.

The self-evident problem becomes acute when a Government party has to depend on its favourable majority in Scotland to get its English business through the House of Commons. Then the Government really will be asked: how come whoever is the Member of Parliament for Linlithgow or for Livingston can vote—and vote decisively—on policies for Liverpool and London on matters that not only English Members but Scottish Members cannot trespass upon in relation to Linlithgow or Livingston, unless of course, clause 27(7) will be operated differently from how we have come to believe?

To put it in practical terms, I suppose that it is really the Two Feathers in Hebden Bridge question so beloved of Bernard Ingham. I will spare the House the expletives, but the Two Feathers question is this, "What are all those . . . jocks doing coming . . . telling us what to do when they've got a . . . Parliament of their own?"

That is the question that will be asked. Therefore, my question is, how long can such a situation last? It simply cannot endure in anything like the form that the Bill proposes. Whatever else it is, the Bill is not a settlement. The deal must not be seen by the English majority, either at the outset or as experience builds up, as giving Scotland one-sided privileges and advantages of an unacceptable type and scale.

[Mr. Dalyell]

We all have to curtail our speeches, so the House will forgive me for reading one quotation from Sir Michael Quinlan, one of the cleverest civil servants of his generation, who was called in by John Smith to tackle precisely those problems. Writing in The Independent on 2 January 1995, Sir Michael said:

"But this leaves the enormous and still unanswered 'West Lothian' question . . . If we take away from Westminster and give to a Scottish Assembly effective law-making power over, say, education, health and transport in Scotland by what possible right do the 70-odd"— or 60-odd—

"Scottish MPs at Westminster continue to vote on education, health and transport for England? But if they are excluded, there stands to occur a situation—given particularly that, while Scotland is usually Labour, England is usually Conservative—in which there is a settled Labour majority at Westminster on some subjects and a Conservative one on others. (That would have been the case for certainly three and probably four of the five Parliaments in which Labour has governed since 1945.)

Such a political arrangement would not be coalition or even cohabitation. Given the interdependence, especially in tax and expenditure terms, of large areas of public administration, it is simply not possible to run coherent parliamentary government in this way."

That is the considered view of the civil servant who, along with Sir John Garlick, was asked by John Smith, Bruce Millan and Michael Foot to give his mind to the problem in the late 1970s. Sir Michael Quinlan's view at least has to be answered in depth, and it cannot be answered this afternoon before 5.30 pm. On Report or in the House of Lords, we should hear a considered Government answer.

Finally, judging by all the arguments so far, I see no reason to retract the view that I expressed constantly and daily during the referendum, that, unfortunately, we are on a motorway without exit to an independent state.

Mr. John Major (Huntingdon): I echo the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) about the utter unacceptability of the fact that the time permitted to discuss this, perhaps the most crucial and central part of the whole Bill—the part upon which this whole constitutional experiment may founder to the damage of the whole United Kingdom—has been squeezed by a statement that could have been left until tomorrow, and an important Bill on broiler chickens.

Mr. McAllion: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Major: No, I shall not give way. I have things to say that are more important than answering the hon. Gentleman's questions.

I am delighted to speak after the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Throughout the consideration of the Bill, he has bravely identified the difficulties inherent in it, as he did with its predecessor many years ago. He and I do not always agree. In Hebden Bridge terms, there have been moments when others, not myself, might have referred to him as a . . . nuisance, but the way in which he has campaigned against a very bad and blatantly wrong Bill that is self-evidently damaging to the United Kingdom redounds strongly to his credit. I much admire what he has done.

This bad Bill will do more damage to the United Kingdom than any Bill for generations, and will institutionalise advantages for Scotland and for Scottish Members of Parliament. The Bill will do more: over time, it will institutionalise resentment against Scotland and Scottish Members of Parliament, which is not a light matter for those of us who care about the unity of the United Kingdom.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Major: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not. Many hon. Members want to speak, so I shall be brief.

The key point—

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): The right hon. Gentleman has not attended a debate before today.

Mr. Major: The debate is brief because there is a guillotine at 5.30 pm, and the Government have outrageously wasted most of the available time.

The key point—what has become known as the West Lothian question—is the way in which the Bill will unbalance the constitution. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow said, what the Bill proposes is unsustainable. Bluntly, what justification is there for Scottish Members of Parliament being able to vote on education, health and other matters affecting my constituents in England, when they cannot vote on those matters as they affect their own constituents?

There is no logical reason for Scottish Members of Parliament being able to vote on matters that affect the English, the Welsh and the Northern Irish, when English, Welsh and Northern Irish Members of Parliament will be unable to vote on those matters as they affect people who live Scotland.

What would happen—the hon. Member for Linlithgow touched gently upon this point—if a Government party had an overall majority in the United Kingdom, but was in the minority in England?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): What happened when the Government party was in the minority in Scotland?

Mr. Major: If the hon. and learned Gentleman cares to look back, he will see that previous Labour Governments have sustained a majority with Scottish Members of Parliament. The difference is that the Bill proposes that the Scottish Parliament will have exclusive responsibility for certain issues and the power to tax. If he does not understand that, he should listen to the debates and then contribute.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Major: No, the hon. Gentleman can make his speech in a few moments.

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Mr. Lord. The former Prime Minister, for whom I have some regard, seems to be unaware that we are continuing a debate that we were having 10 days ago. Is it in order to attend the second half of a Committee debate and refuse to take interventions?

The Second Deputy Chairman: It is up to right hon. and hon. Members to decide whether to take interventions.

Mr. Major: I shall deal with that point briefly. Of course the debate was going on the other evening, but it was agreed that there would be a further two hours of debate today. There has not been a further two hours of debate, and some hon. Members who want to speak on this issue will not be able to do so. I intend to be brief so that the hon. Gentleman can contribute, if only he will cease interrupting.

I return to the point about what will happen in England. Will the English be treated less favourably constitutionally than the Scots under this Bill and the Welsh under the Government of Wales Bill? That is not sustainable. With their majority, the Government can drive the Bill through the House, and show every intention of doing so. I beg the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution to consider what that will do over time to opinion in England. Does he really want to arouse nationalism across an England that resents the Scots and the Welsh? I do not want that to happen; yet I fear that the nature of the Bill, and the way in which the Government are driving it through the Commons, will lead to such an outcome.

Is there a credible answer to the West Lothian question? Not without a rebalancing of the constitution once the Bill has become law, as it now almost certainly will.

Mr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Major: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not.

No one in the House has any doubt about my feeling on the issue over many years. I have never made any secret of the fact that I think that the sort of constitutional change that is proposed is very short-sighted. It is being introduced for party political advantage, and over time—a long time—it will backfire. I am concerned about the long-term future of the United Kingdom, not the short-term advantage of politicians who see some advantage in supporting the Bill at the present time.

The only gainers from the Bill, over time, will be those who genuinely favour—the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) does, and has made no secret of it—a separatist Scotland, a Scotland broken away from the rest of the United Kingdom. The Government, who claim that that is not their position, will have to answer at the bar of history for having brought about circumstances that may create exactly that eventuality.

If the Bill goes through, it will be necessary to bring about further constitutional change to minimise the damage and the resentment across the United Kingdom that the Bill will create. I do not know whether that means an English Parliament—which I do not myself favour—an English Grand Committee, or some other stratagem. Clearly, much more thought will be needed than we can give this afternoon, but changes there will undoubtedly need to be once the Bill is on the statute book.

I say that changes will have to come, because the constitutional vandalism of this ill-thought-out pig's breakfast of a Bill will demand further change elsewhere in the United Kingdom to protect the position of people elsewhere in the United Kingdom, and to protect the working practices of the House.

Sir Robert Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Major: Surely the hon. Gentleman heard me say that I would not give way. I want as many hon. Members as possible to be able to speak.

I have made it clear repeatedly over the past seven years, and over the past few months when the Bill has been contemplated, that I absolutely understand, and admire, the sense of national pride in Scotland. No one disputes that. I believe, however, that the Scots will find that the menu that has been laid before them is a menu without price. There is a price to be paid, in Scotland and elsewhere—

Mr. McAllion: You paid the price.

Mr. Major: If I did, I paid the price for standing up for what I thought was right for the United Kingdom. I did not stand up for what I thought was right for Labour party political interests, which is what the present Government have done.

Scotland cannot have extra privileges; it cannot have more public expenditure; it cannot have excessive representation in the House; and it cannot have constitutional advantages over the rest of the United Kingdom—if that United Kingdom is to remain united, as I wish it to. This is a divisive Bill. Let us not mince words. Not so much in the short term, as in the long term, the Bill will damage the unity of the United Kingdom dramatically. It brings change, and it will create a demand for more change. It is a constitutional whirlwind, and we will reap the harvest—not just in the House, where we can cope with our procedures, but in regard to something far more important and far more long-standing: the unity of the United Kingdom itself.

On that issue, the House may not be able to make changes in the Bill, given the majority in favour of it; but the time will come when those who railroaded it through will have to answer for what they have done, and others will have to correct the errors that they have made.

5 pm

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): It is a privilege to follow the former Prime Minister. However, it is fair to say that he has espoused views that were espoused during the general election campaign; views that led to the Conservative party's representation in Scotland being reduced from 10 seats to no seats—"Nul points", as one would say in the Eurovision song contest—and which led his party to the biggest defeat in living memory in a British general election.

The British people have taken account of the arguments that the former Prime Minister makes, and rejected them decisively. The Scottish people had the opportunity to hear the views of the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the debates before the referendum, and almost every part of Scotland rejected those views overwhelmingly. Is it not significant that the only Scots that the right hon. Gentleman can find to argue his case are those who could not get elected in Scotland, but had to flee south of the border to find a safe seat in England? In Scotland there is no support for his views.

Those who seek to destroy the Union speak with the former Prime Minister's voice, and that of the nationalists. The status quo before the general election was not sustainable. Scots made it clear that they wanted to retain the Union, but that they wanted a system of devolved authority—which, I am glad to say, the Government are setting up.

However, I return, if I may, to amendment No. 258. I took the trouble to be in the Chamber during the previous discussions on this matter and, although I welcome the former Prime Minister's belated interest in these matters, it is significant that this is the first time, I believe, that he has attended the Committee.

The Conservative amendment suggests not that Scottish representation should be reduced to the same level as that in England and Wales, but that it should be reduced even below that, so that the electoral quota for Scotland should be 120 per cent. of that for England. Evidently the Tories have written off Scotland. They realise that they are, and will remain, unpopular there, so they intend to play the English nationalist card.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned Enoch Powell, I recalled how Enoch Powell used to deplore racism while he was stirring it up. Those who deplore English nationalism while stirring it up are doing the same thing. They are trying to pander to the worst in our society because they have no positive suggestions to make on this subject, or on many others.

I do not accept that England is an undifferentiated mass. I have been struck by the welcome given to Scottish devolution by many people in England who want something similar for their part of the country. I believe that differing speeds of devolution will develop throughout England and Wales. I believe that the constitution of this country can accept anomalies; that it can accept differences; that it can accept different ways of progressing.

If the House is supreme, I see no reason why it cannot decide that some matters will be devolved to Scotland, to Wales, to London or to the north of England, without shattering the essential community of the kingdom. It is not as though powers were being devolved in a way that bypassed the House. A decision of the House will devolve those powers. In that way, the House, having taken that decision, is consciously deciding to live with the elements of anomaly that might flow from it.

My hon. Friend the former Member for West Lothian, now the hon. Member for Linlithgow, made a very interesting contribution. I enjoyed his speech of resignation from the Labour Whip. I am struck by the extent to which all Labour Members except "Oor Tam" are out of step. The basis on which Labour candidates stood at the general election was quite clear, and we clearly presented our case to the electorate. It is also clear that his arguments about Labour Members feeling obliged to refrain from voting on other matters did not reflect Labour's policy.

The poll tax was imposed on Scotland by the votes of English Members. In Committee and in the House, I and many others watched local government in Scotland being butchered against the will of the overwhelming majority of Scottish Members by an English majority. That was accepted to some extent because Scotland was part of the Union, and Parliament had decided how such matters were to be arranged. Similarly, it is reasonable and fair to conclude that, when Parliament determines that there is to be devolution, those who were previously in government and who call themselves democrats should be prepared to accept Parliament's democratic will.

The tactics that are being adopted, especially by some of those who I thought had the seniority and experience to know better, remind me of the baby who throws his rattle out of the pram because it cannot get its own way. It is about time the Opposition accepted that they lost the election, that we and those who support us have a clear mandate to implement our policies, and that we intend to do that.

I welcome the fact that the Tories have written off Scotland, and that they will presumably decide not to put up candidates for election to the Scottish Parliament. That gives us an even greater prospect of a large Co-operative party representation in that Parliament.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I join my right hon. and hon. Friends—

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Mr. Lord. To my certain memory, Scottish National party Members were standing in the earlier debate and were not called. They have been rising in this debate and have not been called. Has the Chair taken any cognisance of the fact that the Scottish National party currently has four times the public support of the Conservative party in Scotland and that we have a right to have our view heard in the Committee?

Sir Robert Smith: Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord. Liberal Democrat Members also rose in both debates, and we have a distinctive Scottish view to put to the Committee. That view takes some of what Conservative Members were trying to achieve but puts it in a constructive form to try to get something out of the Government. That voice has not been heard in Committee. Amendment No. 258 has not been exposed to scrutiny in terms of its threat to the Union because of the way in which it debases the Scottish voter on United Kingdom issues. Those issues should have been put to the Committee.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord. Do you agree that it does not add to the dignity of Parliament when the most important constitutional issue that faces us will receive a total of one hour and 15 minutes debate?

The Second Deputy Chairman: It is for the Chairman to select who will speak and I remind hon. Members that points of order use up the little time that is left.

Mr. Ancram: I should like to respond to the points of order by the hon. Members for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith). It may not have occurred to them that, for the first time in our discussions on the Bill, we are debating the impact of constitutional reform on the rest of the United Kingdom. For that reason my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) and some of my hon. Friends who are not Scottish Members have a direct interest in the matter. I, too, deplore the fact that the debate has been curtailed. That does not bode well for the spirit of agreed programmes in future. I give notice that I shall seek to return to that issue on Report.

The debate on the amendment, which was ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) is simply about unfinished business. We face a constitutional vacuum that has been created by a process of one-sided devolution. If that vacuum is left unfilled it will in time seriously destabilise our constitution. It is caused by the residual imbalance that has been left by unilateral devolution to Scotland and has become known as the West Lothian question, but which more accurately should now be known as the English dimension.

The debate is largely, if not exclusively, about the role of Scottish Members of Parliament at Westminster after devolution and the constitutional propriety of their being able to vote on English matters which, because of devolution, they cannot vote on in relation to their own constituents. It points to the inevitably part-time nature of the Scottish Member of Parliament at Westminster after devolution and the consequent dangers of de facto marginalisation. It foreshadows the potential for mutual alienation between Scots and English, which was so rightly foreshadowed in the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon.

It is because of those dangers and because of our interest in avoiding them that we believe that they must be faced up to now. If ever there has been a time for not burying the political head in the sand, this is it. Even if the manner of its announcement through the columns of The Scotsman this morning was a gross insult to the House, the Government's new-found readiness to take the question seriously, at last, must be welcomed.

This debate is not about doing down the Scots or stirring up the English, however much nationalists and others would like to portray it as such. That suggestion not only insults the intelligence of both Scots and English, but irresponsibly disregards the fundamental problem.

Sir Robert Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: No, I shall not give way as time is short. The hon. Gentleman knows that I am usually very good at giving way, but I want to make my speech and give others the opportunity to speak.

If we do not begin to explore now how the problem might be resolved, we will live bitterly to regret it in years to come. Even the Government, if The Scotsman was right this morning, now realise that. The amendments were tabled to begin the exploration. I am sometimes asked why we have only now started on this process. The reason is simple—the question has arisen only because of this Bill. What, in terms of the referendum, was a Scottish debate exclusive in its franchise to Scotland, is now a United Kingdom debate because the outcome of the Bill will impact upon the constitution of the United Kingdom as a whole.

There are no simple answers and no quick fixes. There are no off-the-shelf constitutional solutions. We must identify the options or the elements from which solutions might be drawn and then evaluate the feasibility and desirability of any particular approach. For those reasons, the amendments are, by definition, probing. They are the early pieces on the board. There is only one that we will press to a Division because of its immediate significance, as I shall explain later.

Amendment No. 258 deals with the number of Scottish Members of Parliament at Westminster after devolution. It stems from the principle already enshrined in the provisions of the clause that devolution removes the justification for the relative over-representation that currently exists in favour of Scotland in the Westminster Parliament. The clause would establish relative parity—but I have to say that changing the numbers will not, of itself, answer the West Lothian question. Numbers are the symptom rather than the cause. They are not, and never have been, a constant, but they can play an important part in creating both the perception and the reality of fairness and balance.

If we are to understand the dangers of the constitutional vacuum in relation to numbers, we must look at the role of the Scottish Member of Parliament at Westminster after devolution.

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian) rose—

Mr. Ancram: I have said that I will not give way.

By definition, the Scottish Member of Parliament at Westminster, after devolution, will have far less to do than his English counterparts. Leaving aside the time-consuming constituency mail bag, which would largely disappear, the Scottish Member of Parliament would no longer be able to ask parliamentary questions on domestic constituency matters such as housing, health, education, roads, planning and so on, or take part in debates on those matters. How much of what is left will be taken up by English matters, questions, debates, votes and other issues relevant to the United Kingdom Parliament? If the English aspects are taken away, what will be left?

On any view, the Scottish Member of Parliament at Westminster, after devolution, will be part time and will be seen to be part time. Dangers flow from that. The lessons of Northern Ireland and Westminster during the Stormont years are salutary. Would the same effect of marginalisation of Scottish Members of Parliament occur after the Scottish Parliament is up and running? Would the part-time perception of those Members of Parliament further exacerbate resentment if strictly English business was carried on the backs of their votes? Those of us who believe in the Union Parliament see those as real dangers that must be averted. To do that, we need to look at the question of numbers in this context, even if, at this stage, it is only to probe.

There is one further important issue relating to numbers and boundary changes, which arises under amendment No. 260. Under the provisions of the Bill, there will be an inevitable reduction in the number of Members of Parliament after the boundary commission's report, which in turn will mean a commensurate reduction in both categories of Members of the Scottish Parliament. Under the Bill, within five years of being set up and Members being elected, the Scottish Parliament will be subject to a cull. Between 25 and 30 of the 129 MSPs will disappear. It is hard to see how that can be in the best interests of an infant Parliament striving to establish itself, knowing all the time that it is about to be reduced, but not knowing how or where, and with its Members constantly living under the threat of the axe.

It therefore makes sense that if such a reduction is to take place, it should happen before the Parliament comes into being. Our amendment would achieve that. It would not cause any delay because if the boundary commission immediately began its work under the revised criteria, there is no reason why it should not be completed and implemented in time for the elections to the Scottish Parliament. If the Government do not accept the amendment, I give notice that, at the appropriate moment, I will press it to a Division.

5.15 pm

I want to look at the pieces on the board relating to the English dimension. One that was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is the Government's initiative to create regional assemblies in England. He rightly warned that it would be the thin end of the wedge to the Europe of regions, and, indeed, there is no evidence of any widespread demand for such regionalisation in England. It does not arise out of the amendments before us, so I add only that it would not, in any event, answer the West Lothian question, unless those regions were given legislative powers which are not even available to the National Assembly for Wales. In fact, it is part of a different, if no less worrying agenda.

That leads me to the three most obvious options that offer themselves to resolve the constitutional vacuum, which is the main object of our amendments. The option of an English parliament, separate from this Parliament, was mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Rochford and Southend, East and for Woodspring. It was canvassed in a private Member's Bill in January by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). It would certainly resolve the immediate problem, but it would create others. This Parliament would be left effectively as a federal parliament which, without major reform, would contain none of the checks and balances that a federal system would usually require. It would encapsulate the problem that, of the four elements within the United Kingdom, one—England—would represent more than 80 per cent. of the whole. The imbalance would be overwhelming and almost impossible to resolve with any degree of overall fairness. I can think of no comparable example elsewhere from which we might seek answers to the problem, but it must nevertheless remain a piece on the board.

The concept of an English Grand Committee is raised in new clause 19, which again is designed to probe. It now appears suddenly to be the preferred option of the Government, possibly brought about by the honourable pressure exerted by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I have already made clear my view of the deplorable way in which the Government made known that preference, but it begs certain questions about which I have already written to the Secretary of State. I am sorry that he is not here this afternoon to answer them. However, I want to reiterate them.

We want to know the status given to the proposal—we want to know if it is agreed Government policy. Has it been discussed by the Cabinet or is it merely something that has arisen internally from the Scottish Office? Why was the announcement of an English Grand Committee made public in a briefing from the Scottish Office, when it relates exclusively to non-Scottish matters? Are we to expect proposals to be put before the House to achieve that policy at the same time as the provisions of the Scotland Bill become operative?

There are a number of difficulties in that approach. What has been proposed would have to be more than the usual Grand Committee, which is ultimately subject to the authority of this House as a whole. For example, it would be required to take all stages of legislation relating to England, or England and Wales, if it were to resolve the West Lothian question. That would immediately raise questions about the status of the Westminster Parliament while the English Grand Committee was in session. It would also raise the financial questions alluded to by the hon. Member for Linlithgow last week. Without its own resources, what would be its relationship to the Treasury, which would inevitably remain a United Kingdom Department? In the event of financial conflict, which of the two would govern, and could a United Kingdom Government with a small majority reliant on Scotland actually pursue an economic policy of any consequence?

The final obvious option—which might be described as designation—merges in our new clause 16 and in new clause 6, which was tabled by my hon. Friends the Members for Rochford and Southend, East and for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), whereby Scottish Members could not vote on matters certified as being exclusive to England and Wales.

Designation is seemingly the neatest and simplest answer to the English dimension. However, it would immediately create two categories of Member of Parliament at Westminster and threatens the concept of a Union Parliament, in which all Members of Parliament are equal. It would also again beg the financial question: what restraint would be put on English Members in not undermining the overall economic strategy of the United Kingdom Government, while still allowing them to exercise their exclusive legislative rights? The potential for conflict immediately becomes apparent.

In yesterday's newspapers, the hon. Member for Linlithgow unilaterally declared a self-denying ordinance of voluntary designation. Although I have no doubt that he would honourably abide by such an ordinance, he knows—he alluded to it himself in this debate—that the pre-1972 Ulster experience was not so secure and was not without its price. That experience ran seriously into the shoals in 1965, when Northern Ireland Members attempted to reverse their marginalisation and to reassert their involvement in the major political and economic issues of the day by voting on steel nationalisation—which did not impact directly on Northern Ireland, although its wider economic effects certainly did. The unhappy reaction of the then Prime Minister, Harold Wilson, provides a good example of the difficulties of designating with any precision or fairness in those circumstances.

Therefore, there is no option which is not in some way constitutionally flawed—although that does not mean that we should simply jettison all options. There may be variants or combinations of options that are as yet unexplored. There may be other, undiscovered options with which current options can be melded. That is why this debate, and the wider debate outside the House—which I hope that we are helping to generate—are so important.

The corrosive question of the English dimension will not go away. Its consequences may not be immediate, but that is no excuse for ignoring it. Neither is it sufficient to say that we would not have started from here, and simply walk away. An answer must be found, and that answer must be found before the problem arises. When the problem arises—as, one day, it inevitably will arise—it will be too late, and the fires of nationalism that will ignite on both sides of the border will tear at the heart of the United Kingdom.

We will not resolve the problem today; but the search for a solution starts today. We must not fail.

Mr. Salmond: I should like to spend a couple of minutes on the mean-spirited and foolish speech by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). On the Friday before the general election, I spent the evening in Northampton with the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), where we participated in a bout of "Any Questions"—during which I was cheered to echo in middle England, and the former Chancellor was booed off the stage. If there had been an election that night at that meeting, the Scottish National party would have won Northampton. On that programme, I asked the then Chancellor of the Exchequer if he could name one instance this century in which any piece of domestic English legislation had been dictated by the votes of Scottish Members, and he could not give one single example.

If we contrast that record with how, on one occasion after another, and on one issue after another, two successive Prime Ministers—Lady Thatcher and the right hon. Member for Huntingdon—forced down the throats of the Scottish people specifically Scottish legislation, the breathtaking temerity of the former Prime Minister in talking in this debate about the unacceptable theoretical possibility of the same happening in reverse is obvious.

I do not object to an English Parliament—I think that it would be a thoroughly good idea—and I have absolutely no objection to an English Grand Committee. In the House, I have never knowingly interfered in English domestic business unless it had a clear Scottish implication. What I find totally unacceptable is the mean-spirited and divisive nature of the former Prime Minister's speech—crowding out hon. Members who spoke in the first half of the debate, and showing the House the face not only of English nationalism but of English prejudice.

Sir Robert Smith: Amendment No. 258 deserves to be fully exposed for the threat that it is to the Union. The former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) was very unwise to speak in a debate at the Bill's Committee stage without interacting with Committee members. Had he taken interventions, he might have been able to explain to voters in Scotland why—for some reason—he thought that, on United Kingdom issues, one of their votes should be worth only 83 per cent. of the vote of an English voter. If ever there were a threat to the Union, it must be amendment No. 258, and the thinking behind it. In speaking to the amendment, the right hon. Gentleman advocated denying Scottish voters the same representation in the House on United Kingdom issues as other United Kingdom voters enjoy.

It is far more important for the Government—in attempting to develop a way in which English Members of Parliament deal with only English issues—to take on board the spirit of new clauses 6, 16, 19 and 22. The history of the poll tax demonstrates, at least to Scottish Members, how bad it is for hon. Members to decide legislation that will not affect their own electors. Such a practice is bad in all circumstances.

In our declaration to the constitutional convention, we argued that if legislation has been devolved by one Parliament, it should not be voted on by representatives of that Parliament. We should like a slightly better settlement, by using the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to decide disputes. We should like the Government constructively to consider our proposals.

The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office (Mr. Henry McLeish): I should like, by way of preamble, to say a few words about the speech by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). I do not think that phrases such as "constitutional vandalism" or "dogs' breakfast" are worthy of him. On 11 September, a very loud democratic voice was heard in Scotland—when 1.7 million people voted for a Scottish Parliament and 1.5 million people voted for tax-varying powers. The principle underlying that result should be respected by all hon. Members—regardless of whether they are a right hon. or hon. Member, or whether they are in or out of government. The people have spoken, and it ill behoves the House to undermine that in any way.

I tell the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) that we have absolutely no plans to consider an English Parliament or an English Grand Committee.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): What about this article in this morning's press?

Mr. McLeish: There was absolutely no foundation in that article—[Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. It is quite outrageous for the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) to behave like that. He should know better. Will he, please; behave himself. An apology is called for.

Mr. Jenkin: I apologise without reservation.

Mr. McLeish: I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Essex for his apology.

The important issue in this debate is the concern of Conservative Members. In asking the Committee to reject this group of amendments, I stress that the official Opposition are attacking the fundamental rights in the House of Scottish Members in the post-devolution era. It simply cannot be right to go down that very dangerous road. In a speech last week, the right hon.

[Mr. McLeish]

Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) mentioned four aspects of the West Lothian question that he would like to explore, although I shall deal with only one. The second aspect he mentioned was

"the withdrawal from Scottish MPs of their voting rights over all legislation that does not apply to Scotland. In other words, the creation of a two-tier Westminster Parliament."

That is the nub of the speeches made by Conservative Members in this debate. New clause 19 would apply the same standards—to exclude second-class Scots from voting in the House.

There should be no two-tier mentality in the House. Conservative Members cannot get away with blustering and expressing synthetic indignation. The simple fact is that, under that smokescreen, they are attempting to move in a very dangerous direction. There is simply—

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): On a point of order, Mr. Lord. Can you advise the Committee, Mr. Lord, whether it is in order for the Minister to say that something is utterly impossible, whereas the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has volunteered to do precisely what the Minister is criticising?

The Second Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. McLeish: I make a point of truth, Mr. Lord: in the Committee's previous five sittings, the official Opposition have scurried around, pretending that they are being supportive and respectful of the decision of 11 September—but nothing could be further from the truth. We hear talk of an English nationalist backlash. That worries me, but how real is that in the mind of the English people, as opposed to being solely in the mind of Conservative Members? If Conservatives pursue this idea, they are being anti-Union, anti-Scottish and anti the spirit of the devolution measures. Of course, that is the reality. They can pretend that they are concerned, but we have tonight exposed a core truth about the Conservative Opposition. They cannot face the results of 11 September or the fact that the Bill will strengthen the Union and is an excellent contribution to democratic accountability.

I ask the Committee to reject the amendments for the reasons that I have outlined so that we can move on and ensure that we have a strong Bill. That is the intention of the Government, the Liberals and the nationalists but not that of the Conservative Opposition—

It being half-past Five o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [23 February], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN then proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 81 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 82 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): On a point of order, Mr. Lord. As a matter of courtesy, I have tried to give the Leader of the House notice of this matter. When the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons produced its unanimous report, my right hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House and I commended it to the House and were glad to do so. We saw it as a constructive attempt to ensure better and more regulated scrutiny of business, and we were happy to agree to the programming of legislation.

When the Committee stage of the Scotland Bill was decided on, we readily agreed to the programming arrangements. We had no wish to frustrate the will of the Scottish people. We had no wish to filibuster, as has been evident from all the debates, but we were anxious to ensure proper, decent scrutiny of this most important constitutional legislation. However, this afternoon we have witnessed the frustration of the spirit of agreement into which we entered by the fact that the Government made a long statement which took up a full hour of the time allocated for a crucial element of the Bill.

Had the Government had to come to the House to make a statement about the situation in the Gulf or some matter of prime international importance, we would of course have accepted that it should take precedence. However, we do not believe—[Interruption.] I am seeking to make my point with cogency and courtesy, which cannot be said of the reaction of Labour Members.We do not believe that the statement this afternoon fell into that category. The spirit of the recommendations made by the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House is at risk because if what has happened this afternoon is what is going to happen to crucial legislation, we cannot co-operate.

The Second Deputy Chairman: They are not matters on which I can rule today, but I have no doubt that everyone has heard what was said and that those with responsibility for these arrangements will review matters in due course.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Further to that point of order, Mr. Lord.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I do not think that there can be anything further to that point of order. We have dealt with it thoroughly.

Mr. Cash: With respect, Mr. Lord, you cannot know until you have heard my point of order. The Secretary of State for Scotland has just come into Committee. We have witnessed a disgraceful exhibition which was an attempt to curtail the debate, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) pointed out. The Secretary of State did not have the courtesy to reply to the debate. Is not that a matter of the utmost importance? Is not it also a disgrace and a discourtesy to the Committee?

The Second Deputy Chairman: The time allocated to the debate was decided some time ago.

Clause 83

CROSS-BORDER PUBLIC BODIES: INITIAL STATUS

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth): I beg to move amendment No. 96, in page 38, line 25, after 'enactment', insert 'or by Royal Charter'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 256, in page 38, line 27, leave out from second 'functions' to end of line 28 and insert

'which relate to or affect Scotland'.

No. 93, in page 38, line 28, leave out from 'Scotland' to end of line.

No. 426, in page 38, line 28, leave out

'do not relate to reserved' and insert 'relate to devolved'.

No. 97, in page 38, line 29, at end add—

'(7) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (5), the following bodies are cross–border public bodies for the purposes of this Act—

(a) the British Broadcasting Corporation,

(b) the Independent Television Commission,

(c) Channel 4,

(d) Channel 5,

(e) the Radio Authority, and

(f) the Radiocommunications Agency.'.

No. 100, in schedule 5, page 66, line 28, at end insert—

'The functions of the Radiocommunications Agency in relation to Scotland (but not the international negotiations for the allocation of frequencies for the provision of radiocommunications services in Scotland).'.

No. 101, in page 66, line 28, at end insert—

'The disposal of that portion which is collected in Scotland of the total revenue from the imposition of fees for wireless telegraphy licences under Part I of the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949.'.

No. 98, in page 75, line 32, after 'Corporation', insert

'except as regards the financing of services provided by BBC (Scotland), the appointment of a national governor representing Scotland, and the appointment and removal of the members of the Broadcasting Council for Scotland.'.

No. 99, in page 75, line 32, at end insert—'Exceptions from reservation—

The powers and functions of the Independent Television Commission in relation to—

(a) the licensing and regulation of regional television services for Scotland provided for under Part I of the Broadcasting Act 1990, as amended by Part III of the Broadcasting Act 1996,

(b) the licensing and regulation of digital television services exclusive to Scotland,

(c) the licensing and regulation of local cable services in Scotland, and,

(d) the promotion and funding of Gaelic television programmes services in Scotland.

The powers and functions of the Radio Authority in relation to—

(a) the licensing and regulation of radio programme services in Scotland,

(b) the promotion and funding of Gaelic radio programme services in Scotland.'.

No. 311, in page 75, line 32, at end insert—'Exception from reservation—

The appointment of the National Governor for Scotland of the British Broadcasting Corporation and the appointment of a Scottish member of the Independent Television Commission.'.

No. 413, in page 75, line 32, at end add—'Exception from reservation—

The promotion and funding of Gaelic broadcasting in Scotland.'.

No. 466, in page 75, line 32, at end add—Exception from reservation—

The Parliament may require the annual report of the British Broadcasting Corporation and the Independent Television Commission to be laid before it.'.

Ms Cunningham: I propose to speak to amendments Nos. 96 to 101 and No. 256 which stand in my name and those of my colleagues. I shall deal with them in two groups—one relates to clause 83 and the other to schedule 5—although they are all, in the main, to do with broadcasting.

I shall speak first to amendments Nos. 96, 97 and 256. This set of amendments returns us to the vexed question of the powers of the Scottish Parliament vis-a-vis bodies not dealing with devolved matters or bodies and individuals based outside Scotland. We had an extensive debate on the generality of this subject when we discussed clause 23, the amendments thereto and the powers of the Parliament to require the submission of evidence, both oral and written, so I shall try hard not to reprise the whole of that debate.

Clause 83, however, differs from clause 23 because it specifically designates bodies that are to be defined as cross-border public bodies. In the guidance notes provided when the legislation was published, clauses 83 to 85 were described as fulfilling the commitments given in paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper which, in my view, they manifestly fail to do.

I have read the paper placed in the Table Office yesterday. Among other things, it states:

"The White Paper . . . indicated that the Scottish Parliament will be able to require the submission of reports and the presentation of oral evidence from bodies" which have devolved interests, but have United Kingdom or Great Britain remits at present. However, in the Bill, that particular power will relate only to devolved matters.

The paper goes on to state:

"The commitments given in the White Paper in respect of such statutory bodies are given effect to through clauses 83 to 85 of the Bill."

As I said, that is manifestly not the case.

Of necessity, I am going to have to repeat some of the sentiments expressed in the debate on amendments to clause 23. In particular, I want to cite once again paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper because it is important to remind hon. Members of what was originally promised. Paragraph 2.11 states:

"In certain reserved areas"—

I stress the word "reserved"—

"the activities of other UK/GB bodies which are accountable to the UK Parliament will continue to be significant in the economic or social life of Scotland, and therefore likely to be of interest to the Scottish Parliament. The Government propose that the Scottish Parliament should be able to invite the submission of reports and the presentation of oral evidence before its committees from bodies operating in reserved areas in relation to their activities in or affecting Scotland."

I emphasise the fact that the paragraph deals with reserved areas.

The definition of bodies given in paragraph 2.11 was that they would "continue to be significant in the economic or social life of Scotland".

[Ms Cunningham]

The paragraph then gives some examples of such bodies. I shall not list them all—I have done that before—but, suffice to say, they include, inter alia, the BBC and the Independent Television Commission. Between the White Paper being published and the Bill being published, that has all disappeared.

The promises made in paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper are not allowed for in clause 23; nor are they in clause 83. Not a single example given in the White Paper of cross-border public bodies has found its way into any of the guidance notes, the list of what the Government regarded as cross-border public bodies when the legislation was published. As far as I can see, not a single one of those bodies appears in the list appended to yesterday's note that was placed in the Table Office.

I have asked before and ask again now, as I have not yet received a satisfactory answer, where, precisely, is the commitment given in paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper? Where is it implemented in the Bill? Why have the Government turned their back on their promise?

The Government have changed the whole definition without a single word of explanation and we are left with an emasculation of that commitment. Cross-border public bodies, as newly defined, must include among their functions those relating to devolved matters. That neatly excludes from the slightest accountability not just the entire list in the White Paper, but many other bodies as well, even the Scottish Law Commission; that must rank up there in the top 10 list of idiocies in the Bill.

Amendment No. 256—and amendment No. 93, which stands in the name of many Labour Members—would restore to the legislation the definition clearly envisaged in the White Paper, if not the whole of the original intent. The amendments would bring back into the definition the list in paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper, which includes the BBC and the ITC. In that way, we can be absolutely certain that we shall at least have reports laid before us, even if we are to be denied the ability to require the submission of evidence. We shall have to make do with "inviting" and hope that, in the case of some of the organisations, it does not mean inviting until the cows come home.

Amendments Nos. 96 and 97 are clear in their intent and move us on to the Scottish National party's concern about the position of broadcasting when the Parliament is up and running. Notwithstanding any other decision that might be made in respect of clause 83 or schedule 5, the BBC and the ITC would then have some minimum obligations to the Scottish Parliament—I stress the word "obligations".

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Lady referred to the SNP's concern. I am not asking this in a hostile spirit, but what is the basis of that concern? I have not fully understood.

Ms Cunningham: The basis of the concern is the issue of accountability for vast areas of Scottish life that are incredibly important, but about which we shall not even have the ability to require people to come and give evidence.

This set of amendments is, in the main, to do with broadcasting, but it touches on a wider issue on which we have already had a substantive debate under clause 23. Clause 83 is about different groups of bodies. My contention is that the definition of those bodies clearly changed between the publication of the White Paper and the publication of the legislation.

Mr. Salmond: I have an advantage over my hon. Friend because I have been watching the visage of the Secretary of State during her speech. He seems to be puzzled by my hon. Friend's words. I am tempted to believe that this may be due to confusion on the part of the Scottish Office; perhaps it did not mean to miss out the list. Perhaps my hon. Friend will help the Secretary of State and point out to him, once again, how things have changed from the White Paper to the Bill.

Ms Cunningham: I simply refer the Secretary of State back to paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper which states that the bodies covered are bodies that deal with reserved areas but which "will continue to be significant in the economic or social life of Scotland".

The long list of bodies appended to that paragraph includes, in every case, bodies whose interests and concerns are in purely reserved areas. None of that appears anywhere in the legislation. What was clearly envisaged was that, although the bodies do not cover devolved areas, there would be an element of accountability to the Scottish Parliament for their functions within Scotland. Effectively, that has disappeared. The Secretary of State still appears to be puzzled, but, perhaps when the debate is finished, he should have a careful look at the difference between the White Paper and the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 98 to 101 all relate to exceptions from the reservations contained within schedule 5. In their entirety, they would provide a measure of devolution of broadcasting which was a surprising omission from the White Paper and the legislation. It was surprising, because it is clear from all I have read that many people, including broadcasters, simply assumed that that would be included and were mightily surprised when it was not. Supporters of the call to devolve broadcasting to Scotland include a former BBC controller, Pat Chalmers, Ruth Wishart, who I believe is a close friend of the Secretary of State, and the broadcaster Colin Bell. They are all supporters of the pressure group, Voice for Scotland. I chose them particularly because I suspect that they cover a range of political opinion, but are united on this one issue.

Mr. Wallace: There does not seem to be a Tory.

Ms Cunningham: Finding a Tory in Scotland these days can be difficult.

All those people recognise that we are debating a scheme in which responsibility for the arts, education and Gaelic are all devolved, while responsibility for broadcasting is not. That means that all aspects of cultural life are covered, except broadcasting. There will be a separate Scottish Arts Council, but no body responsible for broadcasting.

5.45 pm

An article written by Ruth Wishart, which appeared in The Herald on 2 March, makes that cogent point. She points out that there is a "natural logic in broadcasting being part of the devolutionary package."

Ruth Wishart uses the Scottish Arts Council as an example of what arguments can be put forward and how pointless they can be. She says that the arguments being used against broadcasting now are the same as those used against the Scottish Arts Council ceasing to be involved with the Arts Council of Great Britain. She says that it would be almost unthinkable to imagine a situation where the Scottish Arts Council was not in the position that it is now, especially given the advent of the Scottish Parliament. She says that broadcasting is in the same boat.

I am grateful to Ruth Wishart for pointing out another interesting example which she says—I agree with her—is an indication of what can be the big difference between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. She says that consideration of any two newspapers produced in London and Scotland on the same day would show that the editorial priorities are obviously different. She says that if the same test is applied to television and radio, in many ways, Scotland is short-changed. Her view on that is fair and is held by a number of people.

Broadcasting is a key part not just of cultural life, but of the political process. Those of us who are politically active in Scotland—that is the Labour party, the SNP and the Liberal Democrats—already know that, in many respects, the political debate is quite different from the debate in the rest of the United Kingdom. The advent of the Scottish Parliament will make that difference even sharper. At least one Scottish journalist—Simon Frith writing in The Scotsman on 28 November 1997—questions whether, if we continue with the present arrangements, broadcasters will be able to play their role properly in that debate. There will only need to be another "Panorama" debacle for the issue to be at the forefront of the Scottish Parliament's concern. It will be nonsensical if the decision-making process is left to the London-based establishment after the Scottish Parliament is up and running.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): Am I to understand that the hon. Lady wants a devolved Scottish BBC? Will she explain how that would work? Would there be a separate royal charter for Scotland because the BBC is rather different from a statutory body? How would it be managed? On a boring, practical point, can she say a little about the financial arrangements? What would be the impact of the change on the financial arrangements?

Ms Cunningham: If the Secretary of State cares to look, he will see that one of our amendments deals with the issue of licence fee income and the repatriation to Scotland of that portion which is raised in Scotland, which is one way in which to deal with the matter. As for his other point, as I understand it, it is perfectly possible within the context of the current charter to devolve and it would be interesting if that debate were to take place. If there has to be a separate charter, let there be a separate charter, but that is something with which we can deal in the fulness of time.

Mr. Dewar: That is a very interesting point. The hon. Lady says a separate charter is not needed, because we can devolve broadcasting in Scotland within the BBC charter. I think that she is quite right. It follows that the matter has nothing to do with legislative devolution and a lot to do with persuading the BBC that there should be devolution within that body and likewise persuading other bodies of a similar nature. This issue is not about legislative regulation and the words in schedule 5, but about the spirit in which the BBC and other bodies approach the challenge of devolution and the consequences of that for the United Kingdom.

Ms Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman may be correct. Perhaps those bodies will not need persuading and will do it off their own bat—if they did, that would be excellent. However, there is to be a review of the BBC's funding base in 2001 and a charter renewal in 2003 and, although the Scottish Parliament will be well into its deliberations by then, it will have no official role to play in those events—not a single word said in the Scottish Parliament will have any direct effect on either of those deliberations. No doubt, the Scottish Parliament will debate those matters and, no doubt, various persons from the BBC within and—I hope—outwith Scotland will respond positively to invitations to give evidence; but the bottom line is that the Parliament will not have any official input to any part of that debate.

I gather that there was a conference on Friday last week which was addressed by the Secretary of State, among others. It was referred to in the article by Ruth Wishart that I have already mentioned and in an article by Magnus Linklater, writing in Scotland on Sunday this Sunday past. Both writers picked up on the Secretary of State's comment that he was not saying that devolved broadcasting would mean kailyard programming. However, by making that statement, the right hon. Gentleman was the one to throw it into the pot and, having raised the possibility, however negatively, it becomes like the elephant in the courtroom—impossible to ignore. Such a view displays an astonishing degree of self-loathing, especially given some of the programming to which we are already subjected daily. I am happy to note that, according to Magnus Linklater, it was not the view of a majority of the conference that anything like that would happen if broadcasting were devolved.

Mr. Salmond: I am certain that it is not the view of the Secretary of State that devolved broadcasting would be kailyard broadcasting, but I seem to remember a speech by the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office, at the Edinburgh festival last year, in which he forcefully advanced that argument. Although I do not recall his using that exact phrase, he argued that broadcasting would somehow be diminished if it were devolved.

Ms Cunningham: As I understand it, the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has in the past made similar comments, which have generated some criticism. That is the not the view held by the majority of the broadcasters of Scotland. They are confident that they would cope well if there were devolved broadcasting in Scotland. Given that confidence and the new cultural and political imperatives brought by the new Scottish Parliament, it is puzzling that in no circumstances is the devolution of broadcasting to be countenanced.

Rapid changes are taking place in broadcasting; in particular, there is the imminent arrival of digital television. Those changes have already provoked major adjustments to the ownership and control of the Scottish media—a matter in which the Scottish Parliament will have no real say in future. In the amendments, we are trying to look at the matter in the spirit of devolution, which is difficult for those of us who want more than that, but it is what we are trying to do. The truth is that, ultimately, the framework for broadcasting is set by politicians. We desire at least to create a framework for Scotland for what will happen and not only for what cannot happen.

We propose that there should be exceptions to the reservation in schedule 5 so that scheduling and finance, in so far as they relate to services in Scotland—for example, responsibility for BBC Scotland and its services within Scotland—are devolved to a broadcasting council for Scotland, whereas the BBC generally remains responsible for UK services. Equally, the Scottish Parliament would have powers over a Scottish ITC equivalent to the powers currently exercised by the Westminster Parliament over the ITC.

It would have been easier by far make a straightforward exception to the reservation of broadcasting as a whole, but I do not for a single minute pretend that every part of the Bill is necessarily straightforward. Amendments Nos. 98 to 100 make it clear that we are trying to confine the issue to those functions that relate particularly to Scotland and will not encroach on wider UK powers. Amendment No. 98, which deals with the appointment of a national governor, is another amendment which would restore the position to that stated in the White Paper. Amendment No. 101 is clear: it deals with the licence fee income raised in Scotland and, as I have already referred to it, I shall not spend any more time on it. I commend the amendments to the Committee. I ask hon. Members to consider the reality of the situation that will face us and to accept that the logic of devolution of broadcasting cannot be argued against.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I rise to speak in support of amendment No. 93, which stands in my name and those of my hon. Friends. When I tabled the amendment, I was thinking not about the BBC, but about the relationship between the Equal Opportunities Commission and the Scottish Parliament. The simplest way in which to bring the EOC's activities in Scotland under the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament would be to include the EOC on the list of cross-border public bodies; however, it has not been included on that list. Clause 83, which relates to cross-border public bodies, states that such a body is one that has "functions exercisable in or as regards Scotland which do not relate to reserved matters."

However, all aspects of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 are reserved, so the EOC does not fall within the definition as currently set out on the face of the Bill. If the words,

"which do not relate to reserved matters"

were deleted, the EOC could legitimately fall within that category.

If the EOC is not deemed to be a cross-border public body, the Scottish Parliament will have no power in relation to it. Clause 23 states that the Scottish Parliament

"may require any person . . . to attend its proceedings for the purpose of giving evidence" relating to devolved matters. However, it continues:

"That power is not exercisable in relation to . . . a person discharging functions of any body whose functions relate only to reserved matters".

In addition, clause 107, when read alongside clause 106, makes it clear that the EOC will not be required to lay its annual report before the Scottish Parliament. All that ought to be cleared up, because we must make it clear what we shall do regarding the EOC in respect of all the matters that are devolved, such as housing, education and careers, to name but a few.

In addition to concerns about the EOC, I feel a particular concern about disability discrimination. Enable has pointed out that the Government have appointed a task force to make recommendations for a UK-wide disability rights commission to enforce disabled people's rights under the legislation. The Bill as drafted would appear to prevent the Scottish Parliament from having any powers in relation to that prospective commission, yet many of the Scottish Parliament's activities—social work, education, housing, health, and so on—will be important to disabled people. Those are my reasons for tabling the amendment and I hope to hear a constructive reply from my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Godman: I have a couple of questions for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State relating to what the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) said. I do not sympathise greatly with what she said, but several concerns about broadcasting in Scotland have been voiced to me. I hope that the Parliament and the broadcasting authorities can quickly establish a modus vivendi that enables them both to deal with such concerns.

Mr. Jack Gerson, the thriller writer who has written a number radio scripts, has spoken to me about his worries about the BBC and STV following the setting up of the Edinburgh Parliament. He told me recently that the drama departments of Scottish Television and the BBC were showing less interest in Scottish writers and Scottish drama. I hope that that will not be the case when there is a Scottish Parliament.

Have there been any discussions—albeit we are at an early stage—about a dedicated channel for the Parliament? That could easily be achieved. Such a channel would be a boon for those in the highlands and islands and others who live a long way from Edinburgh. I hope that all the broadcasting authorities will have ready access to the Parliament. A modus vivendi must be established as early as possible to deal with some of the concerns that have been voiced about the growing remoteness of the broadcasting authorities from drama and documentaries in Scotland.

Mr. Wallace: May I say how pleasant it is to see you in the Chair, Mr. Winterton, for this important debate? I should like to make some points on cross-border public bodies before moving on to some of the issues of broadcasting that have been raised. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) raised some important points about equal opportunities. Looking at the provisional selection of amendments by the Chairman of Ways and Means, we should have plenty of opportunity to go back to that issue in more detail later. I apologise to the hon. Lady if I do not deal with it in this speech.

The Government have made efforts to enable some cross-border public bodies that also deal with reserved matters to have responsibilities for non-reserved matters. However, there is no proposal to exempt the BBC and STV from the reservation. I echo what the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) said, because there has been an expectation that senior representatives of the BBC will be brought before the Scottish Parliament. If possible, that should not be a request, because I suspect that they would be able to spot the difference between a request and a requirement if they wanted to wriggle out of it.

The Scottish Law Commission is in the list in the draft order that has been placed in the Library. Will the chairman and members of that commission be appointed jointly by the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Lord Advocate, or will it be a matter for the Scottish Parliament? I accept that there will be occasions when the Scottish Law Commission may be asked to produce a joint report with the Law Commission for England and Wales or to advise on rules that relate to reserved matters, but there was an expectation that appointments to it would fall within the competence of the Scottish Parliament.

I understand that the social security commissioners are appointed by the Lord Chancellor on the advice of the Lord Advocate. What will the position be in that case? Will the Scottish Court Service still have responsibility for making provision for the administrative arrangements of the social security commissioners, even though social security will not be a devolved matter? Some clarification would be welcome.

Mr. Dewar: Really?

Mr. Wallace: The Committee would welcome clarification. The Secretary of State laughs, but I am sure that he agrees that it is better that the issue should be clarified now than at some time after 2000. We do not want a stushie between the Scottish Court Service and Westminster on who will pick up the tab.

There was some disappointment about the fact that schedule 5 has a blanket reservation on broadcasting. I am not betraying any confidences on how the Scottish Constitutional Convention reached its agreement on broadcasting. That was one of the last matters to be agreed. Hon. Members who were members of the convention may remember that, at one of the later meetings, it was agreed that all matters that fell within the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland should be devolved. That was fine, until someone reported at the next meeting that the Secretary of State had no responsibilities for broadcasting—hence the blanket reservation.

With more consideration, more flexibility could have been shown on some issues. Some clarification of the position on Gaelic broadcasting would be helpful. Our amendment No. 413 would make an exemption from reservation with regard to

"The promotion and funding of Gaelic broadcasting in Scotland."

In a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie), the Gaelic Broadcasting Committee suggested that "the Scottish Parliament would control the funding of the Gaelic Broadcasting Committee".

I would welcome clarification on whether that will be the case. The reservation covers

"The subject-matters of the Broadcasting Act 1990 and the Broadcasting Act 1996."

The Gaelic Television Committee, which subsequently became the Gaelic Broadcasting Committee, has its statutory basis in those Acts. Section 183(1) of the 1990 Act says that the Secretary of State

"shall, for each subsequent financial year,"— from 1992-93 onwards—

"pay to the Commission such amount as he may, with the approval of the Treasury, determine to be appropriate for the purposes of this section."

Schedule 19 to that Act says that "the Committee shall prepare a general report of their proceedings during that year and transmit it to the Commission."

It further says:

"The Commission shall send a copy of each annual report received by them in accordance with his paragraph to the Secretary of State who shall lay copies of it before each House of Parliament."

It would be odd if something that is so much a part of Scottish culture were removed from the remit of the Scottish Parliament. I hope that there will be some acknowledgement of the role of Gaelic broadcasting and the fact that it would be appropriate for the Scottish Parliament to have a role. The budget in 1991–92 was £9.5 million, whereas it is £8.5 million in 1998–99. If there were no Scottish parliamentary input into that, there might be a fear that the sum would decrease further.

More generally, we are talking of the arts, sport, heritage, tourism and film as devolved matters, while broadcasting is not. I am not in favour of a separate Scottish broadcasting corporation; I do not think that it would make sense and I do not think that Scotland's viewing population wants it. We should look to areas in which there may be scope for devolved powers, such as in local television. The advance of technology in telecommunications allows greater provision of local television. Such provision would not interfere with wavebands or national broadcasting organisations.

The Institute of Local Television has said:

"By applying the principle of subsidiarity to the allocation of broadcast frequency channels and cable channels a coherent view can be adopted by the Scottish Parliament for the introduction of digital broadcasting services in the best interests of Scotland, to enhance local economic and cultural diversities".

There could be such provision at a Scottish level.

I would like to think that someone could continually press Channel 5 to ensure that its coverage reaches the many parts of Scotland which are without coverage at the moment, particularly as it is broadcasting Scotland's away games in the qualifying stages of the European nations championship. There is considerable resentment in many parts of Scotland, including my constituency, about not being able to receive Channel 5. It would be very welcome if the Parliament could do something to encourage Channel 5 to extend its coverage.

My hon. Friends and I propose that the appointment of the Scottish governor of the BBC and the Scottish member of the ITC should be a matter for the Scottish Parliament. The Scottish Parliament should also at least have the discretion to require the BBC and the ITC to lay their annual reports before it, as they have to before the Westminster Parliament. That small matter might seem narrow procedurally, but it would establish some chain of accountability between those important broadcasting organisations and the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not want to be pedantic, but when the hon. and learned Gentleman says that the Scottish

[Mr. Dalyell]

Parliament should appoint the governor of the BBC, does he mean the Scottish Executive or the Parliament as a whole?

Mr. Wallace: Our amendment says that the appointment of a national governor for Scotland of the BBC and of the Scottish member of the ITC should be an exception from reservation. It would be a matter of whether Parliament approved or the Scottish Executive nominated. As the Bill stands, nothing can be done. We are trying to put the matter within the realms of the responsibility of the Parliament and the Scottish Executive, which is answerable to the Parliament. The amendment's intent is to improve accountability.

From experience of meeting Scottish broadcasters, I know that there is a great deal of enthusiasm for the approaching Scottish Parliament. They see opportunities, not least in the broadcasting of the Parliament. My expectation and hope is that the effects of having a Parliament again in Scotland will go far beyond politics to stimulate arts, culture and broadcasting in Scotland. I think that the Secretary of State said that when he intervened on the hon. Member for Perth. As much of the debate is about devolution in the BBC as it is about devolution in the United Kingdom. Anything that can be done to stimulate, encourage or prod London and the BBC to go down the devolutionary road would be very welcome.

Some of us remember the sheer insensitivity of those in London when they sought to broadcast a full "Panorama" interview with the Prime Minister only a few days before Scottish local elections. The matter was not only about the fact that the BBC did that, but that it did not see anything wrong in doing so and could not understand why people in Scotland might think that such a move upset the normal rules and balance of broadcasting before an election.

Five years ago, without consultation, the BBC removed resources from Scotland and centralised them in London, which caused quite a row at the time. Only last month, the Financial Times reported that John Birt is to put before governors a proposal "to place large parts of its resources directorate—which includes all studios and technicians—into a wholly owned commercial subsidiary.

BBC staff unions . . . protested at an earlier version of the plan on the grounds that it would encourage privatisation of the BBC resources directorate".

The concern is that such a resource will be even further removed from any accountability to the Scottish Parliament. If the move were to lead to privatisation, there would be no separate Scottish privatisation. We have seen how separately privatised Scottish utility companies have been able to go from strength to strength, whereas some other privatisations in which no separate Scottish company was established have meant that Scotland has often had to bear the brunt of rationalisation, when decision making, senior technicians and senior management have been moved out of Scotland.

Looking further forward, there is an argument for ensuring greater appreciation in the BBC of the need to decentralise. That could be helped along the way by making the appointments described in the amendment the responsibility of the Scottish Parliament or the Scottish Executive and by, very simply, asking the BBC and the ITC to lay their annual reports before the Parliament. I ask the Secretary of State to consider that; it does not ask very much. Doing that might ring bells in London that things have changed and that people must be sensitive to a Scottish dimension. I hope that broadcasters and particularly the BBC rise to the challenge of devolution. They have a vested interest in its success. I very much hope that this debate and proper, fair consideration of the amendments will stimulate the BBC, particularly in London, to wake up to what is happening north of the border.

6.15 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): It is a special delight to see you, Mr. Winterton, in the Chair. I know that you are the chairman of the United Kingdom-wide all-party media group and will therefore no doubt pay particular attention to some of this debate.

The metaphor "elephants in the courtroom" is certainly a new one on me—but then lawyers, who are so abundant in this place, probably recognise it. I thought of other little phrases that trip off the tongue, such as "bull in a china shop" and "snake in the grass"—the Scottish National party involvement in the debate made that jump to mind.

The debate is not about devolution. For those who have tabled the amendments, it never has been. SNP Members have softened their tone tonight, but they have not done so in public debates—nor have they in trying to give influence to the group named by the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham), A Voice for Scotland, which is quite clearly a voice for separate media in Scotland, separate broadcasting in Scotland and separate regulation and control of media and broadcasting in Scotland. That is the quite clear message that SNP Members put out in debates that I have had with them in public, on television and in private discussions. This debate is about separation of broadcasting and control of that separate broadcasting.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Connarty: Not at this particular moment. I will let the hon. Lady in later.

Ms Cunningham rose—

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) is not giving way. I am grateful to the hon. Lady for resuming her seat.

Mr. Connarty: So am I. I will allow her in later, so she can hold her wheesht at this moment.

I heard mention of what is in fact the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. It may have been the Department of National Heritage when, as the hon. Member for Perth thought, it made some unhelpful comments. Although I am a parliamentary private secretary for that Department, I am speaking not with a brief from it but as a Back Bencher and a Scot.

I am not precious about either of the Parliaments. It is quite clear that the people who are leading the debate are precious about a separate Parliament in Scotland and therefore do not necessarily hold in any value the contribution of this Parliament to the questions raised by the hon. Member for Perth. Broadcasting is very much based on regulation on a European basis and will move quickly in the satellite and digital era into a world debate. That is the context in which we should be thinking—not about shrinking the debate into a Scottish debate as if, somehow, broadcasting can be controlled by some sort of border network of electronics that would prevent anything coming from anywhere else. I see the hon. Member for Perth pulling a face, but the debate is in that context for many people. They think that they can have control over the BBC in Scotland and the other media, such as the Scottish Media Group, and somehow make them bring out programmes that they find culturally and politically acceptable. That is the undercurrent of the debate and the political drive for the debate for many of the people in the Scottish National party.

It is wrong of those people to have that as an aspiration or to think that anyone in the media shares it. A few names were mentioned. One that is normally to the fore is that of George Kerevan, who speaks for that party. I believe that he is one of its vice-chairs, with responsibility for such matters. He makes it clear that the debate is all about having more Scottish programmes and developing the Scottish culture, as if that could not be done by the broadcasting media at the moment. In fact, I think that it is being done very well.

The hon. Lady made a point about Scottish newspapers, saying that their editions in Scotland are somehow acceptable, whereas other broadcast media programmes are not acceptable. I think that that was a demonstration of "Panorama paranoia", because one particular programme heated up the debate slightly in the pre-election days and was then seen as a touchstone for what could or could not be done.

The other point that the hon. Lady made, which I thought was particularly inept, was the concept that the BBC funding review in 2001 would be better debated in a Scottish Parliament in which Scottish Members of Parliament would contribute as the people taking the lead and making the controlling decisions.

That reminded me why it is important to send United Kingdom parliamentarians elected in Scotland down here to talk, debate and contribute on that and other matters at a UK level. If the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) had been in the Chamber he might have agreed about that, although he does not want them to talk about matters to do with English local authorities, for example. The broadcasting point would be debated at the right level, in a UK-wide framework in relation to European regulation and European involvement in the control, regulation and development of the media—a context in which, as I am sure that you, Mr. Winterton, know, it will probably be debated more than ever.

A comment that I found rather weak was the idea that broadcasters "could cope well" with devolved broadcasting. What a strange phrase for someone who aspires to have an independent Scotland—that under devolved broadcasting it could "cope well".

Everyone in the media to whom I have spoken, and everyone who has responded in the discussions that I have been involved in, has been talking about a blossoming of broadcasting in Scotland at this moment under the present regulation. They have been saying, and I agree with them, that with a devolved Parliament the amount of interest in and impetus for the Scottish culture will be such an enormous fillip to their efforts that broadcasting will blossom.

The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), the leader of the Scottish Liberals, was saying how digital and local production would, we hope, blossom. Everyone I talked to saw that as being possible. Many parts of Scotland with digital channels would be able to broadcast and develop their own cultural base.

The Dundonians will come back into their own, and the people from Ayrshire, from the north and the islands—

Mr. McAllion: What do you mean, "Come back?"

Mr. Connarty: I have every confidence—but we shall have to learn how to understand. At first it would be just about as difficult to learn how to understand the Gaelic as to understand a true Dundonian accent. I know that.

Broadcasting in Scotland could blossom in all those respects in local areas. I am very much a supporter of local radio, and in the future, it is to be hoped, local television broadcasting will be added. That can all be done in the present context of UK regulation. The present controllers are not holding that back.

At one of the debates in which the listeners and viewers consumers panel held an open forum in Stirling, I debated with Mr. Kerevan and a representative of the Liberal Democrats—a Mr. Sullivan, I believe—who seemed to be taking a line similar to that of the Scottish nationalists, taking about a separate broadcasting regulation set-up. All the people were there from the media and the present controller of BBC Scotland was supportive of our position rather than that of the people from A Voice for Scotland.

In the early days, when the subject was debated and discussed, it was admitted that that might have been possible. I hear the White Paper quoted again and again to the effect that it might have been possible or even sensible to devolve regulation or some part of regulation. But when we looked at the idea in more depth it was clear that it would have been a narrowing of the base of Scottish broadcasting and therefore inappropriate.

The people from the Scottish Media Group, who now own a cross-media group of both written and broadcast media in Scotland, were also of the opinion that the present regulation situation, the present relationship, which is in the powers the Secretary of State has at this moment, which will be devolved, and the things that will remain as reserved, are the appropriate context in which they wish to develop. They see that as no barrier to making and selling programmes both in Scotland and outside Scotland. Therefore, it is a backward step to try to take any of that over the border and somehow shrink it into a Scottish Parliament context.

On the question of finance, the contributions from the BBC were interesting. The BBC believes that with its spare income—that is, the income that it does not spend on its own Scottish network—it can buy in network programmes, but that if the programmes that it buys in through the BBC network at this moment had to be bought on the market, it could not buy them in with its present income from the licence fee in Scotland.

The BBC would therefore have to reduce the programmes that it offers the people of Scotland if it had to be self-sufficient outwith the BBC network as it stands at the moment, and had a separate charter and licence collection.

[Mr. Connarty]

Whether people like it or not—personally, I am not a great follower of soaps—in percentage terms there is probably just as much interest in the population of Scotland as there is elsewhere in what goes on in "Coronation Street". My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) is not in the Chamber, but I know that he ensures that all the programmes are taped. He has not missed a part of "Coronation Street" since it started when he was a boy, he tells me. He has it taped so that he can watch it at the weekend.

Mr. Godman: The interest in the soaps is to be found throughout these islands. May I remind my hon. Friend that at the recent Irish election, an independent candidate in County Kerry won election to the Dail on his campaign for greater access to BBC and ITV programmes, especially "Coronation Street".

Mr. Connarty: I understand and sympathise with that. I do not follow the programmes, but I know that most people know where Albert square is.

Mr. Godman: Who is he kidding?

Mr. Connarty: I used to follow—

The Temporary Chairman: Order. the hon. Gentleman is going a bit wide of the amendment. I hope that he will take no more time in responding to that intervention.

Mr. Connarty: The intervention stands on its own, Mr. Winterton. People want to see the programmes on the network. They do not necessarily want to watch programmes made in Scotland about Scotland. That is not to say that they are resistant to those programmes or do not value the contribution made by the Scottish media and culture to Scotland, but Scotland exists within the UK and within Europe—and it has a big international world view. Scotland sees itself not as a nation that wants to be shrunk but as a nation that wants to be expanded.

Unfortunately, the proposal smacks of trying to reduce broadcasting and the other media in Scotland to something controllable. I think that that is the agenda. There is a spectrum. Accountability has been talked about, and I think that we have that. It lies here in the UK Parliament.

I believe that the controller of one of the broadcasting organisations said that if invitations were issued, not only would his organisation accept, but it would be pushing to be heard by the Committees and Sub-Committees of the Scottish Parliament. That is correct. The organisations want to broadcast what they have to offer.

The spectrum starts with accountability, then moves over to regulation. Regulation is not necessarily being discussed or put forward now, because it does not stand up, but it is the aim of the Scottish National party. The Liberal point of view—having control of who is appointed—still worries me because we would take that out of the context of a UK broadcasting network and take it into a Scottish Parliament.

What happens to the people who are down here who see the remit as a United Kingdom remit and then have to see it given just to the Scottish Parliament? That would begin to create the very fracture that the right hon. Member for Huntingdon warned us about. That scares me in its political context. It is about generating separation and conflict and about generating English and Scottish nationalism—even in the context of a devolved Parliament. That worries me.

It is a question of control. The amendments are motivated mainly by the wish to control the broadcasting media and to control what it puts out to people. It is an attempt to grab the minds of the people and to use the media to foment in them a sense of separation and nationalism that would benefit only those who follow the separatist view. It is the beginning of a very dangerous move—one which I hope the Secretary of State will resist. I am sure he will do so this evening.

6.30 pm

Mr. Jenkin: We have listened to an interesting debate about whether there should be further devolution in broadcasting and other matters than is provided for in the Bill. I shall return to the comments of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty).

In moving the amendment, the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) referred mainly to clause 83 and to cross-border bodies. Clause 83—one of three that deal with such bodies—provides for cross-border bodies as set out in the draft order the Secretary of State has most helpfully provided for the debate. It includes such august bodies as the British Library Board, a lot of obscure ones and controversial bodies such as the Meat and Livestock Commission and meat hygiene appeals tribunals. Matters arising from those bodies are subject to devolution to the Scottish Parliament, raising questions about the coherence of UK policy. That is an issue we have not yet gone into.

I should say that amendment No. 426 is merely a clarifying amendment to which I shall not refer at any length.

The draft order contains an interesting assurance on behalf of the Government. It states:

"The Government envisage however that the Scottish Parliament will want to continue most such arrangements in the light of the advantages of sharing knowledge and expertise on a UK or GB basis and of the greater efficiency in the use of resources."

That expectation seems to be confounded by today's debate. The amendments set out to challenge not just whether the bodies should continue to be administered on a joint UK basis but whether bodies that have interests in reserved powers—notably the BBC—should continue on a UK basis.

The hon. Member for Perth expressed disappointment that paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper has not, in her view, been fulfilled. I am afraid that the hon. Lady is simply making mischief. The operative word in paragraph 2.11 is "invite". At no point does the White Paper raise any expectation that the Scottish Parliament will hold over any body any obligation that has solely to do with reserved powers. That is clear, and I want to put it on the record that we will support the Secretary of State on this matter. In our attempt to create a stable settlement between the Scottish Parliament and the Westminster Parliament, we cannot argue on the basis of fantasy or on the basis of what the hon. Lady would like to have had in the White Paper.

I wish to refer to the substance of the amendments about broadcasting. Many matters of concern to Scottish Members of Parliament will be replicated in the Scottish Parliament. As I listened to discussions on the degree of devolution within the BBC or the insensitivity of the BBC in London to Scottish issues, I reflected on the fact that here we have, in miniature, the same debate that we are having about the administration and accountability of the UK Government.

The more the Scottish BBC has had delegated to it, the less the BBC in London has been involved with Scottish issues. A consequence of that is that the BBC in London is likely to become less sensitive to Scottish needs. That will drive the demand that the Scottish BBC should be more accountable to the new Scottish Parliament. That seems to be the road down which we are going.

The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Perth and, to some extent, the amendments tabled by the Liberal Democrats, which suggest that the BBC and broadcasting as a whole should, to some extent, be answerable to the Scottish Parliament, are, in view of the shape and intent of the Bill, entirely logical. They are an extrapolation of the Bill that many will regard as only half a Bill. The hon. Member for Perth said that the amendments were tabled in the spirit of the Bill—the spirit of devolution. Her game is obvious: she finished by talking about ownership and control. Those may well become issues of concern to the Scottish Parliament.

It is difficult to imagine how the Westminster Parliament will block its ears to demands from the Scottish Parliament for a say over some of these issues. It will be a cheese-paring operation. The Parliament will begin by wanting a say over the appointment of the governor, then it will want a say over appointments to the Independent Television Commission, but that will not satisfy the frustrations that the hon. Member for Perth and others will continue to express.

The Government have tried to reduce the question of devolution to a simple yes-no question, but the amendments graphically demonstrate that devolution is a matter of degree. The argument about the degree of devolution has started even before the Bill has become an Act. Now that Scotland is to have control over so much of its affairs, why should it not have a greater say on broadcasting?

I have some idea what the Secretary of State will say. I can hear him argue that it would not be right for the Scottish Parliament to have the power to alter legislation governing broadcasting and its regulation. I can hear him say that this is not because of a lack of faith in the Parliament or in Scottish broadcasters, but because the single UK market and the regulatory regime will be difficult to break up without creating inefficiency, which would harm the interests of Scottish viewers and listeners. It is a rational case.

The Secretary of State will warn, no doubt, of additional costs to Scottish broadcasters if, for example, a Scottish regulatory authority were to take a different view from that in England. Producers of television programmes would effectively have to work to two different codes if their programmes were, as is commonly the case, shown in England and Scotland.

Mr. Connarty: I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's star gazing, but what do he and his party think?

Mr. Jenkin: We have tabled a probing amendment and we are witnessing the beginnings of a tussle that will not end with the passing of the clause and the Bill.

I expect that the Secretary of State will explain how everything about British broadcasting works very well for Scotland at the moment and that there is plenty of talent. No doubt he will argue that devolution will give a fillip to Scottish broadcasting. He will say that quality production in Scotland is already capable of succeeding in the UK market and that maintaining the common UK market will aid progress, whereas fragmentation would hinder it. That will be the burden of the Government's case.

Does not the Secretary of State think that fragmentation will also hinder progress in policies on fishing or agriculture, for example? The hon. Member for Falkirk, East said that broadcasting was becoming a global business, but that applies to many matters—the environment, for example—that will be devolved to the Scottish Parliament. Why do not the arguments about extra costs and inefficiency apply to all the bodies that are listed in the draft order and to many of the functions that are being devolved?

This debate has shown that the arguments that the Government have deployed to advance the case of devolution will be used by those who want further devolution. Broadcasting, like many other issues, will quickly become a bone of contention for the new Parliament. Stability will be most difficult to achieve.

Mr. McAllion: Earlier, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) warned the Committee—such was his concern about the constitutional implications of the Bill and such was his outrage at the lack of time that had been allocated to debate it—that we were all doomed, constitutionally speaking. I note that his concern and outrage were such that he has now found something far more important to do than to stay in the Chamber to listen to the debates—he has gone away to do something that he regards as far more worthy of his precious time. We can judge his earlier speech by his absence now—it is symptomatic of what is wrong with the Tory party and why it is not represented in Scotland.

I speak in support of amendment No. 93, which I tabled with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) and others. Like her, I received a letter from Enable, the Scottish Society for the Mentally Handicapped, supporting the amendment. It said that the Scottish Parliament must have powers and responsibilities in relation to cross-border bodies such as the Equal Opportunities Commission and the disability rights commission that is to be set up. It pointed out that it would be anomalous that the Scottish Parliament should have responsibilities for social work, housing, education and health, which directly affect people with disabilities, but no formal power over the Equal Opportunities Commission or the disability rights commission.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maryhill will be delighted to know that I also received a letter from the Dundee Trades Union Council supporting the amendments that she tabled on equal opportunities and on gender equality. I hope that she will remember that Dundee expects her to argue strongly for gender equality and that she will press the amendments to a Division if necessary. I note that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State seems to have become alarmed at the prospect of Dundee once again raising its ugly head.

There is no uniformity of views within or across parties on the role of broadcasting and its relationship to the Scottish Parliament. The hon. Member for North Essex

[Mr. McAllion]

(Mr. Jenkin) accused the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) of fantasising about the White Paper. I hope that the hon. Lady's life is more exciting than that and that she does not have to fantasise about White Papers on constitutional change. It was an unfair barb.

Mr. Godman: She is a lawyer.

Mr. McAllion: Perhaps lawyers do fantasise about these things, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is also a lawyer, and I am sure that he would refute such a suggestion.

My recollection of the White Paper is that it recognises that cross-border bodies such as the BBC and the Independent Television Commission will continue to be significant to the economic and social life of Scotland, and so will be likely to be of interest to the Scottish Parliament. I hope that hon. Members from all parties will agree that broadcasting will be a matter of direct interest to those who are elected to the Scottish Parliament—it would be nonsense to suggest otherwise.

Clause 83 will provide the Scottish Parliament with a number of limited powers in relation to cross-border bodies. For example, bodies that are required to lay reports before the UK Parliament will also be required to lay them before the Scottish Parliament. Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State make it clear whether that requirement will be laid on the BBC and ITC? Similarly, there will be consultation about Scottish appointments to cross-border bodies, but will the BBC and ITC be required to consult the Scottish Parliament about such appointments?

The Scottish Parliament will not have the power to require people to give evidence or submit documents, which I believe is a grave weakness. The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, of which I am a member, recently required—it did not invite—the Scottish Arts Council to give evidence to it. Such was the reception that the council received at the meeting that I am sure that some bodies would rather not appear before a Select Committee of the Scottish Parliament—if they had the choice—because of the grilling that they might be subjected to. The fact that the Scottish Parliament will not have much greater powers over broadcasting is, I believe, a serious weakness.

Some of my hon. Friends have spoken of kailyard broadcasting, which I think is an insult. I tell them that the Scottish Parliament is being treated like a kailyard institution, as it will have no rights to summon representatives from one of the most important industries in Scotland—it will not be able to question the people who are responsible for broadcasting on the expenditure of Scottish taxpayers' and licence holders' money. That will be an anomaly, and it should not be allowed to happen.

The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), who is no longer present, recollected that the Scottish Constitutional Convention executive had agreed that the powers of a Scottish Parliament should be exactly the same as those of the Secretary of State for Scotland—the convention realised only subsequently that those powers did not include broadcasting.

My recollection is that, in appendix 4 of the convention's final document—I think it was called "Scotland's Right, Scotland's Parliament"—broadcasting is clearly listed as one of the Parliament's functions. That was agreed by the Labour party, the Scottish Liberal Democrats, the Scottish Trades Union Congress, the women's organisations and the Churches—by everyone who took part in the convention's debates. We need an explanation of why what we agreed in the convention will not be implemented by the Bill.

I was recently sent the book, "Devolution and the Scotland Parliament"—I assume that other hon. Members were also sent it—written by two respected constitutional lawyers, C. M. G. Himsworth, who is a solicitor and reader in law at Edinburgh university, and C. R. Munro, who is professor of constitutional law at Edinburgh university. Hon. Members who are not lawyers or constitutional experts should take their views seriously—I accept that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is a lawyer and a constitutional expert, but he is perhaps not as learned as these Edinburgh university academics. [Interruption.] Well, perhaps he is as learned; I do not know.

The authors argue that it is not self-evident that the laws of Scotland and England should not differ on broadcasting. They do not believe that it is essential to have a unitary broadcasting authority vested in the United Kingdom Parliament. They say that there is nothing wrong with the idea that the Scottish Parliament could enact legislation on broadcasting that is different from the legislation that applies in the rest of the United Kingdom. Their views should not be as cavalierly cast aside as some hon. Members have suggested.

People who do not want the Scottish Parliament to have power over broadcasting argue, for example, that there should not be double accountability—that the BBC and the ITC cannot be accountable to both the United Kingdom Parliament and the Scottish Parliament. They argue that such double accountability would lead to confusion and would be unfair to the BBC and ITC.

On the other side of that coin, is it right that the Scottish Parliament should have no accountability whatever for broadcasting in Scotland? That cannot be a serious argument. We all recognise that, once the powers have been devolved to the Scottish Parliament, the role of the Secretary of State and the Scottish Office in the United Kingdom Parliament will, by necessity, be diminished.

The Secretary of State's influence over broadcasting policy and in the Cabinet generally will be equally diminished at Westminster, so it is essential that the Scottish Parliament has a role, to ensure that the Scottish arm of broadcasting is subject to the same accountability as under the present unitary system. We will not have a unitary system when the Scottish Parliament is up and running: we will have two Parliaments running in tandem, and it is important that they should both be able to hold to account those who are responsible for broadcasting.

Mr. Connarty: My hon. Friend knows that I respect his views on these matters, but it seems to me that he is suggesting that he agrees with those who argue that Members of this Parliament who represent Scottish constituencies should be given less weight, and that their responsibility, powers and respect in Westminster should be diminished. I am extremely worried by that theory.

If responsibility for broadcasting stays here, with United Kingdom Members of Parliament elected for Scottish constituencies, surely they should have the same weight as they have now.

Mr. McAllion: They cannot have. The Secretary of State for Scotland is responsible for the budget of the Scottish Office and for all the powers that it exercises, but, after devolution, he will lose that responsibility, which will transfer to the Scottish Parliament. By definition, he will carry less weight in the Cabinet. Indeed, it has been argued that there could be only one constitutional spokesman for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland after the devolved bodies are set up.

It is natural in those circumstances that the Scottish Parliament should be given powers over broadcasting. Otherwise, a large industry in Scotland would not be subject to proper democratic scrutiny. Those of us who worked in the Scottish Constitutional Convention intended the Scottish Parliament to be responsible for that scrutiny. We cannot say in 1996 that it is essential that broadcasting be the responsibility of the Scottish Parliament and then say in 1998 that we did not really mean it. We should honour the commitment that we gave.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) raised the prospect of the Scottish Parliament trying to control broadcasters in Scotland. That is not what anyone is calling for. We want to replicate the arm's-length relationship with broadcasters that the United Kingdom Parliament has. No one suggests that the Department for Culture, Media and Sport controls the BBC, the ITC or The Sun. In fact, some might argue that The Sun controls the Department. It is a false argument to suggest that because the Scottish Parliament wants some powers over broadcasting, it wants to control it completely. It wants to subject it to democratic scrutiny, and that is a legitimate aspiration.

I take offence when people say that there is a danger of parochialism if broadcasting is overseen by people elected in Scotland by Scottish voters. They suggest that it will be kailyard broadcasting; that the Scots cannot be trusted to look after these weighty affairs; and that a Scottish "Coronation Street" or "EastEnders" would be of poor quality and no one would want to see it.

The Scots are every bit as capable of holding broadcasting to account as anyone in this Parliament. Members of Parliament who represent Scottish constituencies will be in no way better than Members of the Scottish Parliament representing the same constituencies.

Mrs. Fyfe: I am a bit concerned about my hon. Friend's line of thought. I am not aware of anyone—among Labour Members, at least—making such a claim. In fact, it would be absurd. BBC Scotland produces excellent programmes, some of which have achieved worldwide renown.

Mr. McAllion: I agree 100 per cent. that my hon. Friend would never make such an assertion, but unfortunately there are some who would argue in those terms. It strikes me that there is a metropolitan tendency that, for some people, is unavoidable in the Westminster Parliament. They think that if it is not done in the London region it cannot be good enough and that the regions outside London are, by definition, less sophisticated. That is insulting and should be resisted by every Member of Parliament.

The idea of devolution is that government can be carried on in every corner of this island just as effectively as it can be carried on here in London. Indeed, the whole argument behind devolution in the first place is that government can be conducted more effectively in that way.

British broadcasting is already over-centralised. I recently came across the statistic that only 3 per cent. of what is carried by the BBC network is from Scotland, although Scotland has 17 per cent. of the network's audience. That is not good enough: BBC Scotland is doing well, but not well enough, and more Scottish programmes should be on the BBC network, so that they can be watched throughout the United Kingdom. It would help towards that end if the Scottish Parliament had powers over broadcasting.

My hon. Friend the Secretary of State is screwing up his face. I do not know what that means. Perhaps he wants me to shut up and sit down.

Mr. Hawkins: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. The influence of Scotland on national broadcasting goes well beyond programmes that are commissioned and made in Scotland. When James Naughtie is on an opinion-forming political programme, the Scots have a real influence over national British politics.

Mr. McAllion: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that the only way in which Scots can influence national politics is to leave Scotland, that is a very strange argument. I am glad to hear that he is following my argument closely. He must be the only Member who is.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): James Naughtie is a former constituent of mine, having resided in Keith for a considerable time.

Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that reporting what happens in the Scottish Parliament is important not only within Scotland and that we must look outwards and ensure that the broadcasting facilities take the messages that come from that Parliament into the international community? Those messages should not necessarily have to be sieved through the procedures of London state broadcasting.

Mr. McAllion: The hon. Lady makes an interesting point. One of the big issues will be the way in which the broadcasting authorities deal with the Scottish Parliament. The United Kingdom Parliament is ultimately responsible for the BBC and the Independent Television Commission, and can exercise influence over those who decide how parliamentary business is broadcast.

As I understand it, it is suggested not only that the Scottish Parliament should have no influence over how it should be broadcast but that this Parliament should decide what the coverage should be. That would be a matter of great concern for me, because I believe that the Scottish Parliament should be treated equally.

I hope that the BBC and ITV in Scotland, and the other Scottish media, will treat the Scottish Parliament with the same respect and interest that are accorded to this Parliament. Again and again, we come back in these debates to the old story that Westminster wants to send the message that the Scottish Parliament is in some sense inferior and that its proceedings should not be covered to the exclusion of our proceedings here. I do not agree with that.

Mr. Connarty: I wish that my hon. Friend had carried on his logic, so that I could have followed him in the quantum leap that he made, suggesting that if the Scottish Parliament makes broadcasting more accountable to it, we in Scotland will, by some process or other—osmosis, perhaps—end up being able to sell more of our programmes and producing more than 3 per cent. of the BBC network output in Scotland. I am worried by the idea that he believes that politicians have a right to interfere in the process of creativity in broadcasting. He seems to think that giving the Scottish Parliament accountability will make the programmes more acceptable to the network. I do not know how that could happen.

Mr. McAllion: As I mentioned, the Scottish Arts Council appeared before the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. Some artists from Scotland appeared before the Committee this morning, including Mr. David MacLennan of Wildcat Stage Productions and Mr. John McGrath of Freeway Films. They said that they were delighted that, for the first time in 30 years, elected politicians would become involved in the politics of art and culture in Scotland. They thought that that would give a much higher profile to their arguments and hold an unelected quango to account, because elected politicians could ask the quango members why they had taken certain decisions.

The BBC in Scotland should be subjected to more democratic scrutiny, and that is more likely to be done in a Scottish Parliament than here. This body does not have the mechanisms for holding BBC Scotland to account. The Select Committee is more likely to be concerned about the BBC as a whole and its leadership down here in London than with Scotland. The fact that the network has only a 3 per cent. Scottish output is not a big issue for this Parliament. It would be a major issue for the Scottish Parliament and would lead to much improved argument and debate on the issues and, hopefully, the BBC in Scotland would start to perform much better.

We have already agreed that the Scottish Parliament should have responsibility for the arts, heritage, sports, tourism and film. Why can we not agree that it should also have responsibility for broadcasting? The BBC has written to hon. Members—it wrote to me, so I assume it wrote to every other hon. Member—to point out that it invests more in the cultural life of Scotland than the Scottish Arts Council. We are happy for the Arts Council, the arts, theatre, opera and ballet to be subject to the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament. Why on earth can we not be happy for broadcasting, which is much bigger, to be subject to its scrutiny? It does not seem sensible.

The summary sent to us by BBC Scotland tells us how well it is doing. Across Scotland, it has 10 centres and 1,000 staff. It brings in £157 million in licence fee income, has invested a total of £83 million recently in its programmes and has 670 hours of television programmes specifically for viewers in Scotland and 920 hours for the United Kingdom radio networks. Why on earth can we not say that the Scottish Parliament has a clear role to hold to account a body that is so important and has such a big impact on life in Scotland and to ask about the way in which it exercises its responsibility?

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asked whether we wanted a separate Scottish BBC. No one is arguing for that, although I would certainly not be averse to a devolved Scottish BBC. We are arguing for accountability. Those people who operate and spend the money in Scottish broadcasting should be held to account, and the Scottish Parliament should not be excluded from the role of holding them to account. In fact, it is much better suited to holding such bodies in Scotland to account than the Westminster Parliament. That is not my merely my view, but that of the Scottish Constitutional Convention and when it drew up the blueprint for a Scottish Parliament it certainly expected that to happen.

The tabloid argument that people in Scotland are happy to watch "Crossroads", "Coronation Street" or "EastEnders" is a complete red herring. No one suggests that anyone in Scotland should be deprived of any programme on the BBC network. I see some of my hon. Friends are laughing, but one of our hon. Friends argued that earlier.

Mr. Godman: My hon. Friend is kidding.

Mr. McAllion: I do not watch any of those programmes anyway. No one is denying anyone access to the BBC UK network. We are saying that BBC Scotland should be accountable. Clearly, that must be the case.

The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland mentioned the insensitivity of the BBC hierarchy in relation to the party political broadcast put out in Scotland immediately before the election. I could cite other examples. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) will confirm that the BBC has taken away resources and manpower from stations in Dundee. Who holds it to account for that? We are merely the two local Members of Parliament. I would rather have a powerful Broadcasting Committee in the Scottish Parliament, which could summon the controller in Scotland and ask questions, such as why this office is being closed or that reporter taken away, or why certain investments were being reduced. That is what should be happening, but it will not happen in this Parliament. It should happen in a Scottish Parliament.

What about listed events? Because of Sky Television and the tendency nowadays to auction to the highest bidder coverage of sporting events, we have had to list a number of major events that cannot be put out to contract or to the highest bidder, including the Scottish cup final. The Scottish Parliament would be much more likely to defend major Scottish events than would the Westminster Parliament. Therefore, I plead with my hon. Friends not to dismiss entirely the idea that the Scottish Parliament should have a major role in monitoring and overseeing broadcasting in Scotland. Throughout the debates in the convention, we always intended that that should be the case, and the Government should not be backing out now.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman mentioned listed sporting events, in which I have taken a big interest, along with a number of his hon. Friends. Does he agree that one thing on which there has been agreement between the previous and the new Governments is the importance of listed events? The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has set up a new panel, which has accepted that there should be listed events. The only issue is which events should be listed. While I agree that national sporting events, both in Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom, are of vital importance, I suggest that that Cabinet Minister's decision to accept the principle of listed events, which we set up, does not support the hon. Member's argument.

Mr. McAllion: That all depends on the balance of power inside the panel set up to defend the listed events and whether it regards the Scottish cup final, or indeed the Scottish junior cup final, as a priority. The hon. Gentleman is probably grateful for the fact that the England-West Indies Test series is not a listed event and he does not have to watch it, unless he has Sky Television.

This is a serious issue. Specifically Scottish events are far more likely to be defended by a Parliament based in Scotland than by a Parliament down here which is dominated by English Members, and rightly so because of the size of the country. That is a simple point, and I hope that the my hon. Friend the Minister will take it on board.

Broadcasting was intended to be a responsibility of the Scottish Parliament. At some stage, a decision was taken to reverse that intention. I do not know why the decision was taken, what consultation was carried out beforehand or the arguments for it. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make those matters clear when he replies to the debate.

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): First, I reaffirm that the Liberal Democrats fully support the amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe), which would ensure that the Scottish Parliament controlled equal opportunities and which will reappear at a later stage. We also support many of the arguments of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), which is not unusual.

What is unusual is that I thought that the speech by the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) contained a lot of good sense. As other hon. Members and I have often criticised the Conservative contribution to these debates, it seems only fair to say that, although I did not agree with all of it, it was constructive and on the right wave length, if that is the right expression in this debate. I hope that by complimenting the hon. Gentleman on it, I will not ruin his political career.

We support the first of the amendments tabled by the Scottish National party. It is regrettable that Scottish politics is such that because that party has proposed it, some hon. Members—certainly some Labour Members—feel that they have to oppose it. The Scottish nationalists may not have got all the right answers, but we agree that there must be some sort of say for the Scottish Parliament in broadcasting. It is not realistic for the Scottish Parliament to be precluded from having any opportunity to debate and discuss broadcasting and to call people before it for consultation.

The line taken by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) that if the Scottish Parliament had some say in broadcasting it would diminish this Parliament, is not correct. That is the faulty argument, often put up by the Conservatives, that sovereignty is indivisible. We can cheerfully have two or three different bodies—I am sure that the European Parliament discusses such things—with some input into the control of broadcasting.

The Liberal Democrats certainly do not want political control, censorship and all that sort of thing, but we think that it is reasonable to say that democratically elected Members of the Scottish Parliament could make a contribution on the subject of broadcasting, which impinges on so many other things that that Parliament will control—for example, education, the arts, sport and Gaelic. It would be ridiculous if the Scottish Parliament was promoting some considerable change in education to which broadcasting could contribute, but was not allowed to tell the broadcasters that certain types of programme would be a great help. What if the Parliament wanted to promote the arts? As the hon. Member for Dundee, East said, Scottish broadcasting puts in much more money than the Government via the Scottish Arts Council. It would be ridiculous if, for example, the broadcasting people did not give some great festival in Scotland adequate treatment, but the Scottish Parliament could not discuss with them how they could do more.

We have concentrated on ITV and the BBC during the debate, but there have been great developments in local television and radio, and in new technologies, which I do not understand. Other hon. Members must have been asked for their views by television and radio stations that they have never heard of. I have no idea whether anyone watches or listens to their programmes, but such organisations are multiplying, so not allowing the Scottish Parliament to discuss the conduct of the local radio station in Auchtermuchty, if one exists, is ridiculous.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East was worried about political control. We should turn the argument round: all of us worry about the control exercised by media moguls such as Mr. Murdoch, and it is possible that broadcasting in Scotland might be seriously influenced by a tycoon who was thought by most Members of the Scottish Parliament to have had an adverse effect on events in Scotland.

The Scottish Parliament must be able to defend itself against the political tyranny of a media tycoon. Our amendments address that point modestly, and the Government should accept them. We suggest that the Scottish Parliament should discuss the annual reports of the BBC and ITV. Specifically, the Scottish Parliament should have a say on Gaelic broadcasting and the appointment of BBC governors in Scotland.

Our amendments and those tabled by the Scottish National party put down a marker and send a message to the broadcasting centralisers in London. The arts world in particular is over-centralised. I meet London critics who come up to the Edinburgh festival and think that it is great to get out of London for a week or two. Unless an artist appears in London, he does not appear at all so far as they are concerned. Such over-centralisation must be challenged. If the Government refuse to accept the amendments, they will be sending the message, "London rules broadcasting, OK!", which is wrong.

In the previous debate, the people who said that we had not been given enough time to debate earth shattering issues did not push them to a vote. I am a newcomer to the House, and I found that incomprehensible. I hope that the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) will press the amendments to a vote.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): I support amendment No. 93, which was spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) and deals with the Equal Opportunities Commission. If it is rejected on the ground that it would catch other bodies, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take alternative action to deal with the commission's unique circumstances.

Before the White Paper was published, there was a big debate about the EOC's position. We accept that the commission will be a reserved body, because of its employment remit in particular, but, apart from its law enforcement functions, it works proactively with several organisations in devolved areas. Devolved matters are the key to issues of equality. Therefore, it is vital that the EOC has a locus in relation to the Scottish Parliament, and that objective would be met if the EOC were designated a cross-border body.

Paragraph 2.10 of the White Paper states:

"The Scottish Parliament will have the power to require submission of reports and the presentation of oral evidence on the activities of such bodies".

Such bodies will be accountable to the Parliament, which is particularly appropriate as we are approaching the second stage of the EOC review, and it is likely that the Scottish office of the EOC will have far greater autonomy. Making the EOC a cross-border body would also help to ensure that equality issues are taken account of by the Scottish Parliament, although other amendments will address that point.

I assume that the EOC is one of the bodies dealt with by paragraph 2.11 of the White Paper, to which the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) referred, and that it is not necessary to include those bodies in the Bill, simply because the Scottish Parliament can only invite them to submit reports.

We will miss an opportunity if we do not recognise the unique status of the EOC. If our amendment is unsuitable, I hope that other action will be taken to achieve its aims.

7.15 pm

Mr. Dalyell: As the tail-end Charlie of the debate, I hope that the Committee will forgive me for being a little bewildered as to what all the fuss is about. Wild horses would not stop Members of the Scottish Parliament approaching the broadcasting authorities. It is not in the nature of Members of Parliament to feel so restrained, and I should be astonished if anyone at Queen Margaret drive or anywhere else refused to heed representations.

I understand from the press that the current proposal differs from the original convention agreement. I am curious to know by what alchemy that happened. I look forward with curiosity to hearing the explanation.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we are concerned not about whether Mr. John McCormick would accept an invitation to speak to the Scottish Parliament, but about the very different matter of whether Mr. John Birt would accept such an invitation?

Mr. Dalyell: Mr. John Birt is a civil man, and if he were asked in a civil way, I am sure that he would accept. These matters should remain informal, unless there is another agenda—I acquit the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends of subscribing to it—under which the Parliament would control broadcasting and the media. She shakes her head vigorously. As long as such control is not the agenda, I do not see the problem.

Ms Cunningham: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that this Parliament can summon Mr. John Birt to appear, and that the Scottish Parliament will be unable to do that? I accept that a wonderful measure of good will might see us through, but he has frequently pointed out that invitations might be refused. The Westminster Parliament can require attendance, but the Scottish Parliament will be unable to do anything about a refusal.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not want to extend the discussion, because we have entered the grey area of concordats. I should not trespass into subjects about which I know little. I should just register the fact that there will be great difficulties over predatory pricing, but that, too, is a grey area.

Clause 83(5)(b) provides that subordinate legislation will detail cross-border public bodies. When will such a statutory instrument be introduced, and what consultation is being carried out on its terms, not only in Scotland, but in England? The Law Society wants that question asked, and I hope that an answer will be forthcoming.

Mr. Dewar: I have listened to the debate with considerable interest, and have been somewhat entertained as well. I do not know about Auchtermuchty local radio, but I feel that I should spring to the defence of Auchtermuchty, which—if I remember rightly—produced The Proclaimers and Jimmy Shand. Probably, in terms of the clapometer of public opinion, it has made a large contribution to Scottish culture. [Interruption.] I recognise that The Proclaimers have many interesting connections. If the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) writes to me, we will consider these matters with all proper care.

I enjoyed the performance of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). I am sorry that he has left the Chamber, because he is becoming a tremendous facilitator. I note that, if he thinks that his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) is not speaking clearly enough, he repeats her question so that it can be explained again. That is an interesting tactic on the part of the leader of the pack, and I enjoy watching it.

Let me make a fundamental point. We are trying to bring about a stable division of responsibilities between Westminster and the Scottish Parliament. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) has said that that will turn the Scottish Parliament into a second-class Parliament—an inferior Parliament, which will be patronised. I do not agree. Some responsibilities will remain at Westminster, for what strike us as good reasons; others will go to the Scottish Parliament.

It is perfectly fair for people to argue that the division of responsibilities should be readjusted, but, following a devolutionary settlement, there will always be some matters that are not within the remit of the Scottish Parliament and others that are. That is not a mark of disrespect, or the expression of a lack of trust. It is a question of how we achieve the breakdown in a way that has a strength and an internal logic that will serve our constitution well.

I accept that there is always room for legitimate argument. I am familiar with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe), who has a long track record—I hope that that does not sound like a sinister threat to her future—of pursuing the issue, and who has a perfectly arguable case. I take the view that one of the essential elements of the split to which I have referred is our wish to create a level playing field in the United Kingdom. That level playing field can be defined in a number of ways.

I do not think that anyone who believes in the devolution settlement would argue that company law in Scotland should be different from company law in England. Few would argue that there should be different labour laws north and south of the border. Obviously, the important financial services sector in Scotland would be enormously disadvantaged if financial services regulation differed north and south of the border. That is common sense. On balance, we have concluded that equal opportunities legislation should be on a British basis.

That does not mean that Scotland does not have an active interest in such matters; after all, we are talking about a regulatory framework. I hope that the real role of the Scottish Parliament will be to ensure that we follow best practice in Scotland, and that, in the many areas of practical politics that the Parliament will control—education, housing, law reform, and so forth—we are mindful of the need to live up to what we are trying to achieve in terms of equal opportunities. In the next few weeks, we are likely to engage in some interesting debates about the practical aspect of that.

The fact that there will not be an immediate transfer of power in relation to the regulatory mechanism does not shut us out of the field of equal opportunities. To assume otherwise is to take too defeatist a view, although I recognise and respect the energy with which the point has been put.

Mrs. Fyfe: We shall debate equal opportunities in general at a later stage, but I should like my right hon. Friend to clarify the role of the Equal Opportunities Commission in relation to the Scottish Parliament and its devolved powers. Would it act as an advisory body if the Parliament wished to proceed with legislation relating to equal opportunities in housing or training, for instance—a subject that was definitely within its remit?

Mr. Dewar: It is slightly puzzling—although I understand why it happens—that, because something has not been devolved, it is sometimes assumed that a Chinese wall has been erected and communication must stop. That is not true. It should not be thought that the EOC will not be interested in what is happening in Scotland, and will not go to Scotland to look and learn, and, perhaps, teach and encourage. Of course that process will continue, as it should. Scottish legislation will have to take account of the framework that the EOC constructed. There will be a continuing dialogue, which I welcome.

Mr. Welsh: May I ask a straightforward question? If the devolved Scottish Parliament wished to take evidence or gain information from the broadcasting media, and the media refused, what could it do, apart from saying, "Pretty please"?

Mr. Dewar: Although the hon. Gentleman is entitled to present such a doomsday scenario, I think that extremely unlikely. If it did happen, it would create a difficulty that would make the policy completely unproductive. I believe that, thus slighted, the Select Committee in the Scottish Parliament would think that its luck was in: it would probably gain more notice and more leverage. That, however, may be a cynical view.

One point that was important to the hon. Member for Perth was tackled very fairly by the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin). I am not in a partisan mood tonight, and I listened carefully to what the hon. Lady had to say. Moreover, I listened to the reprise, which resulted from a request by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan that the hon. Lady restate her position.

I entirely understand that the hon. Lady does not like what is in the White Paper, and she is entitled to argue her case; but I am not being difficult when I say that I fail to comprehend on what basis she argues that we have retreated from what is in the White Paper, or that we have betrayed the spirit of the White Paper. We have translated exactly what is in paragraph 2.11—observing the distinction between that and paragraph 2.10—to the Bill. It may be wrong, but I do not understand how it can be suggested that we are guilty of in-and-out running—that, to put it in colloquial terms, we have ratted. In that regard, I think that I am at one with the vast majority of hon. Members.

In paragraph 2.10, we refer to public bodies that deal with United Kingdom matters but also with devolved areas of responsibility. We make it clear that the Scottish Parliament, in those circumstances, would have the power to require the submission of reports and the presentation of oral evidence. We go on to make a clear distinction. That will not be the position for the other United Kingdom and Great Britain bodies that will be operating entirely in a reserved area. The Scottish Parliament will be able to invite the submission of reports and the presentation of oral evidence from those bodies.

The hon. Lady will say—indeed, I have heard her say it many times—that this is a betrayal, a tragic mistake or a lost opportunity. She can use any phrase she likes, but it is certainly not a retreat from the White Paper. I hope that she will not go around saying, in Scotland and elsewhere—on the basis of evidence that no one else can understand—that there has been a betrayal.

Mr. Dalyell: I am the last person in the world who ought to ask this question, but it was clear that the Scottish Constitutional Convention felt that responsibility for broadcasting should lie with the Scottish Parliament. There has been a change, and I am curious to know why.

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friend's curiosity is famous, and it can be a very dangerous and damaging experience to be exposed to it, so I do not want that to happen to me. The answer to his question is, quite simply, in the logic of the point that I have just been making—that we reached the conclusion that broadcasting was part of the regulatory framework, and that it was best that it should be left on a Westminster basis.

Mrs. Ewing: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dewar: I really must make some progress.

Mrs. Ewing: What did you mean by "we"?

7.30 pm

Mr. Dewar: May I make a little progress? No doubt the hon. Lady will get in later if she wants to.

It seemed to me that it was best that broadcasting was organised on a Great Britain basis. We are moving into very interesting areas of technological development. I am not sure to what extent satellites and the digital revolution observe the boundary between Scotland and England. In an age when I am told that one of the great improvements to the quality of my life will be that I shall be able to switch on 40 different television channels in my house—I feel exhausted just thinking about it—I am not sure that it makes much sense to break out of the regulatory structure of the country as a whole. The decision was taken on that basis.

It is difficult for people outside the House to follow this argument, because there is not much to devolve in broadcasting. There is an interesting and important public debate about how we can put a Scottish face on the broadcasting that is received in Scotland, and about whether we can build on the excellence of Scottish broadcasting to encourage cultural life, encourage expertise and bring back the Scottish diaspora of the broadcasting world. In all those respects, devolution gives great opportunities and great grounds for optimism.

However, in terms of statutory power—the legislative power that is at the heart of the Scottish Parliament—there is very little that could be devolved. Even the BBC would be extremely difficult to devolve, because, as I said in an intervention, it is a creature not of statute but of royal charter. Therefore, in effect, we are discussing very little.

That is not to underestimate, belittle or sweep to one side the importance of broadcasting as a cultural force, as a medium for the exchange of information, or as a way of giving people a picture of the world and giving the world a picture of Scotland. All the issues that we are discussing should be discussed; it is simply that they do not necessarily depend on the legalistic argument about the regulatory mechanism.

I do not agree—although it is arguable—that it is advantageous or important for matters concerning the maintenance of fairness and balance in programming to be handed to politicians or be directly influenced or controlled by them. I take the view that, in most of these areas, politicians—for good reasons, irrespective of party—have put in buffer organisations. We say that we do not want to be a country where, if we do not like what we see on our television set, we get on to the controller of that television channel, and say, "I am the Minister and that had bloomin' well better not happen again." It seems to me that, by doing so, one threatens democracy and essential freedoms that we all understand. The role of politicians is to set the regulatory framework—hold the ring, so to speak—and allow broadcasters to use their imagination, verve and innovative powers to produce the programming we all want.

There is an important difference of approach between those who have supported the amendments in the group before us. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East made it clear that he did not want a separate Scottish BBC. He wanted scrutiny by the Scottish Parliament of what the BBC was doing. Of course, the hon. Member for Perth wants something very different—she wants separate Scottish broadcasting. She wants, to use an odd phrase, to repatriate the licence fees in Scotland. Presumably the Scottish BBC would then live on its own resources and on the excellence of what it can earn in addition to those resources, by selling its programmes abroad.

Those are two totally different approaches to the problem, and it is important for us to try to understand which we are going for. My view is that, if one did devolve, one would almost certainly do what my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East proposes, but he should not underestimate this Parliament's ability to influence events, to deal with the realities and to encourage and promote broadcasting in Scotland.

The hon. Member for Perth, in an interesting and startling juxtaposition, said that all sorts of things could happen in the field of broadcasting. She said that there would be not a single word from the Scottish Parliament, but that no doubt it would debate the issues. Of course it will debate the issues if it considers that those issues are relevant to it, but I do not think that we need to follow her down the road of suggesting that we want to divide, and build a boundary between, broadcasting in different parts of the United Kingdom. If we wanted to do that, it would require a great deal of discussion, thought and preparation.

I know that many friends of mine in the BBC and in other parts of the broadcasting industry would wonder about such a separation. They would worry about what would happen if they relied on Scottish licence fee income. Transmission costs in Scotland are very much heavier than in some other parts of the United Kingdom. If they were not spread over the network, they would become a specific charge.

Scotland is first class at making top-class drama, and has produced many distinguished contributions to the national network, but it costs the same to make a programme for an audience of 5 million or of 60 million. One would need to rely on the programme being bought by the big channels south of the border, but there would be no guarantee of that. Therefore, there are many uncertainties and unknowns if one follows the hon. Member for Perth down that route.

Nevertheless, my main contention is that we must accept that it is better to leave the regulations on a British basis, but that we should do all we can to encourage and promote excellence of production and of operation for broadcasting in Scotland. Of course there will be a big debate. One gets into trouble by mentioning it, because people immediately think that one is running down Scottish broadcasting. However, anyone who takes a cursory interest in these matters knows that there will be such a debate. It does not depend on whether the matter is formally devolved in terms of schedule 5 or not. The argument will take place about what is right for the viewing public, and perhaps for those who are producing for the viewing public.

Many people think that we should opt out of 9 o'clock and 10 o'clock national news bulletins and produce our own in Scotland. Others fear that it would be a regressive step, which we should not take. I am not trying to pass judgment, but that debate will continue. The real debate is about how we organise, promote and innovate within the existing regulatory framework. I am confident—very hopeful—that we shall be able to persuade, for example, the BBC that devolution is also a matter for it: that devolution within the BBC is a matter of prime importance, which it must take very seriously.

I did attend the seminar the other day. I was glad that Sir Christopher Bland was there, and that people from other parts of the network were there to listen and, I hope, to think about the consequences of what is happening and how the BBC, in terms of its charter, its aspirations and its great traditions, can respond, reflect and service the new confidence in Scotland and the broadcasting industry in Scotland.

I should like to think that devolution will give a big boost to the possibility of bringing to fruition the scheme to put a new headquarters building on Pacific quay in Glasgow, moving the headquarters from Queen Margaret drive and expanding the production facilities in a way that will be advantageous to broadcasting in Scotland.

Production facilities may be made available to independent producers. A great deal is happening there. I know of many people of talent who are returning to Scotland because they are attracted to the buzz, the movement and the excitement of the changes that will follow the constitutional reforms that I hope the House and this Parliament will agree in the next few months.

It is much more important to ensure that we do a good job in those terms than to get hooked up on a technical argument about breaking the regulatory framework of the United Kingdom without doing much to aid the really important cause of better broadcasting—better servicing of the viewing and listening public. I look forward with immense confidence, because I have a great deal of faith in the ability of the Scottish broadcasting fraternity to respond.

I hold to the view that, in a sense, the split is not as fundamental as some people have made out. A great deal will happen in the weeks ahead which I hope will be helpful in setting the pattern and making it clear that Scotland has an increasingly important and independent role to play—in a non-political sense—within the framework of United Kingdom broadcasting. The Government have made proposals for strengthening the link between the Scottish Parliament and broadcasters. The BBC, the Independent Television Commission, the Radio Authority and the Broadcasting Standards Council should remain under reserved matters in schedule 5, which means that formal accountability will remain at Westminster.

The draft executive devolution order requires consultation with Scottish Ministers in connection with the appointment of the Scottish member of the ITC, and we propose similar provisions for appointments to the Broadcasting Standards Council and the Radio Authority. That will require some adjustment to the powers of appointment to those bodies, because there is currently no separate provision for a Scottish member. That will be a new and considerable influence, which, under present arrangements, is not within the power of the Secretary of State. It will be a matter for the Scottish Executive and, ultimately, the Parliament.

There is much happening, and I think that those broadcasting bodies will lay their reports before the Scottish Parliament. Discussions on those matters are continuing, and we may later be able to report on them.

Mr. Godman: As always, I am listening carefully to my right hon. Friend. I agree that the overwhelming majority of the people I know in Queen Margaret drive are excited about the prospects of political devolution and its implications for broadcasting. I am concerned about the BBC hierarchy in London, which for years has sought to centralise the BBC. I hope that it will take on board what my right hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Dewar: There has always been tension within the BBC over how it uses its resources. To be fair, it has been under increasing pressure, perhaps because of the reluctance of politicians to increase the licence fee or to look at other forms of financial support. We appreciate the difficulties, but I agree with my hon. Friend: we must persuade not just the BBC but many other broadcasters that they have a responsibility to respond to the challenges of devolution. There are signs of that happening.

I sometimes meet people whom I have not seen in Scotland for some years, and I say, "What are you doing here?" The reply is, "I have just got a job as the new Scottish political correspondent, a job that has just been created." People in the commissioning business tell me that they are getting increased budgets and that they will be doing more business, hopefully, with independent Scottish production units in Scottish broadcasting.

The BBC is governed by royal charter, not by statute, and the Government intend that the appointment of the national governor for Scotland will be made after full consultation with Scottish Ministers. Those are important safeguards. When we compare the powers of the Secretary of State on those matters with what will be provided for the Scottish Parliament, it is clear that the cupboard is anything but empty and that considerable and welcome changes are to be introduced.

I appreciate that long speeches are not necessarily right, so I shall quickly deal with some of the issues that were raised in the debate. The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) asked about local television. Independent cable operators are controlled by the ITC. As I have said, we intend to strengthen the Scottish input to that body by ensuring that one of its members will represent Scotland. The ITC has a Scottish office, and takes an appreciated interest in what is happening.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Mr. Godman) asked about a dedicated channel for Parliament. There have been no specific discussions on that, but there is much contact at the moment with the broadcasting authorities about how the new Parliament building will be serviced, and how a media centre or some such facility that will be adequate for the undoubted interest can be created. No doubt we shall look at such matters in due course.

The question about the Scottish Law Commission was an interesting one. Perhaps it would be infra dig to say that it was produced like a rabbit out of a hat, but it is important.

The Scottish Law Commission was included in the draft order because it will continue to have functions that will affect United Kingdom Ministers and the law that relates to reserved matters. The contact is multi-faceted because law reform proposals in the domestic law of Scotland are bound to have a significant knock-on effect. Under current arrangements, the appointment of the chair and members of the commission are matters for the Secretary of State. We want to look at that, and I entirely agree that it is an important matter in the context of a body that is central to Scottish law.

The topic of the Social Security and Child Support Commissioners was even more unexpected as a subject for discussion. Of course social security is a reserved matter, and it will remain outwith the remit of the Scottish Parliament. It will be the preserve—I think that that is the appropriate word—of the Lord Chancellor. There will be provision for proper consultation, which will be achieved by means of the executive devolution order. The draft order was published on 5 February. It is another interesting interface for which reasonably proper and sensible provision has been made. It is clear that the debate will continue for a long time.

Mr. Wallace: The Secretary of State seems to be coming to the end of his speech. Will he answer some of the questions about Gaelic broadcasting and funding?

Mr. Dewar: I have taken some advice about that and it seems that the amendment on it is not needed. We would not have opposed it if its intention had not already been achieved. The Government's grant to the Gaelic Broadcasting Committee comes from the Scottish block, and decisions on the allocation of the fund are matters for the committee. As the Scottish block will be under the control of the Scottish Executive and, ultimately, the Scottish Parliament, that can be varied.

Mr. Dalyell: I asked about clause 83(5). There would be subordinate legislation detailing cross-border public bodies. I think that the Minister has the answer.

Mr. Dewar: I do not want to be a smart alick, but I have to say that my advisers are not there to prompt my hon. Friend. The working draft of the Cross-Border Public Bodies (Specification) Order 1999 was published yesterday, and I am sure that it can be made available to my hon. Friend. I shall check, and if there is any doubt, I am sure that we can resolve it by conversation.

There is provision in the draft executive devolution order for Government funding for Gaelic broadcasting to be the responsibility of the Scottish Executive within a regulatory framework, but the matter falls to the Scottish Executive. It will be open to Scottish Ministers, subject to the agreement of the Parliament, to vary the annual allocation of funds to the Gaelic Broadcasting Committee.

We do not need to make further provision. If there is better advice, or if some substantial worry is drawn to the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland, he can in turn draw it to my attention. My advice is that he would be safe to let the matter drop, in the knowledge that his purpose has been well met in the existing arrangements.

I do not doubt that there will be a long argument and debate, but I am somewhat consoled by the fact that it will not be tonight, as we have only 11 minutes left on this group of amendments. I do not take a defeatist view of the debate—in fact, the very opposite. No group in Scottish life has more to gain from the changes—apart, perhaps, from politicians—or will get greater satisfaction out of the arrangements.

The Scottish people will not be forgotten. They are the masters at the end of the day, as the Conservative party knows to its cost.

Mr. Jenkin: The right hon. Gentleman is so easily amused.

Mr. Dewar: I take it from the hon. Gentleman's tone that he is not amused, which gives me some considerable satisfaction. However, we can discuss this on another occasion.

I cannot recommend the amendments to the House. I am sure that we will have much to celebrate in Scottish broadcasting in the years that lie ahead.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: The Secretary of State surprised me with his final remarks—I think not. I draw to his attention the arrival in the Chamber of my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who the right hon. Gentleman appears to think has come to ensure that I say precisely what he would have me say. I have known my hon. Friend for some 20 years and he has never yet succeeded in achieving the aim that the Secretary of State fondly imagines him to have. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is right, and my hon. Friend's appearance in the Chamber is part of his continued attempt to achieve that control. However, I say to the assembled masses here that, if he has not succeeded in the past 20 years, he is certainly not going to succeed in the next 20 years. He will certainly not succeed tonight.

The fact is that I, my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan and my other hon. Friends agree because we agree, not because we are told what we must or must not think. This may surprise members of other political parties, but members of my party are able to come to some agreement. My hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Morgan) is away on a parliamentary trip—

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Where has he gone?

Ms Cunningham: My hon. Friend is in Japan with the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. I am sure that he is having a wonderful time, but not as wonderful a time as we are having.

I want briefly to refer to the aspects of the amendments that relate to clause 83. Although the overall intention behind the amendments relates to the devolution of broadcasting, some other issues have been raised. I note what has been said about amendment No. 93, which is not an SNP amendment. I support the remarks about the Equal Opportunities Commission, and I look forward to the debate that we will undoubtedly have on another occasion.

Although the comments on amendment No. 93 related to the EOC, they also expressed the same underlying concern about the clause that I expressed in relation to broadcasting. I do not know whether the Secretary of State wants to accept it, or whether he wants to continue looking puzzled, but the truth is that there is concern about what all this ultimately will mean.

I hear what the right hon. Gentleman says about paragraph 2.10 of the White Paper. However, paragraph 2.11 has not been translated into the Bill. The Secretary of State is shaking his head. He is clearly trying to tell me that it does not need to be in the Bill. In that case, its inclusion in the White Paper was misdirection, which is a pity.

Our amendments are about the definition contained in clause 83. We envisage anomalies arising from that. It is all very well to say that, with good will, matters will work out—the truth is that invitations can be politely, graciously but frequently declined. We all decline invitations on occasion.

I am astonished that the debate about the devolution of broadcasting is seen as a threat to democracy. I have already quoted a number of prominent broadcasters who support our concept. I hope, and have every expectation, that Scottish broadcasting will thrive in the coming years.

I want to quote someone who is as well known to the Secretary of State as the other people I mentioned earlier. I refer to Nigel Smith, whom the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) may think is a wild-eyed separatist, along with all the other people he thinks are wild-eyed separatists. In fact, this particular wild-eyed separatist is on the Labour party vetting committee for Scottish Parliament candidates. He is also a former member of the BBC Scottish broadcasting council, and chairman of Scotland Forward.

In a letter, Nigel Smith gives a list of issues that a Scottish Parliament could debate, but over which it would have no related powers. I recognise that some of the issues have been raised by hon. Members, but Nigel Smith's list includes Channel 5 coverage in Scotland, the sale of BBC transmitters in Scotland, cross-media takeovers and the BBC licence in Scotland. Those are all issues that Nigel Smith thinks are important. He believes not only that the Scottish Parliament should be able to debate them, but that it should have the power to do something about them.

Nigel Smith is hardly someone whom the Government would regard as a star-gazing, wild-eyed revolutionary. If they did, he would be surprised to hear it. I have already referred to the comments of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East and his attack on "Voice for Scotland", which he claimed was following a separatist agenda. I am not sure to whom he was referring. Perhaps it was Pat Chalmers, who I understand was a Liberal Democrat councillor. I am sure that he would be surprised to discover that he was thought to be a wild-eyed separatist. Equally, Ruth Wishart would be surprised to discover that, in the eyes of the hon. Gentleman, she is a wild-eyed separatist.

Mr. Connarty rose—

Ms Cunningham: I have only three minutes left, so I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

It was Ruth Wishart who provided me with the newspaper analogy that the hon. Gentleman seemed to find so threatening. Perhaps he should direct his concerns and fears to that eminent person, who is undoubtedly well known to the hon. Gentleman.

Nigel Smith's letter was written to the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. He directly referred to the existing arrangements as indirect, diffuse and bound up with Scotland's small share in British broadcasting. His view is:

"If . . . Devolution is to breathe new life into Scottish affairs some care should be taken to see that vitality is properly reflected in the most important medium of the Age"— broadcasting.

It was daft to claim that we would not get the soaps in Scotland. People who suggest that should get a grip. I am happy to go on record that my preferred soap is "EastEnders". I make absolutely sure that it is taped if I am unable to watch it, as I do not want to miss it. However, it is a trivialisation of the debate to use those terms.

Nor is the debate about control—it is about having powers equivalent to those that Westminster currently has. Frankly, if it is so bad for the Scottish Parliament to have those powers, why is it acceptable for Westminster to have them? I quote Nigel Smith on that matter. He said:

"This appeal should not be misrepresented as an argument for controlling broadcasting."

As I said, Nigel Smith is busy helping the Labour party to vet potential candidates for the Scottish Parliament. I therefore think that his views on the matter are very instructive and useful to share. I thank him.

I am grateful also to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) for his useful contribution in explaining the position of the constitutional convention. He is an example of the cross-party support for our amendment.

The international context is important, and we need more programming in Scotland that reflects Scottish interests in overseas matters. I specifically commend "Eorpa" on meeting that need week after week. It is one of the best factual programmes on Scottish television—in Gaelic, but subtitled for the rest of us who watch it avidly. It is another programme that I tape and ensure—

It being Eight o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [23 February], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Clause 83 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 84

POWER TO ADAPT CROSS-BORDER PUBLIC BODIES

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): I beg to move amendment No. 461, in page 38, leave out lines 32 to 35.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 463, in page 39, line 7, at end add

'and it has been passed by an affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament'.

No. 428, in clause 85, page 39, line 31, leave out 'has' and insert

'and such other persons or bodies as the Parliament may determine have'.

No. 462, page 39, line 31, at end add

'and it has been passed by an affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament'.

Dr. Fox: In his long and winding winding-up speech, the Secretary of State referred to the cross-border public bodies specification paper made available to hon. Members a couple of days ago, a paper whose naive optimism shines through. It talks about the Government envisaging that the Scottish Parliament will want to continue these arrangements. It is very optimistic, to the extent that one would have to have powers well in excess of those of Mystic Meg to be able to predict anything of the sort.

8.15 pm

Clauses 83 to 85 give power to the part of the White Paper that deals with the statutory right to consultation. I want to know from the Minister what one or two of the terms in this part mean, which is why we have tabled these probing amendments.

I should like the Minister to give us the plain person's plain English guide to what "subordinate" actually means in clause 84 and how it relates to other clauses, especially clause 101(8). Everything seems to hinge on there being agreement. Clause 84(1)(a) is most extraordinary. It refers to "enabling powers to be exercised or requiring duties to be performed by the Scottish Ministers instead of by a Minister of the Crown, or by the one or by the other, or by both jointly or by either with the agreement of or after consultation with the other".

Thus the provisions in paragraph (a) gradually become watered down. They remind me of what a friend of mine said after a particularly bad night. She said that she was never going to drink again;, well, not during the day; well, not in the morning, except for white wine—before she had a bloody Mary before breakfast. Paragraph (a) waters down the provision, but amendment No. 461 would delete that paragraph.

I am looking forward to hearing what the Minister has to say. Can subordinate legislation

"make provision in relation to a cross-border public body"

by agreement or after consultation? Does "after consultation" mean that even if no agreement is reached, it can all go ahead anyway? Does it mean that under subordinate legislation the Parliament can do exactly what it wants?

Amendment No. 462 deals with perhaps the most interesting aspect of the matter. We want to ensure that there will be sufficient scrutiny by the House, so we wish the Bill to state that no subordinate legislation shall be made under the clause unless the cross-border public body concerned has been consulted and an affirmative resolution has been passed by both Houses. That would give the House sufficient power to protect the future of the cross-border bodies and would prevent the ping-pong and recipe for friction that are all too apparent in the clause.

I especially look forward to the Minister defining exactly what "subordinate" means in the clause so that, as the Secretary of State said at the outset, we can avoid the worst-case scenario in which we get into utterly unnecessary scraps about the future of these bodies once the Parliament is up and running.

Mr. Dalyell: Clause 84(3) requires the cross-border body concerned to be consulted before subordinate legislation is made to adapt it under the clause. What form is this consultation going to take?

Mr. McLeish: Before speaking specifically to the amendments, I should like to take up and deal with the points made by the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). First, the notes on clauses contain an explanation of the various subsections. Secondly, we anticipate coming back on Report with some technical amendments that will clarify and simplify some of the issues raised. Thirdly, in an attempt to be courteous and helpful, I will send a letter to the hon. Gentleman about the raft of clauses that deal with subordinate legislation, giving an insight into how they are constructed and hang together and what the impact will be on, for example, consultation. I hope that that is helpful.

Dr. Fox: Apart from writing to me, will the Minister make the letter available to all parties, and will he ensure that copies are available in the Library for the benefit of all right hon. and hon. Members?

Mr. McLeish: I apologise for that oversight. Copies will be sent to the spokespersons of the parties and to right hon. and hon. Members who have attended our proceedings and taken an active interest in them.

The amendments relate to important considerations dealing with subordinate legislation. In the context of amendments Nos. 461, 463, 428 and 462, clauses 84 and 85 are essential elements of the provision which the Bill makes to implement the proposals in the White Paper for dealing with those public bodies that are concerned with both devolved and reserved matters. These are the cross-border public bodies that we have been talking about.

[Mr. McLeish]

Amendment No. 461 would delete an essential part of clause 84—that which enables ministerial powers and duties to be exercised in a way appropriate to the body concerned, either by transferring them to the Scottish Ministers or providing that they will be exercised jointly, after consultation or with agreement. The amendment would entrench the position under clause 83 whereby the functions are exercisable only by a Minister of the Crown, albeit with a requirement to have consulted the Scottish Minister in certain cases. For some bodies, that position might be appropriate, but for many it is only right that the Scottish Ministers should exercise appropriate control.

It would, for example, make sense that a Scottish Minister should alone be able to exercise a power of direction in relation to devolved matters in or as regards Scotland. The bodies are, after all, concerned with devolved matters for which the Scottish Executive will be accountable. Of course, if we fail to make provision for a fair and equitable reallocation of powers in the way provided for by clause 84, it will make it all the more likely that the Scottish Parliament will decide to legislate to set up a separate body. It seems to be far more sensible and efficient instead to create the conditions under which cross-border bodies can continue to serve both United Kingdom and Scottish Ministers.

I hope that in the light of that explanation the hon. Gentleman will agree that his amendment would introduce an undesirable rigidity into the arrangements that can be made for enabling these public bodies to continue to operate on a cross-border basis, and that he will withdraw the amendment.

Dr. Fox: Subsection (1)(a) reads:

"either with the agreement of or after consultation with the other".

Does "after consultation" mean that if no agreement is reached, powers can still be taken under subordinate legislation to go ahead, even if one side or party is unwilling that that should be so?

Mr. McLeish: We intend to have consultation and, we hope, agreement. We are talking of cross-border public bodies as defined in the relevant clauses. We hope that agreement will always be the result. If not, the procedures that are provided by the Bill in the light of failure to agree would be set in motion. Such procedures are contained in other clauses. It is important to recognise that we are talking about subordinate legislation in both houses. We are talking also about agreement with the principal parties concerned. If we talk about a cross-border public body, we talk also about reserved and devolved matters involving the same body. Therefore, the responsibilities of Holyrood and those of Westminster would proceed on the basis that I have outlined.

Amendments Nos. 463 and 462 are similar in effect. They would require subordinate legislation under clauses 84 and 85 to be subject to affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament. First, I should assure the hon. Gentleman that I fully share his concern that there should be adequate scrutiny of any subordinate legislation that is made under clauses 84 and 85. However, I contend that amendments Nos. 482 and 483 would be unnecessarily restrictive. As for clause 101, any order made under clause 84 must be laid both in this Parliament and in the Scottish Parliament. In terms of clause 102, these powers are open powers, which means, among other things, that the order may be subject to affirmative or negative procedure.

In practice, we think that the subject matter of these orders will often not require debate. It is surely not being suggested that, for example, where the order is concerned only with a power to certify the accounts of a particular body, it should be subject to affirmative procedure. We certainly do not think that it would be appropriate to make every such order subject to affirmative procedure, as amendment No. 463 would do.

Again, we are talking about flexibility and considering the specific issue that will be the subject of subordinate legislation. I think that flowing from that would be a decision taken by both Houses on the procedures to be adopted. In the light of what I have said, I ask the hon. Gentleman not to press amendments Nos. 482 and 483.

I move on to amendment No. 428. We are putting in place provisions to enable public bodies to continue to operate on a cross-border basis, but we must take account of the fact, that where matters are not reserved, the Scottish Parliament will be able to legislate to provide that such a body should no longer exercise its functions in relation to devolved matters in or as regards Scotland. Most probably, this would be in the context of a decision to set up separate Scottish arrangements. Clause 85 enables the practical consequences of such a decision to be dealt with, by enabling the transfer of appropriate property.

Again, it is all about flexibility being built into the future. The current settlement on cross-border public bodies could change. The proposed facility will allow both Parliaments closely to examine the distribution of the powers and responsibilities and allow sensible decisions to be made in the light of what is happening around the bodies concerned.

The clause imposes a requirement for the body concerned to be consulted before an order is made, and that is absolutely right. Amendment No. 428 would, in addition, require prior consultation with other persons to be determined by the Scottish Parliament. Presumably the hon. Gentleman would want the United Kingdom Parliament to have a similar role. However, in the Government's view such additional requirements are unnecessary. As I have said, the procedure for subordinate legislation under the clause requires agreement between the UK Government and the Scottish Executive, and orders will be laid before both Parliaments. That surely will be enough to ensure that all those with a legitimate interests will be aware of what is proposed. I cannot see the point of the additional mechanism that would be imposed by the amendment.

In the light of those comments, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that amendment No. 428 is unnecessary and that he will not press it.

Mr. Dalyell: What is my hon. Friend's answer to my question on subsection (3)?

Mr. McLeish: I have answered the point. The question is about subordinate legislation, and we are talking about a process where subordinate legislation will be processed by both Houses. It is clearly the position that no action can be taken until the cross-border public body has been consulted on the changes that are envisaged. The process will ensure consultation between the body and the Parliament. It allows for discussions, if necessary, between the Scottish Executive and Westminster Ministers, and from there would flow the appropriate legislation to enact that which was being suggested. It will be a comprehensive process of consultation. Again, this is reflected in other parts of the Bill, and the Committee will remember our discussions on various other procedures affecting the change from Westminster to Holyrood.

Dr. Fox: I find myself somewhat disconcerted and almost speechless given the Minister's new-found flexibility. In almost his opening sentence, he agreed with the Opposition that the current descriptions and explanations of "subordinate" are virtually incomprehensible as they are written. We are glad to be told by the Minister that the Government will require to bring technical amendments before the House of Commons so that the provisions can become understandable. That information is gratefully received by those of us who are not lawyers, who thought that we simply could not understand the Bill.

I welcome the Minister's plan to write to all Members who have taken an interest in these matters, to set out explanations of how the Government will proceed. That having been said, I have reservations about references to subordinate legislation remaining in the Bill, but on this occasion we shall give the Minister the benefit of the doubt. I look forward to his explanations. No doubt we can return to these matters at a later stage. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: I know that you will rule me out, Sir Alan, if what I am about to say is out of order. I tell my hon. Friend the Minister immediately that I do not expect a full answer.

With all this laying of orders it would seem to be assumed that there will be available to the Scottish Parliament the expertise that we often take for granted of the Clerks of the House of Commons. I do not know whether this is the right moment to ask the question, but are there proposals for seconding members of the expert Clerks Department? We are talking of refined expertise. Certainly, 20 years ago there was a good deal of controversy about this. I do not know the answer to the question. If my hon. Friend says, "I shall give you the answer but not on clause 84", I would take that as acceptable.

In parenthesis, there is the question of transferring the expertise of a Fees Office. I shall not stray out of order but I am wondering about these practical matters.

Mr. McLeish: I am tempted to say that the transfer of the Fees Office or some equivalent might rank higher in the priorities of some hon. Members. I should like to give my hon. Friend this simple reassurance. We are establishing a serious Parliament in Edinburgh. Through our civil servants, we receive some of the best advice available and we have set up a committee of the consultative steering group to look at technical procedures. My hon. Friend can be absolutely assured that we intend to provide a professional operation at Holyrood from day one, which means that we will need to look at all the issues he mentioned. I have no reason to doubt that expert advice will be available in Edinburgh at the appropriate time. We have it available in this House and it will be available in Holyrood.

Clause 85

POWER TO TRANSFER PROPERTY OF CROSS-BORDER PUBLIC BODIES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

8.30 pm

Mr. Dalyell: I have a small point, which comes from the Law Society of Scotland. It is concerned about clause 85(5) and wants an amendment ensuring that the obligation to consult on subordinate legislation affecting cross-border public bodies will be adequate and not limited to the body concerned. The reason is that the Law Society is of the view that wide consultation on proposals to make subordinate legislation is necessary, especially in relation to cross-border bodies. Does the Minister have any reflections on that request?

Mr. McLeish: The Law Society has made some constructive points, but, again, I give my hon. Friend the assurance that those points are covered. There is already consultation with the cross-border public body affected, but wider consultation will invariably happen, because we shall be dealing with two serious orders that have to be processed through Holyrood and Westminster. In that process, there will be wider consultation than is envisaged in the direct consultation between the cross-border public body and the two Parliaments.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 85 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 86

MALADMINISTRATION

Mr. Gorrie: I beg to move amendment No. 410, in page 39, line 34, leave out 'to its members'.

[Mr. Gorrie]

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 411, in page 40, line 4, at end add—

'(4A) The Parliament may, by subordinate legislation, alter the list of authorities within its investigatory jurisdiction in so far as it relates to matters which are not reserved.'.

Mr. Gorrie: The purpose of the amendment is quite clear: it is designed to make it simpler and more tidy for the Scottish Parliament to set up its ombuds-system.

As it stands, the Bill suggests that provision should be made for the "investigation of relevant complaints made to its members".

As I understand it, the system at Westminster is that all requests for investigation to the ombudsman have to go through a Member of Parliament. In the case of local government, it stated that any request had to go through a local councillor, but the system was changed to ensure that requests could go direct. We are suggesting that, in the case of the Scottish Parliament, any form of application can be used, so that people can go direct to the ombudsperson, or to their Scottish Member of Parliament, or to their Westminster Member of Parliament, or to their European Member of Parliament, or to a local councillor.

In that way, people will not be put off or confused about which of the different people they should approach. Some members of the public will not distinguish between powers held at Holyrood—or Glasgow—and powers held here at Westminster. There is confusion among hon. Members of this House, so there is bound to be greater confusion among members of the public. It is much tidier if any route can be used.

Mr. Godman: Would it not make better sense to allow the Scottish Parliament itself to determine how complaints should be brought to an ombudsman?

Mr. Gorrie: Our amendment would allow that to happen. We suggest removing the words "to its members", so that the clause would read:

"The Parliament shall make provision for the investigation of relevant complaints made . . . in respect of any action taken".

It would then be up to the Parliament to set out the precise system. Under the Bill as it stands, people would have to contact their Member of the Scottish Parliament.

An additional issue is that in the Scottish Parliament, there will not be the same degree of ownership, if I may call it that, of a complaint by the constituency Member. That is because there will also be the list Members, many of whom will be well-known in the area and who may be approached by the public to pursue a case. We think that our suggestion is extremely constructive and would help to speed matters along the way.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): The local government ombudsman is able to take complaints direct from the public. Is that the model that the hon. Gentleman prefers and is proposing that the Scottish Parliament should use?

Mr. Gorrie: We accept the point made by the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Mr. Godman) that it would be up to the Parliament to determine the precise arrangements, but we have no objection to an individual citizen being able to contact the ombudsperson directly, if that is what is decided.

As I understand it, the view in ombuds-circles is that it would be more helpful if people were able to go direct to the ombudsman, rather than having to go through their Member of Parliament, so we think that that is a good route. However, our main point is that the Bill is too prescriptive: it should be open to the Scottish Parliament to decide what system it wants to use and we should not prescribe that complaints should have to go through a Member of that Parliament.

Amendment No. 411 merely suggests that the Scottish Parliament should be able to alter fairly easily the list of duties covered by the ombudsperson, so that if new duties emerge, there will be no great difficulty in adding to the list. We feel that our amendments are helpful and uncontroversial, and I am happy to commend them to the Committee.

Mr. Heald: It is a curious aspect of the Bill that some matters are left so vague, and that is certainly true in respect of the ombudsman for Scotland.

As hon. Members will know from their own experience dealing with the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, the local government ombudsman and the health ombudsman, there is already a good deal of overlap between the jurisdiction of the various authorities that have been established. One of my concerns, which prompts the first of my questions to the Minister, is to ask what is going to happen in respect of the various Scottish authorities which are already covered by the parliamentary commissioner, for example, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, Scottish Homes, the Scottish medical practices committee, Scottish Natural Heritage, the Scottish tourist board and the Sports Council for Scotland? It is not clear from the wording of clause 86(1) whether those bodies come under the terms of the clause and are bodies which act

"on behalf of . . . a member of the Scottish Executive".

I should be grateful if the Minister could explain what will happen to the various authorities under the new arrangements. He may say that the Government want to leave a good deal of discretion to the Scottish Parliament. What would be the legal effect of the clause without the amendment? Would the Parliament be able to take on the responsibility of having its own commissioner for those important bodies in Scotland?

My second question is whether it is possible for the job done by the health ombudsman for the United Kingdom to be severed so that the Scottish part of the job is dealt with by the Scottish ombudsman. Is that the Government's proposal?

Thirdly, what about the functions of the various other authorities that have responsibilities similar to those of the ombudsman? Fourthly, will it be possible for a Scottish ombudsman to take over a range of responsibilities for various authorities in Scotland, or will scrutiny in an area of devolved responsibility be dealt with by the UK Parliament?

Finally, the Scottish Parliament may take responsibility for tourism in Scotland. Two of the reserved matters in the Bill are the subject matter of the Timeshare Act 1992 and the Package Travel, Holidays and Tours Regulations 1992, which are central to tourism. What would happen if the Scottish tourist board were dealt with by the Parliament, but the UK ombudsman dealt with scrutiny of the Scottish tourist board?

Mr. Dalyell: I shall treasure the collective suggested by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie) of ombuds-circles. I like the idea of moving in ombuds-circles.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): An alternative to crop circles.

Mr. Dalyell: Maybe, but we all have a problem. Come the Scottish Parliament, what about our surgeries? Endless people will come to us as at present. When they turn up, it is difficult to say, "That has nothing to do with me, go to your Member of the Scottish Parliament."

Mrs. Anne McGuire (Stirling): That happens anyway.

Mr. Dalyell: It will be a difficult situation for all of us.

Mr. Godman: I have some sympathy for the amendments, but if the avenue along which complaints are made is widened, how will the ombudsman—or ombudswoman, presumably—deal with vexatious or ridiculous complaints? Constituents currently bring complaints for the parliamentary ombudsman to their Member of Parliament. That is not a bad system. Not so long ago, I had occasion to forward a complaint to the parliamentary ombudsman—I think that it was Mr. Reid at the time—from a pregnant 17-year-old girl who was given no help by the Department of Social Security. Local social workers had also achieved nothing on her behalf. The Department had acted very badly towards her. I forwarded her complaint to Mr. Reid. The then Secretary of State for Social Security, Mr. Tony Newton, came to the Dispatch Box to apologise to my constituent through me.

The fact that a Member of Parliament can forward a complaint carries some weight. The Member of Parliament might have to tell the constituent that their complaint is not one of maladministration. We may have to be more delicate than to say that it is a vexatious complaint, but it really should not be taken to the ombudsman.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the system is well understood? Someone who has a complaint about a public body goes to their Member of Parliament. They both know that the threat of reference to the ombudsman is powerful. Would it not be wrong if confusion crept into the system, with different ombudsmen for different matters? Is not the definition of an ombuds-circle what happens if someone goes to their Member of Parliament, is referred to the Westminster ombudsman and is then told that the matter is one for the Scottish ombudsman, so it goes to the Member of the Scottish Parliament, who sends it to the Scottish ombudsman, who in turn says that it is a matter for the health ombudsman?

Mr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman is now referring to this circle. With the creation of a number of ombudsmen and ombudswomen, the public are gradually becoming aware of the spheres of responsibility of respective administrators.

My concern is that the amendment takes away the involvement of a Member of Parliament. On the matter of a local authority ombudsman, it is reasonable enough to argue, as many of us did, that local authority tenants, for example, sometimes found difficulty in complaining about the local authority housing department to the local councillor who may well have been a member of the housing committee. In all conscience, I believe that, given my experience of the workings of the system—not the circle—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie) ought to withdraw his amendment.

8.45 pm

Mr. Wallace: This is a matter of practicality. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is standing for the Scottish Parliament. Assuming that he is not and he is a Westminster Member, would he say to a constituent who came to him with a complaint and who wanted to go to the ombudsman—given that the hon. Gentleman immediately identifies that the matter is within the Scottish Parliament's jurisdiction—"Sorry, I cannot take this complaint to an ombudsman. Go and find your MSP"? The same would apply if the hon. Gentleman received the complaint by correspondence. Would not he be creating an extra layer of correspondence?

Mr. Godman: Not at all. People come along to our surgeries every day with complaints about housing, and we have to say that it is not our responsibility but the responsibility of their local councillor. Similarly, if people come along with concerns about social work matters, we have to say, "This is a matter for your councillor." If someone came to me with a complaint of maladministration and I thought that his or her complaint would be best dealt with by my local MSP, I would advise them to go to their MSP's next surgery. The matter would be the MSP's responsibility, not mine.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) clearly wants to defend his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie), but he is not thinking clearly. He knows that, at the minute, if one of the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Mr. Godman) wanted him to pass a complaint to the local authority ombudsman, my hon. Friend could not do so. He would have to see a councillor, who would send it on. That is the way that it works.

Mr. Godman: That regulation was of course changed not so long ago, and I agreed with that change. There were times when the local councillor might have been involved directly in the decision making against which the complaint was being made. That does not happen with Members of Parliament, unless they are Ministers. I do not see the problem that the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) raised about referring a complaint made in a Westminster Member's surgery to a Member of the Scottish Parliament.

There is good sense in a Member of Parliament channelling the complaint to the ombudsman. I have made a number of such complaints. In most cases, the ombudsman has said that they were not cases of maladministration. However, I have given the example of the young pregnant girl who was treated very callously by the local social security department, which forced Mr. Tony Newton—who was only too willing to do so—to apologise to her at the Dispatch Box. He was a first-class Cabinet Minister, despite being a Conservative. He also wrote to me saying that he agreed with the ombudsman finding against his Department. That is a powerful tool that is used by Members of Parliament on behalf of their constituents. We should leave clause 86 as it is, yet allow for the Parliament to decide in the course of time to modify the system if it wishes. I like the idea of a Member of Parliament being involved in such complaints.

Mr. McAllion: I had not intended to intervene in the debate, but a certain confusion is evident on the part of everyone who has taken part so far. I think that we have all agreed that it is wrong that councillors, for example, should have to refer complaints against the council to the local government ombudsman, because there is an obvious conflict of interests when councillors complain against their own council.

However, exactly the same applies to Members of this Parliament as applies to Members of the Scottish Parliament. The complaint may be against a Housing Minister or a Health Minister in the Scottish Parliament, and that person may be a Labour Minister. If one's local Member of the Scottish Parliament happens to be Labour too, do we not see a conflict of interests? A Labour Member of the Scottish Parliament would have to put forward a complaint against a Labour Minister in a Labour Government in the Scottish Parliament. The same conflict of interest arises there as arises now with councils.

Therefore, there is an element of confusion. I would have no objection to taking the phrase "to its members" out of the clause, because that would leave the Scottish Parliament to draw up its own code of guidance about how the right could be exercised by individuals throughout Scotland.

In the modern age, we always have to beware of the party system. We must remember that this Parliament is dominated by the party system. The Scottish Parliament is likely to be less so; none the less, it will still be evident—

Mr. Heald: Was the possibility that the hon. Gentleman had in mind that in a regional list system, if someone who was No. 1 on the list misbehaved, he might be No. 9 next time?

Mr. McAllion: To be No. 9 in a list would be a big step up for me. The lesson applies both ways. It is not only list Members to whom pressure can be applied. Pressure can also be applied to Members who stand in constituencies, and that is done most effectively, I can assure the hon. Gentleman.

My point is serious. If members of the public have the right to complain against an Executive in Parliament, the road for making the complaint should not lie solely through the Members of that Parliament, because the party system will come into play and there will be pressure on Members not to further the complaint if to do so would work to the detriment of their party. I am speaking not about the Labour party alone, but about whichever party happens to be in power at the time.

This is an interesting debate. I would like to hear why we should not open up the ways in which people can complain about the activities of Ministers in Parliament, because I am in favour of individuals having the maximum right to complain about Governments.

Mr. Davidson: My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) does himself and his colleagues something of an injustice when he says that most Members would have reservations about sending something to the ombudsman if it might embarrass their party. The ombudsman is empowered to deal not with policy matters, but only with maladministration, and the overwhelming majority of Members would completely disregard the party loyalty of the Minister involved when deciding whether to put forward a particular case.

Nobody seriously believes that any Minister directly, himself or herself, does all the administration on individual social security or housing cases, or on anything else, so I do not believe that problems would be put directly at the door of individual Ministers, as my hon. Friend suggested.

However, I still have reservations about what is being proposed, because I worry that if a complaints procedure is open to all and sundry, it leaves the system open to what are described as vexatious litigants. I have several constituents who come to me at the moment wanting matters to be pursued with the ombudsman—or the ombudsperson, or even ombuds-circles, to coin a phrase.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) rose—

Mr. Davidson: Let me give my examples, and then I shall let the hon. Lady intervene.

One lady is especially upset because the Benefits Agency does not provide additional benefit for people with dogs. She believes that a supplementary payment should be made to those with dogs. I have tried to indicate to her that this is a policy matter, and not an administration matter; it seems clear to me that the elected Member of Parliament has a responsibility to cut such matters out of the system.

Similarly, a lady told me that she wanted to see her referendum paper. She wanted to know where it was, and she believed that the fact that she was not allowed to see it was an example of maladministration which she wanted pursued. That sort of thing could easily clutter up the entire system unnecessarily.

Another constituent asked me how she knew that I had been elected. It is a good point, which has had me somewhat confused. I explained that she could write to the returning officer, but she had done so. He had written back, but she asked how the returning officer knew that I had been elected. How did she know that the votes cast were cast for me? How did she know that the counters counted the votes correctly? I can see this being an issue that would take up considerable time of the ombudsman, whatever system was used. It would clog up the system. We should leave the system as it is and look to see how the matter progresses in future.

Mrs. Laing: I would like to ask the Minister whether he is taking seriously the new vocabulary being used during our discussions on the Bill. We are quite used to the idea of an ombudsman—it is the title given to someone who looks at alleged maladministration. The word comes from German. [HON. MEMBERS: "Swedish."] Members of the Scottish National party say it comes from Swedish. It is from that sort of language.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): European?

Mrs. Laing: European, but not Latin-based—that is the point I am making. It has been brought into our language and accepted.

Is it not taking gender balance too far to start talking about ombudspersons? I do not know the Swedish word for woman, but if one was going to be perfect about it, one would have to have an ombudsfrau rather than an ombudsman. The whole point about an ombudsman is that it is not a man or a woman—it is someone who carries out a certain duty. I suppose that Labour Members would like twinned ombudspersons, so that if there were one ombudsman, there would have to be one ombudsfrau. If they want to use that system in the Parliament, they must want it to be used in all aspects of public life. It is nonsense.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The point about the gender balance is to engender a new politics of consensus, but we all know how bogus that is. Indeed, Mr. Martin, you will remember that, only three weeks ago, when we had the debate on the Foreign Secretary's diary secretary, the worst offenders in terms of the most disgraceful politics were the new Labour women.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Lady must not pursue that matter. I hope that the hon. Gentleman in future will not draw the Chair into his arguments.

Mrs. Laing: I will not pursue that matter.

The serious point is that, once again, we have considerable confusion. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) said that people would be confused about which ombudsman to go to, and about which cases go to which ombudsman. One will not know to whom to complain—the Member of Parliament, the Member of the Scottish Parliament, the Member of the European Parliament or the local government representative.

Moreover, the duties that Members of Parliament currently carry out for all their constituents will be discharged either by themselves, MSPs or someone else. That highlights the fact that Members of Parliament representing Scottish constituencies at Westminster will not have a full job when half their work is done by MSPs.

Mr. McLeish: I shall first comment on the points that the hon. Member for North–East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) raised on how the various bodies will be affected by the advent of the Scottish Parliament. Conservative Front Benchers always want to make life more difficult than it will actually be. We should return to the first principles that we have talked through in our consideration of various clauses. There are reserved bodies and cross-border bodies, and we are now specifically talking about investigations into maladministration in parliamentary activities. It should be obvious that such a wide range of bodies that will be accountable to the Holyrood Parliament will fall into the three categories that I have mentioned.

The important point about commissioners is that the Scottish Parliament will be able to establish a body responsible for examining maladministration. It will be able to develop the roles of the health service and local authority ombudsmen—the specifics will be taken care of in that instance.

9 pm

Hon. Members have asked about the practicalities of the relationships between MSPs and Westminster Members of Parliament. Again, that will inevitably work itself out with experience—that has happened with local councils just as, before local government reorganisation in Scotland, it happened with regional and district councils. I never had any problems sorting out where responsibilities lay and, given the common sense of the participants, I do not foresee problems arising when the new system is established.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): As I know from experience, people bring local government matters to the surgeries of Members of Parliament, partly because they believe, perhaps mistakenly, that Members of Parliament have extra clout to deal with the problem because, ultimately, they can go to the top of the particular tree that is directing administration. When the Scottish Parliament is established, however, Westminster Members of Parliament will have no remit in certain matters—Members of Parliament representing Scottish constituencies will not have the clout to deal with those matters. That will give rise to some confusion.

Mr. McLeish: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point—he has made some good arguments in the debate. Arrangements must be worked out in practice. When the Scottish Parliament is established, there will still be councillors and Members of the Westminster Parliament, as well as constituency MSPs and list system MSPs. I have no doubt that that will work out—there is no reason why it should not. Every time local government has been reorganised, problems have arisen because the participants have had to deal with different problems.

As to clout, many of my constituents mistakenly believe that their Member of Parliament can open doors and wave a magic wand. Sometimes the timing of the Member of Parliament's involvement can seem to do that, but I am sure that it has more to do with due process than with my efforts. I believe, in good faith, that the systems will work and that there will be clarity. Custom and practice will work matters out in each of the Scottish constituencies.

I shall deal with the more narrowly focused amendments. I cannot accept amendments Nos. 410 and 411, although I sympathise with the points that hon. Members made about them. The Bill imposes a duty on the Parliament to make provision for the investigation of certain complaints made to MSPs of maladministration by the Scottish Administration. That parallels the arrangements that apply to complaints made through Members of the House of Commons.

The provision does not preclude the Scottish Parliament from making arrangements for complaints received via other routes to be investigated. That should properly be left to the Scottish Parliament to consider. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie) seems to be saying that the amendments would do that, but I shall explain in a minute that there will be a minimum statutory requirement for the Parliament. I hope that the Parliament will be able to stay with that, or indeed to develop it in the spirit of the amendments.

The Scottish Parliament may indeed think it right that its arrangements for the investigation of complaints of maladministration should enable members of the public to make complaints directly to a Scottish ombudsman, or to whatever office or body the Parliament sets in place. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent that.

On the other hand, the discipline of providing only for the investigation of complaints made to Members has its advantages. That arrangement has worked well here: it ensures that Members of Parliament are aware of their constituents' problems and are regularly informed about the actions of Departments. It also gives us a chance, where appropriate, to resolve the complaints ourselves without the need for a formal investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration.

There is often a frustration in the community that complaints have to be processed through the Member of Parliament. That said, we have heard comments about vexatious or trivial complaints, and the filter often acts as a discipline. There are arguments for and against, but the main point is that the Parliament should be able to deal with a complaint and take it further if it wishes, or stick with the statutory requirement if it does not.

I am sure that hon. Members agree that it is important for any arrangements for the investigation of maladministration by the Scottish Administration to be effective and efficient. The provision in the Bill should go some way towards ensuring that, but the clause lays down only the minimum statutory requirement. I would expect the Scottish Parliament to want to build on that requirement to develop a system appropriate to Scottish circumstances.

Indeed, that system could be better than the one that currently operates at Westminster. In developing its system, the Parliament must have regard, among other matters, to the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, but it is important that the detailed arrangements should be left for the Parliament to consider.

I am afraid that, again, the Government cannot accept amendment No. 411. The clause places a duty on the Parliament to make provision for the investigation of certain complaints of maladministration arising from the action of the Scottish Administration. It does not refer specifically to the investigation of complaints made against other bodies or authorities.

The Bill sets out the Parliament's minimum duty. I am certain that the Parliament will want to consider what other bodies it should make provision for. The United Kingdom ombudsman currently investigates complaints against a range of bodies, including bodies wholly concerned with matters that are to be devolved. The Scottish Parliament will be able to provide for complaints about such bodies in future.

I think it appropriate, however, to allow the Scottish Parliament to make its own arrangements. There is no need for amendment No. 411, as the Bill gives the Parliament the desired flexibility to make arrangements for the investigation of complaints against other bodies. I hope that, with that clarification, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Gorrie: I am obliged to the Minister for his explanation. If the Bill means what he says it means, that is satisfactory from our point of view and we will not press the matter to a vote. My hon. Friends are more concerned to vote on judicial circles than on ombudsman circles. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 86 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 87 to 88 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 89

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF JUDGES

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I beg to move amendment No. 266, in clause 89, page 40, line 35, after '(1)', insert 'Subject to subsection (3)'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 26, in page 40, line 35, leave out 'continue to'.

Amendment No. 27, in page 40, line 36, after 'appointment', insert 'or removal'.

Amendment No. 267, in page 40, leave out from beginning of line 38 to end of line 1 on page 41 and insert—

'(2) Subject to subsection (3) below, the First Minister shall recommend to Her Majesty the appointment of a person as—

(a) a judge of the Court of Session (other than the Lord President or the Lord Justice Clerk); or

(b) a sheriff principal or sheriff.

(3) The Prime Minister shall not make any recommendation to Her Majesty under subsection (1) nor shall the First Minister make any recommendation to Her Majesty under subsection (2), unless the nominee has been recommended to the Prime Minister or First Minister by the Judicial Services Commission for Scotland.

(4) The Judicial Services Commission for Scotland shall be constituted and have the powers and functions set out in Schedule (The Judicial Services Commission for Scotland.)'.

Amendment No. 429, in page 40, line 39, leave out from 'been' to end of line 40 and insert Amendment No. 431, in page 41, line 2, after 'Session', insert 'Sheriff Principal or Sheriff'.

Amendment No. 432, in page 41, line 3, at end insert—

'(4A) The First Minister shall make such a recommendation if, and only if, the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk have undertaken, of their own accord or at the request of the First Minister, an investigation in the fitness for the office of the judge, sheriff principal or sheriff, as the case may be, and have reported in writing to the First Minister, together with a statement of their reasons, that the judge, sheriff principal or sheriff is unfit for office by reason of inability, neglect of duty or misbehaviour.

(4B) When an investigation under subsection (4B) above is into the fitness for the office of either the Lord President of the Court of Session or the Lord Justice Clerk, such investigation shall be carried out by the other and by two additional judges of the Court of Session nominated by the First Minister.

(4C) The First Minister shall make such a recommendation if, and only if, a Resolution approving of the proposed removal of the judge, sheriff principal or sheriff, as the case may be, has been approved by both Houses of Parliament.'.

Amendment No. 32, in page 41, line 4, at end insert—

'(a) he receives a report from the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk that the judge is unfit for office by reason of inability, neglect of duty or misbehaviour, and (b)'.

Amendment No. 33, in page 41, line 7, leave out 'two-thirds' and insert 'three quarters.'.

New schedule 1—'The Judicial Services Commission for Scotland—

—(1)There shall be a Judicial Services Commission for Scotland consisting of—

(i) a lay President;

(ii) three judges, including at least one from an intermediate court, elected by the judges by such method as a Scottish Act of Parliament shall prescribe;

(iii) two persons who have regularly exercised rights of audience in the superior courts for not less than 15 years; and

(iv) five lay members, who are broadly representative of the community;

(2) The Judicial Services Commission may act notwithstanding any vacancy in its membership;

(3) the members of the Judicial Services Commission (other than judicial members) shall be appointed by the First Minister after consultation with the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk;

(4) The lay members shall be selected by the First Minister from a list of names submitted by the Commissioner for Public Appointments;

(5) If either the Lord President or the Lord Justice Clerk expresses dissent from a proposed appointment, the fact of the dissent shall be published if the Prime Minister or First Minister proceeds to make a recommendation to Her Majesty;

(6) The members of the Judicial Services Commission shall be appointed for such terms (being not less than 5 years) as a Scottish Act of Parliament may prescribe;

(7) No person may be appointed for a term which would expire after that person has attained the age of 70 years;

(8) A member of the Judicial Services Commission shall cease to hold office—

(i) upon the expiry of the term of appointment (which, subject to sub-paragraph (7), may be renewed); or

(ii) if the member ceases to have the qualifications necessary for appointment; or

(iii) on receipt by the First Minister of a letter of resignation from the member; or

(iv) in the case of a judicial member, if the member is removed from office; or

(v) in the case of a non-judicial member, if the member is removed from office by the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

(9) The Judicial Services Commission shall, in nominating persons for appointment to judicial office, adopt procedures for the identification of candidates so as to ensure, so far as practicable, that adequate numbers of candidates of both sexes and from diverse racial, religious and social backgrounds are considered for appointment; and

(10) The Commission may do anything which is calculated to facilitate or is conducive or incidental to the discharge of any of its functions.'

Mr. Campbell: It will be clear to hon. Members who have examined this group of amendments that to understand fully the effect of what is proposed, one must read amendment No. 266 together with amendment No. 267 and new schedule 1. As will be obvious, amendment No. 266 is a paving amendment.

Perhaps I should begin by declaring an interest, as I am a member of the Faculty of Advocates from which, by convention, appointments to the Court of Session bench are made. I still practise rather sporadically, but it is right that I should declare an interest.

The amendments and the new schedule are designed to institute a judicial services commission for Scotland to appoint judges. It may be worth having regard for a moment or two to the precise terms of clause 89. Subsection (1) provides for the United Kingdom Prime Minister

"to recommend to Her Majesty the appointment of a person as Lord President of the Court of Session or Lord Justice Clerk."

Those are the two most senior appointments in Scotland. The holders of those appointments occupy the chair of the first division, in the case of the Lord President, and the chair of the second division, in the case of the Lord Justice Clerk, in the Court of Session.

Clause 89(2) provides that

"The Prime Minister shall not recommend to Her Majesty the appointment of any person who has not been nominated by the First Minister for such appointment."

Of course, the First Minister is the First Minister in the Scottish Parliament. Subsection (3) provides:

"It is for the First Minister to recommend to Her Majesty the appointment of a person as . . . a judge of the Court of Session (other than the Lord President or the Lord Justice Clerk) or . . . a sheriff principal or a sheriff."

[Mr. Campbell]

Subsection (4) provides for the removal from office of any judge, whether the Lord President, the Lord Justice Clerk or a judge appointed to the Court of Session, on the recommendation of the First Minister.

Subsection (5) provides that

"The First Minister shall make such a recommendation if (and only if) the Parliament resolves that the judge in question should be removed from office and the number of members voting in favour of the resolution is not less than two-thirds of the total number of seats for members of the Parliament."

As I pointed out, the purpose of the amendments and the new schedule is to provide a judicial services commission for Scotland. I claim consistency, if that be a merit in these matters, as a private Member's Bill that I introduced in February 1992 contained similar provisions. As was inevitable, that Bill made no further progress, but it embodied provisions that were substantially the same as those that I urge the Minister to accept this evening.

Why do I seek to establish a judicial services commission for Scotland through these amendments? It is right that some of the mystique that attaches itself to the appointment of judges should be removed. As matters stand, I understand that the Lord Advocate of the day determines a suitable candidate for appointment to the Court of Session and makes a nomination to the Secretary of State for Scotland, who makes a recommendation to her Majesty, who ultimately makes the appointment. None of that takes place in public and none of it is subject to the scrutiny of the public or anyone other than the Lord Advocate and the Secretary of State for Scotland.

The mystique ought to be removed. There is more than a hint of the white smoke emerging—I think that it is from the Sistine chapel, although I cannot claim any great expertise in such matters—from the chimneys of Parliament house in the High street in Edinburgh, behind St. Giles. Therefore, it is right and proper that those matters should be subject to greater public scrutiny. There should be public accountability, because in accountability and scrutiny lies greater public confidence. The effect would be that all professional Scottish judges would be appointed only after consideration and nomination by the judicial services commission. Only stipendiary magistrates, who are professional judges but sit in the district courts, would be exempt from such consideration.

These provisions do not come before the Committee with only the rather slight benefit of consistency that I have demonstrated in this matter. For the last 10—certainly for the last five—years of the Labour party's time in opposition, they enjoyed substantial support in the Labour party in Scotland. I know that he is now subject to the Trappist vow of silence that accompanies being a Whip, but I have often heard the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) eloquently argue the case that I am making. If the Government seek consistency, they need look no further than him.

The background is that it was believed that the Lord Chancellor was of a mind to make similar provision in England and Wales, but keen students of these matters noted that what was expected to appear to that effect in the manifesto of the Labour party did not ultimately feature in it. There has been some speculation about why, but it is clear that the Lord Chancellor has determined that there should be no such judicial commission for England and Wales. I do not think that that is a good argument for saying that we should not have one for Scotland. We are creating a different sort of Parliament, with a different sort of scrutiny and different roles and responsibilities. It would be correct and consistent with the Parliament's spirit to have a judicial services commission as proposed in the amendments.

9.15 pm

I do not need to say much to amplify the case for such a commission. Its make-up is set out in some detail in new schedule 1, of which paragraph 9 is the only element to which I wish to draw attention. It provides that the commission "shall, in nominating persons for appointment to judicial office, adopt procedures for the identification of candidates so as to ensure, so far as practicable, that adequate numbers of candidates of both sexes and from diverse racial, religious and social backgrounds are considered for appointment".

That is a sensible provision. It does not seek to impose a quota or suggest that people without the requisite qualifications should be promoted to achieve a balance, but it lays on the commission a duty to seek to identify, so far as practicable, people of both sexes and from diverse racial, religious and social backgrounds. The judiciary in Scotland could be strengthened only if that approach were part of the mechanism by which professional judges in Scotland were appointed. I therefore have no hesitation in recommending the scheme contained in amendments Nos. 266 and 277 and new schedule 1 and inviting the Committee to accept it.

Mr. Dalyell: Every constitutional theorist acknowledges that individual freedom is threatened when the balance between the judiciary, the legislature and the Executive is not equal. Clause 89 tips the balance against the judiciary and therefore against a bulwark of the rule of law. Is it the Government's view that clause 89(5) protects the judiciary from parliamentary or Executive interference? I hope for and expect a positive reply.

The reason why the Prime Minister has the power to recommend the appointment of the Lord President of the Court of Session and Lord Justice Clerk under clause 89(1) and not the other judges of the Court of Session requires clarification. Clause 89(3) fails to refer to the chairman of the Scottish land court and honorary sheriffs. Should not those offices be included?

As for removals, the First Minister should be required to give reasons for the removal of a judge and to hold an independent parliamentary inquiry. Should there not be a statutory role in the process for the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk? Clause 89(4) apparently means that the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk can be removed through a truncated procedure. Is that appropriate in the context of judicial independence?

The Judicial Pensions and Retirement Act 1993 provides a compulsory retirement age of 70 for judges of the Court of Session. No statutory provision exists for the removal from office of a judge of the Court of Session, but Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, writing in "The Laws of Scotland", suggests that such a removal would require an Act of Parliament. Sheriffs principal and sheriffs are required to retire at the age of 70 and can be removed from office only by an order from the Secretary of State following a report by the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk.

A number of points arise from my amendments, but I have the impression that the Committee is more interested in hearing the Government's response before the guillotine falls at 9.45 pm. Let me just say that the amendments were born out of a passionate concern that, in the media society in which we live, it is all too easy— [Interruption.] The Whip says that I must finish my speech quickly, so I shall put what I want to say succinctly. In this media society, it is all too easy for the tabloids, or indeed the broadsheets, to whip up hysteria against a supposedly fuddy-duddy judge who, perhaps, is too soft, in the public's estimation, on an unpopular category such as paedophiles. In certain cases, that judge may know a great deal more than the press, but could all too easily be the target of press campaigns for his removal.

Against that background, it is extremely precious to our democracy and whole future that judges who make unpalatable decisions on the basis of knowledge should be given the benefit of the doubt. I, for one, am generally alarmed by the proposal for a two-thirds majority, which could be fairly easily stitched together in rather unpleasant circumstances.

I hope that the Minister will give a positive reply, because this is a desperately important subject.

Mr. Ancram: I, too, should declare an interest, as a member of the Faculty of Advocates, although I have not practised since 1979 and the chances of my doing so again in my current position are—I hope—reasonably remote.

I rise with some diffidence because every time Conservative Members rise to speak, the Minister tells us that we are trying to make things more difficult. I assure him that we are not on this occasion and, indeed, that we do not normally do so.

This is an important matter which arises from the change in the role of the judiciary resulting from this and other legislation. I think we all appreciate that the role of the judiciary will be changed by this Bill and by the Human Rights Bill, which the House is currently considering. The judiciary in Scotland and further afield will be required to take on new roles of a rather more constitutional nature. Their role in adjudicating on devolution issues will make new demands of judges in Scotland and beyond. Their role in determining the legality of Acts of the Scottish Parliament will obviously involve them in certain sensitive areas. In cases arising from the European convention on human rights, they may have to determine matters that raise profound questions of social policy, morality or religion. That obviously increases the scope for conflict between the courts and the Executive; it may introduce the prospect of disagreement at times between the courts and the Scottish Parliament.

I sketch that background not because I envisage such conflict taking place but because it emphasises the need to ensure that the authority and independence of the judiciary are preserved. We are all trying to ensure public confidence in the independence and quality of the judiciary, and the confidence of the judiciary that they can operate independently.

My concern about the way in which clause 89 is drafted is that it leaves the appointment of judges in the hands of a few people who may have a political motivation. I am not saying that they necessarily would, but the very fact that that could be the case may undermine the credibility of, and the confidence that the public might have in the independence of, the judiciary.

I do not seek to follow the path taken by the hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell). I have heard his views before and his idea is interesting, but I consider that it goes too far in trying to achieve the quality and independence that we are all seeking.

However, on judicial appointments, we have tried in our amendments to broaden the consultation that will be required to achieve nominations. We believe that, by broadening it beyond the First Minister and the Lord Advocate to include the Lord President of the Court of Session, the Lord Justice Clerk, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Lord Advocate and the Advocate General for Scotland, we are proposing a broader and more professional basis on which nominations can be made. Essentially, the amendments replicate that basis for the appointment of all judges in Scotland.

We are also worried—I know that the judiciary would be, too—about the procedure for removing judges. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, this is currently a matter of some uncertainty. There is a view that it would take an Act of Parliament to remove a judge. The Bill provides for such a removal to be brought about by a vote of two thirds of the total number of seats for Members of the Parliament. I share some reservations that, on occasions, such a vote could be stitched up.

Therefore, in amendment No. 432, we seek to provide a broader system to operate before a removal can take place. The amendment says:

"The First Minister shall make such a recommendation"— for removal—

"if, and only if, the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk have undertaken, of their own accord or at the request of the First Minister, an investigation in the fitness for the office of the judge, sheriff principal or sheriff, as the case may be, and have reported in writing to the First Minister, together with a statement of their reasons".

That is important, as is the second part of that amendment, which sets out the need for a proper investigation.

These amendments are tabled, in a very constructive spirit, to try to ensure that the judiciary, of which we are rightly proud in Scotland—I say that as a Scottish lawyer—maintain the integrity and the quality that have always been their hallmark. I believe that the amendments would improve the Bill and, although it is not for me to move them at the moment, I hope that the Government will give them due consideration.

Mr. McLeish: I want to participate in the debate in the spirit in which the amendments have been tabled, because I share the concerns of the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) about public confidence in, and the credibility of, the system. I should also like to reflect the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) about balance and the need to ensure that there is no interference of the Executive with the judiciary. That is a very important point and I hope that some of my comments will reflect that concern.

This is not the end of the journey for clause 89. I hope that, after I have finished speaking, the Committee will see that we shall return to this matter on Report. These are very important issues. We want to get these matters right and I give the Committee an assurance that we are listening and are keen to consult to ensure that we get them right when the Parliament is established.

First, I shall speak to amendments Nos. 26, 27, 28 and 31. I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow for raising many points covered by the amendments. I listened carefully to what he said about them. Several most important issues underlie his proposals.

I shall say a word about clause 89(1) as it stands. The role of the Prime Minister in recommending the appointment of the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk is of very long standing. Until now, the role has been non-statutory and we felt it appropriate to use the opportunity that is presented by the Bill to give formal recognition to a practice that Governments of all parties have operated since the beginning of the century.

Amendments Nos. 26, 27, 28 and 31 would give the Prime Minister a new role in recommending the removal of a judge. The Prime Minister has no such role in the context of English judges, and in principle we see no case for such a role to be exercised solely in Scotland.

9.30 pm

In England, a judge may be removed from office on the address of both Houses of Parliament, although, as some hon. Members have said, the position is not crystal clear. The responsibility for recommending the removal of a judge should rest primarily with the First Minister who would have to seek the authority of the Scottish Parliament before making any recommendation to Her Majesty the Queen. Clause 89(5) means that a recommendation by the First Minister for the removal of a judge requires the support of two thirds of the Members of the Scottish Parliament. That is a weighty mechanism for determining whether a judge should be removed, and that is appropriate.

Mr. Dalyell: Could not it be at least three quarters or, given the possibility of a coalition Government, more?

Mr. McLeish: At this stage, we are happy with the two-thirds majority because it is a formidable obstacle, but I shall refer to my hon. Friend's question later.

It is right that the decision should be taken by the Scottish Parliament. I would expect it to take a close and measured interest in such matters, consistent with the responsibility that we propose to place on it. We must provide a mechanism for dismissal, but we are debating a situation that we hope is unlikely to arise.

Amendments Nos. 29 and 30 are unnecessary because section 1(2) of the Scottish Land Court Act 1993 already provides for the appointment of members of the land court, including the chairman, by Her Majesty the Queen on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for Scotland, whose function in that respect will be transferred to Scottish Ministers by clause 49.

I shall now deal with amendment No. 32. It should be borne in mind that we are establishing a set of principles and a hurdle that the First Minister and the Parliament will have to overcome if a judge is to be dismissed. We are not writing the procedures because that will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament. Any statement about the grounds of removal must be carefully crafted in the light of precedent and case law, to strike the appropriate balance between ensuring provision for the removal of judges who are unfit for office—however rare and unlikely that eventuality—and protecting members of the judiciary from removal on anything other than the ground of unfitness.

The Bill safeguards judicial independence by the very fact that a two-thirds majority of Members of the Parliament will be required for a resolution to remove a judge. That will inevitably require a consensus on the reason for removing the judge. In view of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, I am prepared to consider making it clear that the ground on which the First Minister should make his recommendation should be unfitness for office. I should like to consider an amendment that is designed to achieve that and table it on Report.

Mr. Dalyell: I thank my hon. Friend. That seems an excellent solution.

Mr. McLeish: I accept that my hon. Friend appreciates that the Government take this matter seriously. I support the spirit of his amendment, but I ask him not to press it.

Mr. Salmond: May I tempt the Minister to consider the nature of traditional appointments to the Privy Council? Is he aware that only two of the 109 members of its Judicial Commitee are women and that one of them is there because she is the Leader of the House? In the light of questions about traditional appointments, does the Minister think that that is satisfactory?

Mr. McLeish: I should like to respond to the hon. Gentleman, but I fear that if I do I shall stray into another group of amendments.

Amendment No. 33 requires that three quarters of Members of the Parliament would be required to vote in favour of a resolution to remove a judge. The proportion of two thirds that is suggested in the clause is a high threshold, and, in proposing that proportion, the Government recognise the seriousness of removing one of Her Majesty's judges from office. That is why we have not proposed a simple majority in the normal way but require a significant number of Members of the Parliament to be satisfied that the Executive's actions are justified and appropriate. In the circumstances, I invite my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow to agree that the point has been well made in the Government's proposals and that there is therefore no need for him to press his amendment.

Amendments Nos. 266 and 267 and new schedule 1 would represent a fundamental change in our traditional arrangements. At this stage, we do not consider it appropriate to impose a scheme of this sort on the Scottish Parliament. The arguments in favour of some form of judicial appointments board have been advanced from time to time, but we do not believe that such ideas have yet been sufficiently discussed or that the Scotland Bill is the right vehicle to implement any such changes.

I agree that it should be open to the Scottish Parliament to establish some form of Committee on judicial appointments, which could put forward names to the First Minister, but, again, I come back to the point that we should not seek to impose such a procedure by means of this Bill.

I have made my comments in the spirit of understanding the hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) suggested, but, in view of the points that I made about consultation and discussion, about this Bill not being the most appropriate vehicle, about the Scottish Parliament being able to consider the matter and about nothing being ruled out, I hope that he will not press the amendment.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: If the Minister is considering unfitness for office, I hope that he will take account of a recent case in another place, where the unfitness for office of a Scottish judge who had been removed from office arose in fairly sharp focus. There were questions about precisely what meaning should be ascribed to the words. I hope that the Minister will take note of their lordships' decision.

From what the Minister has said, I feel that he is more open minded about my proposals than his original outright opposition would suggest. I have only one question—is it his view that a Committee of the sort to which he referred would be within the general competence of the Scottish Parliament, or would it require statutory provision? If the hon. Gentleman is able to give me a satisfactory answer to that, I may not feel compelled to press my amendment.

Mr. McLeish: I am willing to give the assurance that the matter will be within the general competence of the Scottish Parliament. I take the hon. and learned Gentleman's point about unfitness within the context of the discussions we have had. We will be looking closely at the considerations that surround the unfitness issue. We want to get it right and there will be further consideration of the matter.

I come finally to the amendments tabled by the right hon. Member for Devizes and his colleagues and will begin with amendments Nos. 429 and 430. Although there may very well be arguments for non-statutory consultation of the nature suggested, I do not feel that writing into the Bill such a complex series of exchanges will improve the quality of the final decisions. However, I am prepared to consider further whether there should be any additional provision for consultation by the First Minister before he makes recommendations for appointments. If any amendments are required, the Government will table them in time for Report.

On amendment No. 431, there are already powers for removing a sheriff or sheriff principal in section 12 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1971. Under the general provisions of the Bill, those powers will pass to Scottish Ministers and the Scottish Parliament. I have no doubt that they will be exercised with appropriate care and I see no need to include anything in the Bill that would make any specific additional provision.

I have dealt with the principles underlying amendment No. 432 in my response to the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow. In short, I do not consider that the Bill needs to set out the detailed procedures that may relate to the removal of a Court of Session judge. Neither could I accept any suggestion that Westminster should be involved in this process. It should be a matter for the Scottish Administration and it is not something which should be second guessed by Westminster. The amendment would be a quite inappropriate provision and it should be rejected. I have made it clear that I am prepared to consider an amendment that specifies the grounds on which any recommendation for removal of a Court of Session judge should be made.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Government draft an amendment along those lines?

Mr. McLeish: I have assured right hon. and hon. Members that we will want to revisit on Report the points that have been raised in this debate. I have more than entered into the spirit of the occasion—there is substance in my response to some excellent and considered comments by hon. Members. I therefore hope that amendment No. 266 will be withdrawn in the sure knowledge that we will revisit the issue. That should go some way to satisfy the concerns that have been expressed.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: In light of the Minister's comments about returning on Report to the removal issue, and on the Parliament's competence being adequate to allow it to create a committee to give advice on judicial appointments, I do not think that it would appropriate to press the amendment to a Division. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 89 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 90 and 91 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 6

Devolution issues

Dr. Fox: I beg to move amendment No. 438, in schedule 6, page 79, line 20, leave out from 'Committee' to end of line 21.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 443, in page 81, line 26, leave out 'require' and insert 'request'.

No. 444, in page 81, line 28, at end insert—

'(33A) Where a court or tribunal refers a devolution issue for determination in terms of paragraph 33 above, the person making the request for such a reference shall pay all legal expenses of any parties that subsequently take part in any proceedings before the Judicial Committee for the determination of the judicial issue referred.'.

No. 445, in page 81, line 45, at end insert—

'(6) The person making a reference in terms of paragraph 34 shall pay all legal expenses of any parties that subsequently take part in any proceedings before the Judicial Committee for the determination of the devolution issue referred.'.

Dr. Fox: This debate will, of necessity, be a short one. We feel that schedule 6 is generally well drafted, although I should like briefly to deal with three matters. First, amendment No. 438 would dispense with any requirement for leave. We think that there is no reason why the final determination of devolution issues by Scottish courts should not be appealed against without leave to the Privy Council or the House of Lords. We are very keen to hear the Government's justification for that provision.

[Dr. Fox]

Secondly, we have tabled amendment No. 443 in an attempt to preserve judicial discretion—which the Government are normally extremely keen on. We should be very interested to know why the Government will not accept the simple change that we have proposed in our rather short amendment.

Finally, we have tabled amendments Nos. 444 and 445 in an attempt to recover the costs of those who become involved in expensive hearings on devolution issues through no fault of their own. Surely it is right that the financial burden should be placed on the budgets of those who do the referring. We think that the amendments would be a very logical, fair and simple tidying up of the Bill, placing the financial burden on those who seek to use the Bill's powers.

I hope that the Minister will see fit to accept our amendments.

Mr. Salmond: As the issue is the role of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it is appropriate that we should spend a moment or two examining the nature of the current Judicial Committee. The Committee has 109 members: 63 from England, nine from Scotland, five from Northern Ireland, 14 from New Zealand, one from Australia, one from Barbados, one from the Cayman Islands, one from Jamaica and one from the West Indies. The average age of Committee members is 67, and only two of the Committee's 109 members are female. Of the politicians on the Committee, 11 are former Tory Ministers—led by the venerable Lord Hailsham, and four are current or former Labour Ministers. To my knowledge, there are no former Liberal Democrat or Scottish National party representatives on the Committee. We have difficulty in getting people appointed to such bodies, or so I have heard.

I believe that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was an improvement on the House of Lords in arbitrating in disputes between the two Parliaments, but the complexion and nature of the Committee leave a great deal to be desired. Although only a panel of the Judicial Committee will be selected to serve in each arbitration, one could scarcely say that the Committee is politically representative of the population—it is certainly not representative in terms of gender.

Mr. Wallace: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when a panel is selected, it should at least include some people with judicial experience in Scotland?

Mr. Salmond: Yes. The hon. and learned Gentleman has helped me, in that I was about to come to an alternative, which I hope we can discuss on Report. That alternative is a constitutional court of judicial appointments between the two Parliaments, such as exists between the Länder and the federal Government in Germany.

I know that in the minute that remains to him, the Minister will be more than happy to respond in the co-operative nature of the Committee to the points that I have made.

Mr. Dalyell: What research have the Government carried out on the projected increases in work for the courts and the Judicial Committee as a result of the Bill? What resources are to be made available to the Judicial Committee for devolution issues?

Mr. McLeish: I cannot do justice to the concerns expressed. The kindest thing I can do is to write to the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), but we are rejecting the amendments. I shall also correspond with the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) about the composition of the Judicial Committee, numbers on the panel and the—

Schedule 6 agreed to.

Clauses 92 and 93 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 94

THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: The Law Society has a query. It is of the view that the number of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary and holders of high judicial office under the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876 should be increased to ensure that the court is adequately served. What is the Government's reply to the Law Society?

Mr. McLeish: Of course, the court will be adequately served. I link this matter to the point that I should have made earlier about proper funding and resources being available. That will be the case.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 94 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 95 to 98 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 99

REGULATION OF TWEED AND ESK FISHERIES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Godman: Mention is made in clause 99(2) of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. May I plead that the Act be revised in the interests of ordinary anglers? At the moment, it favours the interests of riparian owners and very rich fishermen and women. Ordinary anglers from clubs across the country deserve better recognition, and the Act should be changed.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): As the Committee might not reach a later group of amendments that relates to clause 99, it is important to put it on the record at this stage that the clause reflects my many discussions with Lord Sewel and my earlier discussions with the late John Smith about how legislation affecting the River Tweed and its tributaries, especially the Till, could be amended. Those rivers are governed by Scottish law—Scottish law hitherto made by the Westminster Parliament—although they are in England. It would obviously not be right for criminal offences to be created or modified by the Parliament in Scotland without the consent of Westminster Members representing the areas affected. The same could apply on the other side of the country.

The Government have chosen a course of action that is broadly a reasonable one, which is to require that an affirmative order must go through the House of Commons to effect such a change. The intervention of the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Mr. Godman) reminds us of the passions that are raised by these issues; they certainly are in my constituency.

An affirmative order might be extremely complex and raise some controversial issues, and it is important that it is widely discussed before a decision is made. Unless we are to have an amendment procedure that a later amendment suggests should be available, it would be a take-it-or-leave-it debate on an affirmative order on a complex piece of legislation affecting people's livelihoods. That is a worrying aspect of what is otherwise a sensible response by the Government.

Mr. Godman: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that fishing on the Tweed and the Tay would be helped enormously by the abolition of drift-net fishing that uses monofilament nets?

Mr. Beith: No. All the scientific evidence is contrary to that view. Again, that is an illustration of the complexity of this matter and the passions that it arouses.

I hope that the Minister recognises that slapping an order in front of either the Scottish Parliament or this Parliament would not be an adequate response.

Mr. Salmond: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that much of this aspect of fishing policy has been led, in terms of initiative, by another place, which has had more than a vested interest in many areas of policy?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman further illustrates how many interests are involved in this issue. It will be possible under the procedures that are outlined for the Parliament in Scotland to take the initiative and bring forward new legislation, but it could not proceed without the consent of the House of Commons. My preference is for the House of Commons to be able to proceed by way of amendable order, as an improvement even on what the Government are proposing. I am grateful for the trouble that they have taken on this important matter.

Mr. Connarty: Will my hon. Friend the Minister say specifically whether the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975 could be debated, discussed and amended in the Scottish Parliament, or would that have to be done in the House of Commons?

Mr. McLeish: It is indeed a wide and diverse Bill. The 1975 Act can be amended within the competence of the Scottish Parliament. Important issues have been raised and I can understand the passion that they can arouse.

The clause provides for the making of an Order in Council for regulating fishing for salmon, trout, eels and freshwater fish in the two cross-border rivers, the Tweed and the Esk, thus enabling continuation of fisheries management of the whole rivers following the devolution of fisheries matters to Scotland. The Order in Council would be an affirmative instrument in both the Westminster and Scottish Parliaments.

I take on board the issue of consultation. If the Scottish Parliament or the Westminster Parliament is moving on an issue, there should be maximum consultation with all concerned. I cannot give an assurance of what the Scottish Parliament will do, but I sincerely hope that consultation will be taken on board.

The clause provides a means to ensure continuation of a coherent legislative framework for the two border rivers. This is considered necessary to ensure effective fisheries management for the river systems, including their tributaries, and also to take on board access difficulties.

Mr. Grieve: I think that I understand correctly that any attempt at unilateral amendment by one Parliament, whether at Edinburgh or London, would be unsuccessful because it would be outside the scope of the legislation that we are passing.

Mr. McLeish: We are making it clear that the spirit and substance of what is proposed lies with orders in both Parliaments. That requires some consultation with those affected. It is important, in a sensitive part of the United Kingdom, that that be the case.

Mr. Godman: As a member of a fisherman's family, I would not want to see one drift-net fisherman lose his livelihood without substantial compensation. That has always been my view, in the House of Commons and before I became a Member.

Mr. McLeish: My hon. Friend will appreciate that I do not want to become involved in the question of compensation. Suffice it to say I understand the comments that have been made. We are trying to provide a framework for a logical and coherent debate about the future of issues affecting both the Tweed and the Esk. I think that that is the best way forward. I commend the clause to the Committee.

Clause 99 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 100

SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION: GENERAL

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: It is deeply unsatisfactory, although no one's fault, that, with six minutes to go, we are racing through such tricky minefields as clause 100, which deals with:

"section 98—treatment of individuals as Scottish taxpayers for social security . . . purposes".

[Mr. Dalyell]

The question of who is or is not a Scottish taxpayer is a difficult subject, and it is unsatisfactory that we should have to hurtle through all sorts of clauses in a quarter of an hour—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Clause 100 does not relate to the matters that the hon. Gentleman is raising. It deals with the exercise of powers to make subordinate legislation under the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: I am referring to the notes that we have been given on subsection (5) of clause 100. These are the Government's own notes and I am giving as an example—

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means: Order. They may be the Government's own notes, but I am looking at the Bill before me. The hon. Gentleman mentioned social security, but the clause has nothing to do with social security—perhaps the Government's notes are mistaken. I rule that, according to the information I have, it has nothing to clause 100.

Mr. Dalyell: If you refer to the volume entitled, "Scotland Bill: notes on all clauses and schedules (except schedule 5)", Mr. Martin, you will see that under the heading "Details of Provisions", in relation to clause 100(5) it states:

"section 98—treatment of individuals as Scottish taxpayers for social security etc. purposes".

I am simply saying that that subject is a minefield and, in normal circumstances, if this was a normal Committee stage, we would be asking some questions about that, because it is a mighty important subject.

The First Deputy Chairman: I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. McLeish: Clause 98 does in fact deal with social security and the matter of social security and the taxation base, but I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that it is a matter-of-fact approach to the tax-varying issues we have discussed. There is a link to social security for assessment, but it is very straightforward. Again, I am willing to write to my hon. Friend to make the implications clear.

Clause 100 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 101

SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION: PROCEDURE

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 39, in page 44, line 23, after '29', insert '33,'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 38, in page 45, line 10, leave out '33'.

No. 465, in page 44, line 29, at end add—

'(3A) Either House of Parliament or the Parliament shall have the power to amend a statutory instrument containing subordinate legislation under section 99, but no instrument shall be made as so amended without the consent of both Houses and of the Parliament.'.

Mr. Beith: The purpose of amendments Nos. 39 and 38 is to move orders made under clause 33 from negative procedure to affirmative procedure. To stop a Bill going forward for Royal Assent, which is what clause 101 is about, is a serious matter and because it involves the Secretary of State forming a view or belief, he ought to be obliged to come before the House to explain his grounds and seek positive approval for that belief.

Amendment No. 465 would give effect to the wish I expressed earlier that both Houses of Parliament and the Scottish Parliament should have the opportunity to propose amendments to legislation on complicated fisheries matters. There is ample precedent for that: for example, the census legislation allows such amendments to be moved, and I have moved such an amendment to that legislation. In reviewing the matter, we ought to consider allowing some more flexible procedure, given the complexity of the matters and the amount of technical dispute which they invite.

Mr. Heald: I hope that I may make a speech yet, despite the circumstances. Clause 33 has been described as the governor-general clause, because it allows the Secretary of State to strike down laws that have been passed by the Scottish Parliament. In my view, it is doubtful whether primary legislation should be struck down by secondary legislation—it is an odd concept and it is not fundamentally democratic. However, one thing is sure: if he is going to do that, the Secretary of State should come to this House to explain why, and not try to put it through via the back door. It is interesting to note that, under the negative resolution procedure in this House, only three out of 738 instruments have been discussed in the past year.

Mr. McLeish: I am certainly impressed by the hon. Gentleman's last comment. Amendments Nos. 38 and 39 would require orders under clause 33 to be subject to affirmative resolution procedure in both Houses of the Westminster Parliament. As the Bill is worded, such orders would be subject to negative resolution procedure in both Houses.

Orders under clause 33 are likely to be short-lived. In the limited circumstances provided for in that clause, they would prevent a Bill from being submitted for Royal Assent and give the Scottish Parliament an opportunity to reconsider the Bill. If the Parliament does that and amends the offending provision, the order can be revoked and the Bill can proceed for Royal Assent.

The Government have taken the view that there is no need to insist that such orders should require the approval of Parliament every time. Parliament will always have the opportunity to annul an order after it has been made.

The orders under clause 33 would need to be made quickly, within the four-week period. That would also be necessary to avoid uncertainty. It would be difficult for an affirmative instrument to be drafted, laid, debated by both Houses of Parliament and made, all within the four weeks allowed—even assuming that Parliament is sitting. That is why the negative procedure was chosen. I ask the Committee to reject the amendments.

Mr. Beith: The Minister has not really answered my query—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman.

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [23 February], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

No. 330, in page 44, line 29, after '29' insert ', 59'.

No. 232, in page 44, line 39, leave out paragraph (c).

PETITION

Human Rights Bill

10.2 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I have the honour of presenting a petition from the members of the General Synod of the Church of England. The Human Rights Bill requires that Churches and other religious bodies be treated as public authorities when they perform public functions, such as the conducting of marriages and the running of Church schools. As the petition makes clear, because public authorities can be sued under the legislation for breaching the European convention, Churches and other religious bodies will be open to be sued in the secular courts on theological and moral issues.

The petition argues that religious bodies should be free to arrange their internal affairs and organise their Church schools and religious charities in accordance with existing arrangements. It also argues that the House should retain the amendments passed in another place, which would help to prevent religious bodies from being successfully sued in the secular courts.

The petition has been signed by 141 members of the General Synod, which is a quarter of the total membership. It includes the signatures of Philip Gore—a prominent lay member—and the Bishops of Manchester, Hull and Rochester. I am also authorised by the office of the Archbishop of Canterbury to say that he is concerned to ensure that the legislation cannot be used to require the Church to act in ways contrary to its religious principles and beliefs. There is also a great deal of concern about the issue among ordinary Church members. Their fear is that British courts could develop the law in a way that may restrict religious liberties.

The petition ends:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will support the Human Rights Bill as amended in the House of Lords thus allowing a proper defence for religious bodies who could be pursued in the secular courts over what are essentially theological and moral issues.

To lie upon the Table.

Synthetic Factor VIII (Tayside)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

10.4 pm

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth): I should say at the outset that I am aware that circumstances have changed since I applied for this debate last week. With the latitude of the House, and of necessity, the debate will have to range a little beyond what was originally intended.

I am also aware that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) is medically qualified. I must concern myself with the fact that I shall spend the next 10 minutes or so talking about matters about which I rather suspect he knows infinitely more—at least in a medical sense—than I. With the agreement of the Under-Secretary, three other hon. Members hope to intervene briefly because they have particular constituency interests. I shall try to keep my remarks to a minimum in order to allow time for those speeches.

Haemophilia is a genetically inherited condition where the blood does not clot due to lack of clotting factor. It is treated by intravenous infusions of clotting agents. Hon. Members may be aware of factor VIII—that fraction of blood which enables blood clotting and forms an essential part of treatment to enable people with haemophilia to live as normal a life as possible.

Clotting factor proteins have traditionally been produced by pooling plasma from between 20,000 and 60,000 blood donations and separating the required factor. However, if any of the donations are infected with a blood-borne virus or prion, the entire pool could be affected and the virus passed on to the people receiving treatment. That has occurred in the not too distant past.

Approximately 1,200 people with haemophilia were infected with the human immunodeficiency virus—HIV—through NHS treatment, and, to date, approximately 700 people have died. In addition, 4,800 people with haemophilia were infected with the hepatitis C virus—HCV—through their NHS treatment. Those infections are believed to have taken place before 1986, when procedures were introduced to kill the viruses.

The HIV epidemic brought into sharp focus the vulnerability of the blood supply to infectious agents. That vulnerability was not only highlighted by HIV transmission through blood transfusion: it greatly accentuated the need for safer plasma derivatives. The HIV epidemic also witnessed the identification of the hepatitis C virus as a major agent responsible for non-A non-B hepatitis—a virus which has infected a very high percentage of people with haemophilia, and is associated with significant mortality and morbidity.

Those dangers prompted the use of a genetically engineered recombinant alternative to human plasma-derived factor VIII. Until now, certainly in Scotland, such treatment has been restricted to certain groups of patients such as children, previously untreated patients and those not already infected by serious blood-borne virus infections. I say "until now", but, in fact, as of Friday or Saturday, Tayside health board is providing synthetic factor VIII to adults.

The United Kingdom haemophilia centre directors' guidelines on treating haemophilia state that recombinant factor VIII is the treatment of choice for all patients with haemophilia A. Furthermore, concerns about the continued use of human plasma-derived products intensified due to the potential transmission of new-variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease through pooled, plasma-derived blood products.

That has been of great concern to patients still receiving human-derived factor VIII, many of whom have already endured similar periods of anxiety in the 1980s, when HIV and viral hepatitis emerged as major health threats for haemophilia patients being treated with human factor concentrates. In short, the arrival of CJD as a threat removed any justification there may have been for denying recombinant factor VIII to any person with haemophilia.

I sought the debate following an approach from a constituent of mine who, with constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) and the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), took the courageous stand of refusing treatment unless and until the synthetic form of factor VIII was made available. That action speaks volumes for the strength of feeling among people with haemophilia.

On Friday, the Department of Health and the Scottish Office announced that certain blood products, including factor VIII, were to be banned, and I know that Tayside health board has now instructed consultants to make arrangements to offer recombinant factor VIII to all patients in Tayside, with immediate effect. I welcome that development, but my regret is that it was so long in coming that my constituent and others were forced to contemplate such drastic, life-threatening action.

As a small footnote, I add the fact that today I heard from a representative of the West of Scotland Haemophiliacs Society, who was informed of a mother in the Western Isles whose 11-year-old son was today refused recombinant factor VIII at Yorkhill hospital, which is within the remit of the Greater Glasgow health board. I therefore suspect that the position is not yet totally resolved throughout Scotland.

The Government's announcement does not end concerns about the availability of recombinant factor VIII. There remain many questions that need to be answered and many issues that need to be addressed. The press statement issued by the Scottish Office on Friday said that the Scottish National Blood Transfusion Service should be allowed to import plasma from non-United Kingdom sources to manufacture blood products.

Over the past few years, people with haemophilia have been forced to endure an inordinate amount of worry and suffering. Many, understandably, do not see why they should continue to risk their health by taking human plasma-derived factor VIII—wherever in the world that plasma has come from—when there is a risk-free synthetically produced alternative available.

The substantial cost of providing recombinant factor VIII therapy will inevitably result in a reduction in other services and initiatives for my constituents unless central funding for recombinant factor VIII is made available to assist health boards. Plasma-derived factor VIII concentrate production in Scotland is currently centrally resourced. If those products are now to be phased out, there must be scope for additional funding for the purchase of recombinant products.

It is undeniable that recombinant factor VIII is more expensive to produce than that produced from human plasma, but I feel that that financial cost must be weighed in the balance against the real concerns of people with haemophilia.

The abolition or reduction of VAT on the product, or some other way around the problem with recombinant factor VIII, which is classified as a drug rather than a blood product, would be a major step towards easing the financial burden on health boards and on the Scottish Office. Today's papers carried reports that scientists at the Roslin institute have been successful in producing factor IX with low production costs—an indication, perhaps, that cheaper sources of synthetic factor VIII may not be far away.

Scotland has an enviable tradition of an integrated national approach to haemophilia care, with the aim of ensuring that all Scottish patients receive the same standard of care irrespective of where they live or which hospital they attend. Without Scottish Office support for continuing a consistent national approach, it is possible that recombinant factor VIII concentrate therapy for haemophilia may be funded by some health boards and not by others.

Patients and practitioners throughout the United Kingdom undoubtedly welcomed the announcement on Friday afternoon, but now they deserve speedy answers to three questions. How soon will recombinant factor VIII be made available to all with haemophilia? What funding mechanisms will be put in place so that health boards are not adversely affected? Is there any way in which recombinant factor VIII can be exempted from VAT, or VAT can be reduced, to lower the total cost?

10.13 pm

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) on securing this debate, and thank her for the opportunity to make some brief remarks.

I was contacted over the past few weeks by John McAughey, a constituent from the village of Stanley in Perthshire. I would like to read an extract from a letter he sent to the haemophilia centre director at Dundee's Ninewells hospital:

"I am writing to inform you of my decision to refuse treatment of my Factor VIII deficiency with Liberate Factor VIII concentrate, or any other plasma derived product. I have deliberated long and hard before reaching this decision but I feel I have no other choice. I am no longer prepared to take risks with my life and I am tired of playing Russian roulette every time I treat a bleeding episode because the purity of derived products cannot be guaranteed."

That illustrates the deep anxiety of many individuals about the safety of the products they are using to treat a serious medical condition. I saw Mr. McAughey and his wife yesterday, and they were relieved to receive the news from the Dundee NHS trust that the recombinant factor VIII treatment was to be made available and funded by the trust.

That is welcome news, but they left with me a strong sense that their concern was not just for themselves, but for others suffering from haemophilia in other parts of Scotland and the United Kingdom who may not receive or have access to the same treatment under the current regulations and arrangements. Tonight is a welcome opportunity for the Minister to place some of the Government's views on the matter on the record, to clear up the anxiety that is clearly felt by some of our constituents, and clarify where the Government believe policy is going.

10.15 pm

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) on securing this debate, and I thank her for allowing me the opportunity to make a brief intervention.

I confirm her account of events. My constituent was also one of those refusing treatment because he had been denied access to recombinant factor VIII. He contacted me about 10 days ago, and I immediately contacted Tayside health board. I was promised a written brief to update me on the situation. That had not arrived by the time I left for Westminster on Monday, but I was relieved—as was my constituent—that the money was found to make available the synthetic factor VIII for the treatment, as he had requested.

It is clear that, until Friday, that treatment was not available to adults in particular areas of Scotland—while in other areas it was available. There was an inconsistency in policy across Scotland in this respect.

It is also clear that Tayside health board was not making the treatment available to adults on the ground of cost. If we have a national health service—as the Government always claim—everyone living under that national health service should have equal access to treatment. That is something which the Government must clarify, and I hope that the Minister takes this opportunity to put at rest the minds of our constituents and to set out clearly the Government's policies.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): I thank the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) for allowing me to intervene. My constituency is 650 miles south of Perth, but I have a similar problem with a constituent. I am grateful to her for allowing me one minute to raise the issue.

I congratulate the Minister and the Government on insisting that treatment be made available to all children under 16. I regret that I did not know that until this morning, because the press release was the first news we had. It would have been nice if that could have been announced in the House, rather than through the newspapers. Children under 16 will now be entitled to recombinant factor VIII—something for which I have campaigned for a long time. I have constituents with a seven-year-old child, Michael Ashley, who suffers from haemophilia. His parents will be delighted, as I am, by the announcement.

Could the Minister inform the House of the time scale that the South and West Devon health authority will be adopting in providing my constituent with recombinant factor VIII? Will he also confirm that extra funds will be made available for this treatment, so that other treatments are not prejudiced?

In his press release, the Secretary of State for Health said:

"I have decided that all health authorities must make arrangements to ensure that the synthetic version of Factor VIII, known as recombinant, is made available to those children under the age of 16 who are not already receiving it, and to new patients."

[Mr. Anthony Steen]

I am much encouraged by that, and I hope that the Minister can reassure me that, although I am 650 miles south of Perth, the advantages that are available to people in Scotland will be also be available to people in Devon. Once again, I thank the hon. Member for Perth for her generosity in giving me this opportunity to speak.

10.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Sam Galbraith): I, too, thank the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) for bringing this important issue to the attention of the House. I recognise that it is not only a matter of great concern to the haemophiliac community in Tayside but part of a wider concern throughout Scotland.

We want to ensure that the safest possible treatment can be given to this vulnerable group of patients. I thought that the hon. Lady gave a splendid dissertation on the causes of haemophilia and its treatment—I give her nine out of 10 for it. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) and the hon. Members for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) and for Totnes (Mr. Steen) for their contributions.

Ministers in this and the previous Administrations have considered this matter extensively since recombinant factor VIII became available as a licensed product in 1993. Of course, I appreciate that interest in the provision of this drug—a product which is not derived from human plasma—has been heightened since last week's expert advice to the Government about the theoretical possibility of transmission of new variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease via blood products. I should add that nothing was banned other than the use of albumen as a stabiliser in products. We are awaiting the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines on individual products.

Scotland has a good story to tell on the provision of recombinant factor VIII, but, before I come to that, I want—in case any doubts were raised by last week's announcement about blood products and new variant CJD—to reaffirm the Government's commitment to Scotland's blood transfusion service and the excellent job it does in supplying Scotland with safe, high-quality blood and blood products.

The Scottish National Blood Transfusion Service has served Scotland for more than 50 years and continues to be at the forefront of excellence in health care delivery and new technology in its efforts to deliver a first-class service to Scotland's patients. I know that the blood transfusion service is fully committed not only to developing its service but to ensuring that it continues to enjoy the excellent record it has earned for the safety and high quality of its blood and blood products.

The service's record in this area is world class. A review has shown that, over the past five years in Scotland, no infection of HIV or hepatitis B or C has been detected as a result of a patient being transfused with blood or receiving a blood product. That is a truly impressive record, given that 1.25 million blood donations were collected, processed, tested and delivered to hospitals during that period.

Until recently, the factor VIII blood-clotting factor could be obtained only as a plasma-derived blood product and for many years has been one of the blood transfusion service's staple products, manufactured at its blood products plant, the protein fractionation centre. As the hon. Lady said, factor VIII is a concentrated blood product, which is made from the pooled donations of many thousands of donors. The heightened risk of one infected donor spreading disease in such a way is, as she said, obvious.

Again, I congratulate the blood transfusion service on the wonderful work that its staff have done over the years to refine and improve the safety of its plasma-derived factor VIII product—a fact which is too easily overshadowed by the terrible tragedy of infections such as hepatitis B and C and AIDS. The record of the current product that the service produces speaks for itself. There have been no reports of HIV infection since 1984, and no reports of hepatitis B or C since the current product was introduced in 1992. In considering these matters, we should not lose sight of that outstanding record.

Despite that excellent record, there is no denying that, with the recent appearance of recombinant factor VIII as a commercially produced drug, we have a product which may reassure many haemophiliacs and which many haemophilia clinicians have identified as their preferred treatment. I also know that the current theoretical risk of new variant CJD transmission in blood products has fuelled their wish to switch to the recombinant product as swiftly as possible.

Scotland has not been deaf to those concerns. In 1996, the Government recognised that provision needed to be made for the national health service in Scotland to begin the transition to purchasing recombinant factor VIII for its haemophilia A patients. In response to requests from the haemophiliac community and its clinicians, funding of £1.1 million was provided to all health boards in Scotland, including Tayside, to enable them to begin the process and to provide the recombinant product for the most vulnerable groups in the haemophiliac community, such as children. That has been happening for some years.

Having helped to kick-start the process, the Government have asked health boards to pursue the matter as part of their pursuance of health care strategies throughout Scotland. All funds for the treatment, as for others, have been devolved, and I know that the boards have been considering long and hard the priority that it should be given against the other competing demands on their budgets.

That is what the boards are there to do, and it is not for me to take decisions for them, but I want to tell them that they should do what is right by patients, for the enhancement of patient care. I am glad to say that, in my experience so far, they have had that overriding need in the forefront of their minds.

The Government were very encouraged last year when the health boards decided to establish a national consortium to advance the process on an integrated, equitable and fair basis throughout the country, with the consortium co-ordinating the provision of factor VIII in Scotland and helping boards to keep in step in their approach to the issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East and the hon. Member for Perth mentioned that, as well.

The consortium includes a number of health boards and representatives of the haemophilia directors—the clinicians who oversee haemophilia treatment in Scotland. Its key role is to advise on the priority that health boards should give to allocating from their funds provision for recombinant factor VIII and, in so doing, achieving an expansion of recombinant provision that maintains an equality of treatment for all patients. That point was raised by all the hon. Members who spoke in this debate.

The consortium has also recognised the concerns raised among haemophiliacs and their clinicians about new variant CJD, as illustrated by the cases presented by hon. Members tonight. I can confirm that it recently recommended to all health boards in Scotland that, in the light of those concerns, the extension of recombinant treatment in Scotland should be accelerated so that all health boards should offer recombinant factor VIII treatment to all their haemophilia A patients within the next year.

Health boards are still considering the matter, but both the consortium and the boards are clear about the importance of the key point: that the process must be pursued on an integrated national basis designed to ensure equity of health care throughout the country for Scottish patients, irrespective of where they live or which hospital they attend.

I can confirm that Tayside health board has already responded to the consortium's recommendations, and has agreed to offer the recombinant product immediately to all its haemophilia A patients still on plasma-derived factor VIII, including, of course, the constituents mentioned by hon. Members tonight.

I hope that that allays hon. Members' concerns, and serves to demonstrate the energetic steps that the NHS in Scotland has taken and continues to take in its efforts to ensure that haemophiliacs in Scotland are given equal access to available treatment.

The hon. Member for Totnes asked about provision in England; that does not fall within my portfolio as a Scottish Office Minister, but I assure him that the matter will be responded to by the Department of Health, and someone will write to him.

The hon. Member for Perth asked me some additional questions, which I hope I have answered in part, about how soon the new treatment would be universally available. All but one of the health boards have agreed to provide it, and we expect the final one to provide it soon; so the answer is, virtually right away.

The hon. Lady asked about central funding. Moneys for such treatments are held by health boards and not central Government. As I said, it is the boards' duty to balance the needs within their areas and to fund those matters appropriately. That goes on all the year round, as new treatments become available, and health boards have been able to do that. She mentioned that money might be saved because the product has not been produced centrally. The costs are all fixed centrally, and the dropping of one plasma product would in no way affect the cost of the provision of the services, so there are limited savings to be made there.

Finally, the hon. Lady asked me a question about value added tax. As she will appreciate, that is not a matter which is within my portfolio, but I will certainly look into it and someone will write to her. I hope that, in answering those questions, I have dealt with all the issues raised.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The President of the Board of Trade was asked—

Commercial Debt

1. Barbara Follett: What assessment she has made of the damage caused to small businesses by the late payment of commercial debt. [31125]

11. Mr. Lock: What representations she has received from small businesses on the damage caused to them by the late payment of commercial debt. [31137]

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): It is clear that late payment continues to be a major concern to small businesses, with a number of surveys showing that British businesses are less profitable and less competitive as a direct result of late payment. In some cases, their very survival is threatened. That is why we have responded to calls from the small business community and announced a new package of measures to tackle late payment. The Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Bill is an integral part of the measures and is supported by the majority of small firms.

Barbara Follett: May I congratulate my hon. Friend on the legislation? Does she agree that small businesses, working in partnership, can help to promote a better payment culture?

Mrs. Roche: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. If we are to improve the payment culture, there needs to be proper partnership between Government and business organisations. That is why we are working jointly with the Forum of Private Business, the Federation of Small Businesses, the Institute of Directors, the Confederation of British Industry, the British Chambers of Commerce, the National Farmers Union and the Union of Independent Companies through the better payment practice group to promote a better payment culture. The group has met regularly and already produced a substantial body of work.

Mr. Lock: May I also congratulate my hon. Friend on the measure, which will be welcomed by industry? I notice that the Bill refers to late payment among small and medium firms. Will she inform the House what percentage of firms will be able immediately to reap the benefit of the measure? Does she agree that the problem of late payment disproportionately affects small and medium enterprises?

Mrs. Roche: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend that the problem disproportionately affects small businesses. That is why, under the phasing arrangements that we propose, small firms will be able to take advantage of the proposals.

We fully support the decision of the Federation of Small Businesses to publish league tables of average payment times of big companies and their large private subsidiaries. The league tables will open to public scrutiny the payment record of Britain's larger companies and provide small suppliers with useful information on how quickly they can expect to be paid when dealing with a large customer. I congratulate the federation on that project and wish it every success.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Lady heed warnings from bodies such as the CBI and the British Chambers of Commerce that statutory interest payments may lead to longer contract payment terms between companies and their suppliers? Consequently, will she amend the legislation?

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to hint that we have listened and consulted widely. Indeed, we are very grateful for the contribution of the British Chambers of Commerce. We have consulted it all along. If the hon. Gentleman has an opportunity to look at the legislation, he will see that it is not possible to opt out of it. We propose to give a reserve power to courts to deem that excessively long payment periods are a de facto opting out. I am sure that he and his Conservative colleagues will appreciate that.

Mr. Cotter: I am sure that the Minister knows that I and my colleagues agree with and very much welcome the Bill. Does she agree that, often, both local and national Government are very bad at paying? I hope that she shares my view that the Government should give a lead in that direction.

Mrs. Roche: I absolutely agree. I was a critic of the previous Government, who had an appalling payment record. The House will recall that the former Deputy Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), boasted of stringing creditors along. When the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan)—who speaks on small firms on behalf of the official Opposition—was an Education Minister, almost a quarter of the Department's bills were paid late. That is why I intend to provide in the summer a league table of Government Departments, and I have taken the opportunity this week to remind local authorities of their obligations as well.

Export Credits Guarantee System

2. Mr. Cohen: What reforms she proposes of the export credits guarantee system. [31126]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The Export Credits Guarantee Department's support is vital in helping exporters of capital goods and projects win valuable business overseas. It seeks continuously to improve the services it offers and does this in partnership with its customers—exporters and banks. I believe this approach works well.

My noble Friend the Minister for Trade announced on 11 February a review of the arrangements for providing finance for capital goods and project exports. A consultation paper has been issued seeking comments over a two-month period. Copies of the document have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cohen: Would my right hon. Friend concede that there is a lot wrong with the export credits guarantee scheme? Is not the £800 million Iraqi debt an example? Is not the contract in Malaysian ringgits—which, because of the devaluation of that currency, has cost the British taxpayer millions of pounds—another? Can she say something about that? Is there not too much emphasis on defence exports, which some of the countries concerned can ill afford, and not enough emphasis on the export of domestic goods? Is it not time for reform?

Mrs. Beckett: With great respect to my hon. Friend, I have to say that, on balance, the ECGD system works well. I understand some of the concerns that he identifies. Obviously, devaluation has an impact to some degree, although payments continue to be made up to date. Some of the ECGD cover in Malaysia is ringgit-related, and so was not affected by the changes that he identifies. On defence exports and defence cover, although there are fluctuations from time to time—depending on the flow of contracts—he will find, on balance, that an average of only 14 per cent. of the cover that the ECGD supplies is for defence.

Mr. Alan Clark: Has the DTI made any estimate of the number of British jobs supported or the amount of foreign currency earned over, say, the period since the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) came into the House, when he has criticised the ECGD?

Mrs. Beckett: Not in so many words. We have not calculated the number of jobs in relation to my hon. Friend's most worthy tenure in this House. I recognise the value of much of the work that the ECGD does, and the right hon. Gentleman may be aware that so successful has it been of late that this year that it has returned more than £400 million to the Treasury.

Mr. Barry Jones: I acknowledge the excellence of the system and of the ministerial leadership, but may I draw to my right hon. Friend's attention the extreme difficulties of a great British exporter—British Steel? The pound is highly valued and it is proving difficult to export against tough competition. Is there any way in which British Steel and like companies may have assistance?

Mrs. Beckett: I know of the strong support that my hon. Friend has shown to British Steel over the years. The Government understand the concerns of exporters at this time. He will know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken steps which we believe will lead to a stable but competitive pound in the longer term. I know that some exporters are effective in certain markets—those whose markets are dollar-controlled, for example, have not been affected in the same way—but that many efficient exporters such as British Steel are doing what they can to expand their markets in other countries.

Mrs. Gillan: Does the President of the Board of Trade agree that at the moment countries such as France, Spain and Italy do not show any great eagerness to dismantle their public sector support for their exporters? Does she also agree that if we implement changes to the ECGD unilaterally, we will be in danger of going out on a limb and handicapping United Kingdom exporters in the world market? Therefore, will she give us an undertaking that following the consultation no changes will be made to the ECGD regime before it can be clearly demonstrated that other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries are making similar changes to their regimes, as a failure to do so could disadvantage UK exporters?

Mrs. Beckett: I understand and share the hon. Lady's concern that we should do nothing that could disadvantage British business, but the whole purpose of the consultation is to hear from British business what it believes will give it a further competitive edge, so it is inconceivable that it is likely to advise us to do something that would damage its concerns and we would certainly not want to take any such steps.

On a note of caution to the hon. Lady, I understand the concern that lies behind her question—she is asking us not to do something unilaterally that would be disadvantageous—but one of the reasons for the review is to find out whether there are steps that the ECGD could take, unilaterally or otherwise, that would give British exporters a competitive edge. I am sure that she would not want us to wait for other people to do that.

Financial Services Industry

3. Mr. Cousins: If she will request the Home Office reviews of the financial services industries of the Isle of Man, Jersey and Guernsey to assess the impact on the UK of legislation on the limited liability of accountants passed by the states of Jersey. [31128]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Nigel Griffiths): The Home Office review will be looking into all aspects of financial regulation in the Crown dependencies, including the registration and regulation of companies and other forms of business.

Mr. Cousins: I congratulate the Government and my hon. Friend on at last tackling abuses such as the so-called "Sark lark", whereby someone can pretend to live on Sark and hide a large number of companies and tax liabilities by doing so. However, the issues are complex. For some purposes, the Channel Islands are inside Britain, but outside the European Union. Will my hon. Friend therefore assure the House that we will not legislate on limited liability for accountants before the House has had an opportunity to discuss and debate all those matters and until we have had an assurance that there will be independent regulation of accountants?

Mr. Griffiths: I very much agree. That is important and the business manifesto gives a commitment to ensure that there is a framework of independent regulation of the accountancy profession. Of course, we are considering all suggestions on the best way forward, including those of hon. Members—of course, that will be independent of the Home Office review.

Mr. Gibb: Did the Home Secretary consult the Minister before the reviews were announced? Would it not have been courteous if the Home Secretary or the President of the Board of Trade had consulted and discussed the matter with the Governors of the territories prior to the announcement of the review?

Mr. Griffiths: The review allows people to give their views on what is happening in their dependencies and domestically here. Of course, the Governors of the dependent territories are entitled to make submissions, as are Members of Parliament and anyone else involved. We will welcome such consultation and views.

Space Exploration

4. Mr. McWilliam: If she will make a statement on the role of the United Kingdom in the development of the space exploration programme. [31129]

The Minister for Science, Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): The United Kingdom has a substantial and highly respected space science community, which is actively involved in defining the priorities for the European Space Agency's exploration programme. British scientists are involved in a wide range of current and future missions, including satellites to study the sun, Mars and Saturn and its moon Titan, as well as observatories trained on other galaxies.

Mr. McWilliam: Will my hon. Friend the Minister join me in congratulating British-born space scientist Michael Foale on his achievements on the United States Mir missions? Does he agree that Mr. Foale is an excellent role model in encouraging young people to study science?

Mr. Battle: Yes. I had the pleasure of meeting Michael Foale when he came back to earth on 18 December. He provides a role model that attracts youngsters to become interested in space research. May I congratulate my hon. Friend, who for some time has chaired the parliamentary all-party space committee and championed those matters in the House? I hope that he will long continue to do so.

Mr. Wilkinson: Can the Minister assure us that the United Kingdom will continue to channel a large proportion of its space effort through the European Space Agency, which has proved an exceedingly cost-effective vehicle for space science and exploitation, rather than through the Commission of the European Union, which is an infinitely more bureaucratic organisation that does not have the scientific or technological expertise for the job?

Mr. Battle: I did not envisage that this question would be so controversial. The United Kingdom has a substantial space programme, on which we spend some £45 million. Of that, some £33 million is spent through the European Space Agency, in which we play an active part. British space scientists are actively involved in the Mars and lunar working groups, and we shall watch with interest when, later today, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration makes its announcement about the possible presence of water on the moon. We are—and shall continue to be—involved in those international programmes.

Utility Regulators

5. Mr. Rooney: If she will make a statement about the objectives of her Department's review of the utility regulators. [31130]

Mrs. Beckett: The objective of the interdepartmental review is to set a long-term, stable framework for utility regulation, which is seen to be fair by all interest groups, particularly consumers. I hope to be able to publish the conclusions of the review on utility regulation in a Green Paper in the near future.

Mr. Rooney: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. She will know that, although fuel poverty is a big issue, it was totally ignored by the previous Administration. In April, gas deregulation comes to Yorkshire, where there have already been far too many episodes of bandit canvassers trying to make people sign up to deals on a totally false basis—they have even signed up people who are dead and made children sign contracts. Will she ensure that the regulator takes action against such people?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. When the system of regulation was set up, the Conservative party claimed that it would favour the consumer, but that was not what the legislation said and it has not often been what has happened in practice. It is important that, as competition is introduced into the domestic gas market, the consumer is protected. My hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs and the director general of the regulatory office are in close contact on this. Action has already been taken to put conditions into the companies' licences to ensure that good practice is followed and that, if it is not, compensation is possible.

Sir Sydney Chapman: Will the right hon. Lady give an assurance that, in the review of the utility regulators, she will do her utmost to strike the right balance between encouraging competition and ensuring that regulation is not unduly suffocating? I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House feel that the Competition Bill—which is about to have its Third Reading in another place—will give the regulators too much arbitrary power.

Mrs. Beckett: I entirely share the hon. Gentleman's view that it is important to strike the right balance between competition and regulation. Our approach has always been to ensure competition where possible and regulation where necessary. It has also always been our view that that regulation should be transparent, consistent and predictable. The hon. Gentleman is concerned lest the Competition Bill in some way unfairly changes that balance. I do not believe that it will, but the issue will be discussed both when the Green Paper is produced and when that Bill comes to the House of Commons.

Mr. Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friend will be aware that Hull's municipally owned telephone service survived nationalisation in 1911. It also survived privatisation in 1984 because, although it may not be popular with the Director General of Oftel, it is cherished by the local population that it serves. In the light of the Oftel report on Kingston Communications, which was published on Monday, will she remind Oftel that its job is to protect the customer, not to promote BT?

Mrs. Beckett: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns and I am well aware of how extremely popular the company is in Hull. Currently, other suppliers can enter that market, with the exception of BT—that is the issue on which the director general has sought consultation. I feel confident that, if the existing system is as popular with the local community as my hon. Friend says, it will survive any review. Although I have taken on board his points, I should remind him that it may ultimately fall to me to take a decision in this matter, so I hope that he will forgive me if I refrain from further comment.

Mr. Boswell: Has the right hon. Lady dropped her ill-considered proposal to impose an extra charge on the bulk of consumers in order to pursue her social objectives for a limited number of low-income consumers?

Mrs. Beckett: I note the pejorative tone. The hon. Gentleman will see what we propose when the Green Paper is published in the near future. If he is saying, on behalf of the Conservative party, that what happens to low-income consumers of crucial utilities is a matter of indifference, that bears out his party's practice in government. I do not think it wise to advertise that.

Corporate Governance

6. Mr. Beard: If she will make a statement on her proposals on corporate governance. [31132]

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade yesterday urged companies and institutions to achieve higher standards of governance as a matter of best practice. The issue is competitiveness. Good governance is central to the well-run company that works for long-term prosperity in partnership with others. We want companies and institutions to show leadership in delivering best practice. I hope that they will respond positively; if they do not, the Government may have to act.

Mr. Beard: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. When considering what should follow, will he bear it in mind that the performance and value of many companies will depend not only on the capital invested in them but—in many cases to the same extent, and in some cases more—on the scientific, technological, design, commercial and managerial abilities of those employed? Such people are the best informed about the nature of the business of many companies. Will my hon. Friend consider, as a move towards a stakeholder economy, that those employees should have the right to representation among the non-executive directors of major British companies?

Mr. McCartney: The position of successful companies and the Government is clear: we want to promote partnership in the workplace. It is certainly true that successful companies must ensure that both executive and non-executive directors have skills and knowledge of the company, of the markets in which it operates, and of research and development and scientific activity. I am sure that successful companies will continue to do that and will expand best practice to ensure that the boardroom reflects the company's needs, in terms of both its internal activities and its activities on behalf of its customers and wider shareholders.

Mr. Chidgey: Does the Minister agree with the Royal Society of Arts, which argues in its document, "Tomorrow's Company", that intellectual property is one of the strongest determining factors in achieving competitive success? If so, is not he concerned about the lack of protection of intellectual property rights? What action are the Government taking to promote those rights in the global marketplace?

Mr. McCartney: That was a nice try to introduce the issue of international competitiveness on this question. The Government make efforts daily, weekly and monthly to ensure that scientists and others in the United Kingdom who want to take new inventions to the marketplace are protected, both nationally and internationally.

Mr. Sheldon: Is my hon. Friend aware that institutional investors such as insurance companies and pension funds have neither the expertise nor the inclination to become closely involved in the companies in which they invest? That being so, should not they be encouraged to become more closely involved in the appointment of non-executive directors, the promotion of the more meaningful role of annual general meetings, and the remuneration of directors?

Mr. McCartney: The issue of amending the Companies Act 1989 to introduce two-tier boards has been raised, but at the moment there is no demand for that. The Hampel committee found overwhelming support for the unitary boards that are the norm in the United Kingdom. A wider review of company legislation is taking place, and I have no doubt that in that review the Government will consider a range of measures and eventually reach some conclusions. The most important fact about the review is that it is the first wide, fundamental review of company law for almost 150 years; at the end of it we will produce a set of modern legislative proposals that will ensure competitiveness into the next century.

Mr. Redwood: I warmly welcome the U-turn by the President of the Board of Trade on corporate governance and I agree with her that changes should be achieved by leadership rather than by a stakeholder law. I trust that her hon. Friends are as happy as I am that she has dumped the Prime Minister's stakeholder proposals. The question is simple: given that the spirit behind the President's proposals is to lead by example, and because it is impossible to be President of the Board of Trade and to have a blind trust, will she—in the Minister's view—wind up her blind trust and tell us who has contributed to it since May?

Mr. McCartney: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman should tell the House whether he had the permission of the Leader of the Opposition before putting that question. There has been no U-turn in the Government's policy on companies. The only thing to be dumped is the Tories, who have been dumped by small, medium and big business. The right hon. Gentleman is a complete joke, nationally and internationally, when it comes to business, and his book is a sign of the shambolic nature of his view of British industry. He owes the House and British business an apology for the comments that he made about President Kohl, a man who leads a country that invests millions of pounds in the British economy, creating tens of thousands of jobs. The right hon. Gentleman owes an apology for his extreme right-wing views to those German companies and the workers who work for them in this country.

Mr. Redwood: The Minister obviously did not read or hear my views, which were not as he described and which have received 205 letters and messages of support. The question remains for the Minister and the President of the Board of Trade: will she wind up her blind trust? The Minister should apologise for the remarks that he has just made, because my interviews were unexceptional and well received.

Mr. McCartney: The right hon. Gentleman obviously does not talk to the Leader of the Opposition, who repudiated his comments and asked the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw them. The right hon. Gentleman is also out of step with the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Redwood: What about the blind trust?

Mr. McCartney: I am just coming to that. In his evidence to the Neill committee, the Leader of the Opposition said of blind trusts:

"We believe there is an argument in favour of a form of blind trust that should be examined by the committee."

The Labour party has told the Neill committee that blind trusts should not exist and, when the position is considered by the committee, I am certain that no Labour Member will continue to have a blind trust. The right hon. Gentleman is, once again, out of step with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Goggins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the payment last year of £3 million by United Utilities to one of its non-executive directors falls well short of a high standard of corporate governance?

Mr. McCartney: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I do not know whether anyone in Britain—other than perhaps the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood)—would defend a pay-out of £3 million to a director of a utility selling water to a captive consumer market while failing to meet customer standards and having some of Europe's poorest leakage records. I would not defend that, and I do not know anyone who would.

Objective 1 Areas

7. Mr. Andrew George: What progress she has made in her discussions with the European Commission towards the designation of objective 1 areas. [31133]

Mrs. Roche: The Commission expects to publish on 18 March its detailed draft regulations covering the operations of the fund for the period 2000-2006. Those draft regulations will then need to be negotiated in the Council of Ministers and approved by the European Parliament. In the meantime, Ministers have been in regular contact with the European Commission and other member states in order to secure a fair deal for the United Kingdom and its regions.

Mr. George: I thank the Minister for that reply. The Minister may not be aware that today is St. Piran's day, but he is the patron saint of Cornwall and of tin. The Minister is aware, as I am all too painfully aware, that tomorrow will be the last trading day for South Crofty tin mine—the last tin mine in Cornwall and in Europe. In view of the agony and suffering that Cornwall faces, does the Minister accept that the designation of objective 1 areas is as much a political exercise as a technical one? What message can the Minister give me to take back to help the Cornish community at this most difficult time?

Mrs. Roche: As the hon. Gentleman knows, because we have been in close contact on this, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton), I am very sad about what has happened to South Crofty. He also knows that the mine did not meet the criteria for regional selective assistance and that we considered the proposal in great detail. However, the Government office for the south west and all local agencies will continue to work closely with local authorities to alleviate the impact of the closure and improve the area's economic position. I note what the hon. Gentleman says about Cornwall. Let me assure him that we are paying close attention to the needs of Cornwall, along with those of the other areas of the United Kingdom. On his proposal, the Government statistical service is still discussing the proposals with Eurostat. It is a technical matter but I will ensure that the House is kept fully informed of progress.

Mr. Brazier: What impact does the Minister think the move towards a single currency by several of our partners will have on Britain's competitiveness? In particular, while Britain has the EU presidency, what steps will we take to ensure that no country in Europe that has not really met the criteria tries to slip into the single currency?

Madam Speaker: Order. Has the hon. Gentleman read the question? I think that Miss McIntosh has a question on the matter.

Miss McIntosh: Does the Minister share the anxiety of people in North Yorkshire about the reduced numbers involved in the reforms to objectives 1, 2 and 3, and about the loss of the Konver programme? As many of them have benefited from it, can the Minister assure the House that the Government will make the strongest representations to retain it and other such Community instruments in some form in the reforms?

Mrs. Roche: I understand well the hon. Lady's points; they are well understood throughout the Government. We are making strenuous representations to the Commission and are active in ensuring that our views are known to member states.

Competitiveness

8. Jacqui Smith: If she will make a statement about the priorities of her Department in promoting competitiveness during the British presidency of the European Union.
[31134]

Mrs. Beckett: Improving competitiveness is central to improving prosperity in both the UK and more widely in the European Union. It lies at the heart of our presidency theme of economic reform. All my EU priorities, particularly the central objective of improving the single market, are ultimately aimed at improving the competitiveness of EU industry. In the coming months, I will work to ensure that competitiveness becomes more central to EU policy making. Specifically, in the Industry Council, which I shall chair, Ministers will, for the first time, have a full discussion about the key factors that affect EU competitiveness, and about how Governments and business can work together to improve it. Next week, I will talk to the European Parliament on that very subject.

Jacqui Smith: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is by working with our European partners that we can best pursue our British interests? Did not the previous Government's half-hearted approach to all things European, and the remarks of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) about Chancellor Kohl, greatly damage the interests of British business, consumers and workers?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is correct. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has displayed, yet again, his extraordinary talent for alienating several groups of important people at one fell swoop. He managed simultaneously to insult the corporation of the City of London, which was not amused to be told to whom to give the freedom of the City, and a leading figure in a major ally with substantial investments in this country. Almost 50,000 British jobs are in German-owned companies, including some 14,000 that came in recent years. He has, yet again, shown his complete disregard for the interests of Britain.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The right hon. Lady will be well aware of my deep commitment to manufacturing industry. She and I have spoken on the same platform in support of it. While I fully support her determination and that of the Government to increase our competitiveness in the world market, does she agree that some of the policies that her Government are following—allowing the Bank of England unnecessarily to increase interest rates, the social chapter, the minimum wage and the Government's vendetta against the transport industry—are hardly likely to make British industry more competitive in Europe and the world? May I remind her that transport costs in Europe are already less than in Britain, and that in the Budget in about a week's time, the Chancellor will increase the cost of transport?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman knows that I share his concern for manufacturing and have great respect for his record at least, if not that of the former Government, on manufacturing. Of course we understand the concerns that some manufacturers are expressing, although, as the hon. Gentleman will know, those who are operating in the dollar market are not affected in quite the same way. We are in no doubt that the steps that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken to put interest rates in the control of the Bank of England will, in the long term, be beneficial to British business—a view shared by the business community. Neither the social chapter nor the national minimum wage will damage business, especially not manufacturing.

It is certainly the case that there is great concern among manufacturers about the state of the transport infrastructure. Indeed, it was one of their chief concerns in respect of reduced competitiveness during the lifetime of the previous Government. This Government will begin to address it.

Mr. Winnick: On competitiveness, is it really desirable that one or two individuals should own such vast media outlets, bearing in mind what has just happened to Mr. Patten's book? Would it not be far more desirable to have more competition in the media? I hope that my right hon. Friend will bear very much in mind what has happened over Mr. Patten's book when she considers the appropriate legislation on the media.

Mrs. Beckett: As my hon. Friend will know, the Government have taken action to begin to strengthen competition law. I share his view that it is important that there is strong competition in all areas of the marketplace, including in the newspaper industry.

Mr. Redwood: Given that the overwhelming majority of businesses in this country are small—serving a local, regional or perhaps national market—does the right hon. Lady agree with many of them that a single currency would be all cost and no benefit because they do not deal in francs or deutschmarks?

Mrs. Beckett: No, I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. What is more, neither do a great many people in his party agree. It is evident that on this issue, after the election as before it, the Conservative party is utterly divided. Many of its members, like the right hon. Gentleman, are deeply irresponsible and utterly unfit to hold office again.

Export Contracts

9. Mr. Gordon Prentice: What guidance she gives to United Kingdom companies concerning the payment of commissions to third parties to secure export contracts.
[31135]

Mrs. Roche: It is often advisable and sometimes legally necessary for exporters to enlist the services of paid intermediaries when seeking to win business overseas. The Department gives appropriate advice to any British business person who requests it.

Mr. Prentice: Does my hon. Friend the Minister share my astonishment that the former Conservative Cabinet Minister, Jonathan Aitken, is back selling arms to the middle east? Does she furthermore share my concern that in some of these arms contracts, commissions of 15 per cent. are commonplace and that on multi-million pound contracts, commissions of 25 per cent. are not unheard of? Much of the money washes back into the United Kingdom, lining the pockets of the intermediaries. Does she agree that there is a persuasive case for giving auditors the responsibility for assessing the reasonableness, scale and destination of commissions, and that the Government should act swiftly on the Law Commission report on corruption published last week?

Mrs. Roche: I know that the Home Office will look at the Law Commission report and take it into consideration in its work. My hon. Friend can be assured that the Government are determined to combat bribery, wherever and whenever it may occur. The United Kingdom's anti-corruption legislation is among the most comprehensive in the world and we are working within the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the European Union to ensure that our major overseas competitors enact similar legislation. On the other matter raised by my hon. Friend, it is for the company concerned to decide whom it wishes to employ.

Mr. Sayeed: Has the Minister made any assessment of the number of British jobs that would be lost if commission payments were not made? Where does she think those jobs would go—would it be France?

Mrs. Roche: Nothing in my remarks attacks commission payments. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), we realise that there are some circumstances where third parties are needed—for example, in the case of small firms that cannot employ their own staff overseas. That is perfectly legitimate and is part of the process.

Scientific Careers

10. Mrs. Butler: What steps she will take to ensure equality of opportunity in scientific careers. [31136]

Mr. Battle: We would all agree that far too few women are taking up science. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is pursuing the objective of equality of opportunity to increase the participation of women in science, engineering and technology careers, not least through our Department's development unit on women in science, engineering and technology.

Mrs. Butler: There has been a doubling in the number of women graduating in engineering since the mid-1980s—[Interruption.]—but the figure remains only 14 per cent. Does my hon. Friend agree that it might be a good idea to link his Department's development unit with the women's unit at the Department of Social Security to ensure a more co-ordinated approach and enhanced prospects for women considering that career path?

Mr. Battle: Yes, it is important that there is close co-operation between the women's unit at the DTI and the women's unit at the DSS. The women into science and engineering—WISE—project has increased the number of women engineering graduates from 7 per cent. to 14 per cent. I heard a gibe from the Opposition Benches that the increase had taken place since 1 May, but it is worth remembering that there are currently 56 Members of Parliament who have science, engineering or technological qualifications, of whom 42 are Labour Members and eight are women.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Although I welcome the figures that the Minister has announced and the fact that there are now more women involved in science careers, the Government should not overlook the fact that, for men or women to get into good science careers, they must do well at school and university. At the moment, there is a problem with boys and young men in sixth-form education, so will the Minister ensure that the encouragement given to girls in the past, which has resulted in success, will also be given equally to young men?

Mr. Battle: We all agree that there is an all-round problem with encouraging youngsters to get involved in science. However, we need to take positive action to ensure that we do not waste the talents of half of the population, because the figures show clearly that women are not going into advanced science and engineering careers. I should like to draw the House's attention to an article by Susan Greenfield, professor of pharmacology at Oxford university, in The Independent today. She is setting up a conference, particularly for young women, which is to take place on 9 March and is supported by our Department. She makes the point that we should encourage young women, but that we should not overlook the needs of young boys.

High-technology Companies

12. Mr. Gunnell: What plans she has to ensure that high-technology companies have the opportunity to realise their growth potential. [31139]

Mr. Battle: The Government are determined to create an environment in which high-technology companies can develop and grow. We are working to improve the climate for investment, to help firms to access and adapt new technologies, and to improve their management and marketing skills, and to encourage real partnership between the science and engineering base and industry.

Mr. Gunnell: Experience with Yorkshire Enterprise suggests to me that the smaller hi-tech companies often have difficulty in estimating accurately the costs of their development programmes and, as a result, frequently have to come back to their initial financier for further assistance. Is that a factor my hon. Friend takes into account when looking at the ways in which we can sustain hi-tech companies, which clearly have much to contribute to our economy?

Mr. Battle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I seem to recall that he championed Yorkshire Enterprise, which used European funding to promote several programmes aimed at small and medium enterprises. I share my hon. Friend's view. When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced the setting up of the McCullagh group, he said that we would work to identify any barriers that might exist to high-tech firms' growth.

It is important that business links, business shops in Scotland and Business Connect in Wales have personal business advisers to ensure that companies develop good business plans. We also need to address these questions to finance houses, to ensure that investment houses back high-tech companies because, although those companies are high risk, they are the seedcorn of the future.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does the Minister welcome the Green Paper that was published by the Secretary of State for Defence today, in which he describes the defence diversification agency effectively as a technology transfer agency, transferring technology from the Ministry of Defence to industry? I am sure that the whole House welcomes that. However, is that all that the Government will do on defence diversification? Is there no role for the Department of Trade and Industry? Have the Labour Government abandoned all the promises that Labour made to my constituents before the general election?

Mr. Battle: The Damascene conversions among the Conservatives never cease to amaze us. Before the general election, they opposed any introduction of defence diversification. I am delighted with that conversion. Yes, I do welcome the Green Paper published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and yes, we are consulted and we were involved in drawing it up.

In the Department of Trade and Industry, many other schemes are running which address the development and support of high-tech industries, not least the link awards, which we are making through the science programme, and the foresight programme, developing the blend between the science and engineering base and industry. The present Government are putting the practical partnerships together—something that was sadly lacking under the previous Administration.

Small Businesses

13. Dr. Starkey: What actions her Department proposes to take to help small businesses avoid cash-flow problems. [31141]

16. Mr. Singh: What estimate she has made of the damage caused to small businesses by the late payment of commercial debt. [31144]

Mrs. Roche: The Government are determined to ensure that small businesses benefit from the increased competitiveness that a healthy cash flow can bring. That is why we are bringing forward a comprehensive set of proposals to tackle that problem. We also recognise that small firms can maintain a healthy cash flow, and minimise their exposure to late payment and bad debts, by having effective credit management procedures in place.

Dr. Starkey: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. May I pass on to her the appreciation that many businesses in my constituency have expressed of the variety of measures that she has been taking to support small businesses? Will she expand on the measures that are being taken on credit management and debt recovery, both of which are especially important for small businesses?

Mrs. Roche: My hon. Friend will remember that earlier, I spoke about the better payment practice group, which does very good work. That group is about to produce a free guide to credit management and debt recovery, which will be made available through the "Enterprise Zone" and in other ways. It will interest the House to know that we are also supporting the development of an NVQ in credit management, and asking business links and others to assist small firms with their credit management skills.

Mr. Singh: Given the problems faced by small firms in Bradford as a result of late payment, will my hon. Friend consider commissioning research into best practice and ensure that the results of that research are given to small businesses in my area and other areas?

Mrs. Roche: I can help my hon. Friend considerably. The Department is working with the credit management research group at the university of Bradford which, I believe, is in his constituency, to identify best practice, and to ensure that that information is disseminated to small firms, and to the better payment practice group. I know that the university's work is greatly appreciated, not only in my hon. Friend's constituency, but throughout the United Kingdom, and I know that its work will be very beneficial to the economy of the UK as a whole.

Mr. Evans: Does the Minister agree that it can be damaging to the cash flow of small businesses if money is diverted from the core tasks of those businesses into irrelevant areas? Therefore, will she pay attention to the European Commission's proposals to impose the introduction of work councils for small businesses with fewer than 50 employees? I understand that the Government oppose those proposals but, because we have signed the social chapter, we have given away our veto, so to speak, which would have enabled us to opt out of those arrangements. What do the Government propose to do about that? Does it not show the lunacy of signing up to the social chapter in the first place?

Mrs. Roche: It is interesting to see the hon. Gentleman taking an interest in red tape and the European Union. He will be aware that the previous Government, of which he was a supporter, gold-plated European legislation coming from Brussels and also imposed burden upon burden on small business. It is no wonder that the Conservatives have lost the confidence of the small business community, as the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), who speaks for them on these matters, admits only too readily and, if I may say so to her, very honestly.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does the hon. Lady agree with the Hampel committee that small companies need less prescription and form-filling, and more efficiency and competitiveness? They do not require extra interference from Government, extra stakeholders' rights and extra bureaucracy.

Mrs. Roche: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is, therefore, a great pity that the previous Government, whom he supported, did none of those things. What did this Government do immediately after coming into office? We immediately made sure that half the members of the deregulation group, which is tasked with cutting red tape in government, represented small and medium-sized business. What a difference from the previous Administration, who talked much but delivered little.

Dr. Ladyman: There is a small engineering company in my constituency that has run into cash-flow problems in the past few months. The owner is preparing a report for me, which I am about to pass on to Ministers. It shows that the problems have been brought about by the systematic attempts by large engineering companies to argue about fees, delay payment of debt and force small engineering companies into difficulties. Can my hon. Friend assure me that the Government will tackle the matter, so that I can tell my constituent that this Government will give him help?

Mrs. Roche: My hon. Friend is right. That is why we are introducing the package of measures, including the Bill dealing with payment of statutory interest. I am delighted that so many large firms now take the issue seriously, because they know that it is important for their own competitiveness and that of small firms and the UK economy as a whole. They are taking steps to ensure prompt payment practices.

Investment (Developing Countries)

14. Mr. David Heath: What assessment she has made of the implications of the draft multilateral agreement on investment for developing countries. [31142]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Department for International Development has commissioned a study of the implications of the multilateral agreement on investment—MAI—for developing countries, which will be made available in good time for the OECD ministerial meeting at the end of April.

Mr. Heath: I thank the Minister for that reply, and I thank the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry for her helpful contribution to a recent Adjournment debate on that subject. Given the timetable and the widespread interest in the issue, can the Minister say whether the report from the Department for International Development will be available for debate in Parliament or in Committee, and available for consultation with non-governmental organisations, before the meeting of Ministers in April?

Mr. McCartney: I can confirm that the report will be available before the meeting in April.

Mr. MacShane: Has the Minister seen the statement from the OECD on the previous meeting which, in effect, announced that the MAI negotiations would have to continue for one more year, and which stressed in its opening paragraphs the importance of fair labour standards and environmental protection—issues put on the agenda by the Labour Government? Does he agree that that contrasts with the conspiratorial secrecy in which those negotiations were conducted under the previous Administration? Can he assure the House that Labour Ministers will continue to report to Members and the House on the conduct of the MAI negotiations?

Mr. McCartney: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. Not a single Conservative Member bothered to turn up and participate in a recent debate in the House on such an important subject. It was left to Labour and Liberal Democrat Members. May I make it clear that unless we are satisfied that the MAI will not undermine environmental protection and labour standards, we shall not sign it.

Mr. Bercow: Does the Minister share the stated view of the Secretary of State for International Development that the main reason for the Government's support for the insertion of a social clause in any international trading or investment agreement is simply to appease the British trade union movement?

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman gets sillier every time he speaks in the Chamber. We are trying to provide an international agreement that will ensure for both developing and under-developed countries an improvement in environmental and labour standards. The only contribution that the hon. Gentleman can make to the debate affecting the lives of tens of millions is a stupid schoolboy remark, which is not even worth answering.

Economic and Monetary Union

15. Yvette Cooper: What steps her Department is taking to help British businesses prepare for economic and monetary union. [31143]

Mrs. Beckett: My noble Friend the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe, who is a Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry and in the Treasury, has been appointed as the Minister responsible for these preparations. He has worked with the Treasury to produce a booklet for business, which will be widely distributed. My noble Friend is now working with the Treasury to emphasise the need for firms to prepare for the single currency in all their regular contacts. There is a Euro preparations unit, which is staffed by the Treasury, the DTI and the private sector, to reinforce that message. We are planning an awareness and information campaign.

Yvette Cooper: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the view expressed by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) in his book on the single currency, which is that Britain should not just stay out, but should attempt to derail the system? Does my right hon. Friend agree that such an approach would be extremely bad for the interests of British businesses, that it would cause turbulence in export markets, that it would weaken links with European suppliers and that it would be a wholly irresponsible and kamikaze thing to do?

Mrs. Beckett: I entirely agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. However, those outcomes would be entirely consistent with the behaviour of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who seems to be doing everything that he can to scupper the Conservative party's chances.

I note that the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), has recently said that the Conservative party seems to be suffering a collective nervous breakdown on the single currency, and that the party cannot happily hold together while those different views are expressed. I share his view. Like my hon. Friend, I condemn the irresponsibility of the right hon. Member for Wokingham. I am sorry that it seems to be so entirely characteristic.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): May I ask the Leader of the House to give the business for next week?

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): The business for next week will be as follows.

MONDAY 9 MARCH—Remaining stages of the National Minimum Wage Bill.

TUESDAY 10 MARCH—Opposition Day [9th Allotted Day]. Until about 7 pm, there will be a debate entitled "Labour's Hidden Taxes", followed by a debate entitled "The Government's Damage to Pensioners' Incomes". Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

That will be followed by remaining stages of the Fossil Fuel Levy Bill [Lords].

At 10 o'clock, the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

WEDNESDAY 11 MARCH—Until 2 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

In the afternoon we shall have proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill.

That will be followed by progress on remaining stages of the School Standards and Framework Bill, followed by remaining stages of the Wireless Telegraphy Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 12 MARCH—Remaining stages of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

FRIDAY 13 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 16 MARCH—Second Reading of the Teaching and Higher Education Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 17 MARCH—My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will open his Budget statement.

WEDNESDAY 18 MARCH—Until 2 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

That will be followed by continuation of the Budget debate.

THURSDAY 19 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget debate, which will be brought to a conclusion on Monday 23 March.

FRIDAY 20 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

Mrs. Shephard: I thank the Leader of the House for her statement. As I habitually remark—because she habitually makes the arrangements—it is useful to have notice of two weeks' business, although it may have been a little easier for her this week than perhaps it was last week.

Can the right hon. Lady say when we are likely to see the forthcoming legislation relating to the registration of political parties for electoral purposes? The Scotland Bill, the Government of Wales Bill and the European Parliamentary Elections Bill are already well advanced in their progress through the House, and she will agree that their electoral credibility depends on the provisions of the proposed legislation on the registration of political parties. It clearly is not acceptable that those three constitutional Bills should be expected to complete their passage through the House without at least a first sight of the Government's plans for the registration legislation. I hope that she can help in that respect.

Will the right hon. Lady arrange for a statement from the Secretary of State for Health on the way in which he chose to announce on Monday the rise in prescription charges? His plans seem to have been given to The Independent. They were then confirmed by his own Department, and were fully discussed and debated on radio and television all day—and all that before a written answer at 3.30 pm.

We know that it has become the practice of the Government in the past 10 months to bypass the House, but given that the present Secretary of State for Social Security described last year the announcement by written answer as "sneaking out the news", how would the right hon. Lady describe this year's arrangements? Announced on every channel, save to the House, perhaps.

Will the right hon. Lady arrange for a statement from the Minister for women on the Government's plans for the election of equal numbers of men and women to the Scottish Parliament and Welsh assembly, of which the Secretary of State for Social Security spoke so enthusiastically in last Friday's debate? Newspaper reports tell us—one has to believe them, as that is often the Government's chosen medium of communication—that those plans have been overruled by the Lord Chancellor. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) got rather short shrift from the Prime Minister yesterday when she asked that question. The whole House, not least Scottish and Welsh Members, would welcome clarification on the Government's apparently changed position.

Finally, will the right hon. Lady arrange for an early statement from the Secretary of State for Health on how much red meat the Government propose to allow us to eat? On 28 September, he told the appalled red meat eaters of Britain that, if they were eating an average amount, that was too much, and they had to eat less. Just today, the chief medical officer is telling the same meat eaters, "Forget it—average is okay." I suppose that that is what the Government mean by a "steakholder economy". On behalf of the meat eaters of Britain, I ask for early clarification.

Mrs. Taylor: I shall bring the right hon. Lady's last remarks to the attention of the Secretary of State for Health. The House has taken steps recently to encourage the eating of British beef. I am sure that she will join me in congratulating the Refreshment Department and those who have signed the book supporting the eating of British beef.

On the right hon. Lady's other points, we are making progress on drawing up legislation on the registration of political parties. We originally thought that that might coincide with legislation on the funding of political parties. That will now be a separate matter, because the Neill committee is looking at it in some detail. We hope that more straightforward legislation will be available. I hope that we can discuss that through the usual channels in the not too distant future.

I was interested in what the right hon. Lady said about prescription charges, and especially what she claimed the present Secretary of State for Social Security said last year. I should remind her of the complaint last year: that prescription charges had increased by an amount above the rate of inflation without a statement being made to the House. The right hon. Lady and Conservative Members should be circumspect in their criticism, given the fact that this year's increase in prescription charges represents the first real-terms cut in the cost of a prescription for 19 years.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made the position clear yesterday on the election of women to the Scottish Parliament. We are committed to increasing the representation of women in political life, and have achieved the highest ever number of women Members of Parliament. There are 101 Labour women Members, so we shall not take lectures from a party with only 14 women Members.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will my right hon. Friend find time next week for an urgent debate on the consequences of the fire sale of rail rolling stock companies that was held by the previous Government? They threw away state assets with abandon and ruthlessness, and the taxpayer could have benefited from an enormous number of assets if that had not been allowed. Will she ensure not only that the public know what was done by the previous Government, but that an urgent method of getting good value back is sought?

Mrs. Taylor: As usual, my hon. Friend raises an important point, of which I am well aware. Everyone was staggered by the figures revealed today. We said at the time of the privatisation that the Conservative Government were selling the taxpayer short. In fact, that dogma-driven Government have cost the taxpayer millions of pounds. We warned of these difficulties, and it would be good if we had time to discuss the issues. However, the Opposition have chosen not to use their Supply day to debate transport.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I am glad that the Leader of the House shares my disappointment that the Conservatives are not giving two former Secretaries of State, the right hon. Members for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) and for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), the opportunity next Tuesday to defend their complicity in the great rail rip-off, which is now called the great train robbery.

Why have we not yet heard from the Deputy Prime Minister, not only about the matter raised by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody)—the taxpayer was cheated of £1 billion because of undervaluing—but about the takeover bid for Great Western Holdings, which he has apparently put on hold? Again, a huge sum of money was scandalously ripped off the taxpayer because the previous Government insisted on pushing ahead with privatisation for purely political reasons. Is it not time that the Government explained what they propose to do about this appalling situation, and the deteriorating standards faced by customers and users of the railways as a result of what has happened?

Mrs. Taylor: All of us who are customers and users of the railways, which are a civilised way to travel, are concerned about deteriorating standards and the particular problems on some lines. As taxpayers, we are also outraged by the amount of money that the Conservative Government have cost us.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the Deputy Prime Minister has made his views clear on Great Western. The proposal has been put on hold, but the hon. Gentleman was right to say that further measures are required. He will know that the Government are conducting a thorough review of rail regulation. It is not possible to hold a debate in the near future, but the House will want to return to the issue.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that the issue of the railways is becoming a scandal in Britain today? People such as Branson—Mr. Goody Two-Shoes—are picking up taxpayers' money for running trains in the north-west. Taxpayers' money is involved in Eurostar, because we have had to step in to run it temporarily. Now, there is the scandal of people making millions of pounds from selling off rail rolling stock. After 10 months in office, it is high time that the Government realised, just as many of us forecast, that there is only one solution to the problem: British Rail should be taken back into public ownership.

Mrs. Taylor: I have already said that my hon. Friend's concern is shared by many hon. Members on both sides of the House, although I am not sure how some Conservative Members can face their constituents, given the problems that they have created. There is no satisfaction whatever in having been proved right, but, as I have already told my hon. Friend, we are conducting a thorough review of rail regulation.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): May we please have an early statement from the Prime Minister on the Government's plans to reform the House of Lords? As the Lord Chancellor has revealed that his Cabinet Sub-Committee is already working up proposals for an elected Chamber as part of stage 2 of the reform of the House of Lords, may we have a statement setting out in detail how and when the Government will consult all major parties?

Mrs. Taylor: I presume that the hon. Gentleman was asking for a debate. There are many occasions on which we would like to debate the composition of the House of Lords and the impact of hereditary peers on legislation. We made our position on the House of Lords perfectly clear in our election manifesto, and we are sticking to it.

We said that, as an initial self-contained reform not dependent on further reform in future, the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the House of Lords will be ended by statute. I wish that we had some idea what the Opposition think, as they are sending out such mixed messages. There are clear divisions between different parts of the Conservative party on this, as on most other issues.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Although I understand that my right hon. Friend will not be able to arrange a debate in the next fortnight on the report of the Modernisation Committee, will she consider sending a copy of that important report on the conduct of Members in the Chamber to all right hon. and hon. Members, so that we can consider its proposals?

Mrs. Taylor: I confirm that the Modernisation Committee has completed a report on the conduct of Members in the Chamber and that it will be published on Monday. It addresses many issues that have been raised on the Floor of the House by right hon. and hon. Members in the past few months. I hope that it will be a step forward, and that you, Madam Speaker, will welcome it. As my hon. Friend anticipated, I cannot provide time for a debate in the near future, but it is something that the House will wish to consider in due course.

[Mrs. Taylor]

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): In view of the increasing likelihood that the United Nations arms inspectors will not be allowed to carry out their duties in Iraq unhindered, and in view of the growing racial strife in Kosovo, will the Leader of the House provide time for an early debate on foreign affairs, to reassure right hon. and hon. Members that Her Majesty's Government will not be flouted by two dictators at once—Saddam Hussein and Mr. Milosevic?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman knows that, during the recent difficulties with Iraq, the Government kept the House very well informed on all occasions. I cannot promise the early debate he requests, but he will know that there are Foreign and Commonwealth questions on Tuesday.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Has my right hon. Friend had time to look at early-day motion 873, which highlights the desperate plight of Afghan women living under the Taliban?

[That this House offers its support for the women of Afghanistan who have been stripped of rights taken for granted in this country, who are banned from work and barred from receiving any education, are not allowed to leave home unaccompanied or to speak in public and are forced to wear the all-enveloping burqa and for whom healthcare is almost non-existent, notes that thousands of widows are deprived of the right to earn any livelihood for their families and that their children are forced to scavenge on the streets; therefore calls upon the Government to initiate a campaign at the UN to ensure that the Declaration of Human Rights is respected in Afghanistan, and the rights of women upheld; and further calls upon honourable Members to wear a flower on 8th March to show solidarity with Afghan women.]

I wonder whether, despite the tight legislative timetable, the Leader of the House could provide an urgent debate on an appalling human rights abuse that is really gender apartheid.

Mrs. Taylor: I understand the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend. She will be aware that the United Kingdom is at the forefront of efforts to improve the conditions of women in Afghanistan. We monitor the position carefully, and offer what help we can. She will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has taken a particular interest in the matter. However, I cannot promise her a debate in the near future.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): Will the Leader of the House ask the Minister for School Standards, the hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers), to clarify his statement that any threats of closure to a village school will be called in for a decision? His statement has caused confusion throughout the country. Councils do not know whether it is a further example of the Government's determination to centralise power, or just an empty gesture to the countryside movement.

Mrs. Taylor: I should have thought that hon. Members on both sides would welcome my hon. Friend's decision. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and his Ministers should be involved in such important decisions.

Mr. James Wray (Glasgow, Baillieston): Will my right hon. Friend provide time for a debate on credit unions? The new quango, the Financial Services Authority, has given credit unions the shivers. They feel that they will be asked to pay the same amount of support to the FSA as banks.

Mrs. Taylor: I cannot answer my hon. Friend's specific point. He will know that the Government are proposing to publish a draft Bill on financial services regulation. That will allow everyone with an interest to contribute to the consultation period.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Is the Leader of the House aware of the estimate that tourism will become the largest business sector in the world by the millennium? It is a tradition that the House has a Friday morning debate on tourism fairly regularly. Will she consider that request seriously?

Mrs. Taylor: I shall consider that request, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that Fridays in the near future are reserved for private Members' Bills.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When can we have a debate on the national insurance fund, and the welcome news announced on Friday that it has £896 million unallocated for next year? Since that money can be used without infringing the spending limits set down by the previous Government and this Government, will the Government consider applying it to ensure that pensioners have what they have not had since 1980—an increase in their pension linked to the increase in earnings?

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend will know that it is unwise to take a figure in isolation and draw simple conclusions. He will also be aware that we have Treasury questions on Thursday and the Budget the following week. I do not think that it will be possible to have a debate on the specific point that he has raised.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): May I reinforce the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie)? Will the Leader of the House grant us an urgent debate on the Government's plans for reform of the upper House? Is it not clear that the Government's true intention is to do away with the independence of the upper House, replacing the current structure with a quango full of placemen appointed by the Prime Minister, to ensure that the Government's overriding and dictatorial behaviour in this House is unimpeded by a reformed upper House?

Mrs. Taylor: I would have expected such comments from the right hon. Gentleman. I am not surprised that he thinks that the so-called independence of the upper House can be equated with an hereditary peerage that predominantly supports the Conservative party. If he thinks that that has anything to do with independence, he has a lot to learn about how the Houses of Parliament work.

Mr. Don Touhig (Islwyn): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 881, which calls on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to sack the governing body of the Gwent tertiary college because of serious mismanagement and misuse of European funds?

[That this House expresses its concern at the decision of the governors of Gwent Tertiary College to employ a personnel consultant at a cost of £400 a day, in addition to the £650 a day it paid to another consultant; is disturbed that millions of pounds of European funds were misused; asks for all the reports into the college to be made public; recognises the uncertainty both students and staff at the college face as a result of all the investigations; and calls on the Secretary of State to sack the governors and make the management of further education colleges more open, accountable and representative of the communities they serve.]

Will my right hon. Friend allow time for an early debate on that, so that we can express a view that the governing bodies of further education colleges should be accountable for their actions?

Mrs. Taylor: I agree with my hon. Friend that FE colleges should be fully accountable. He will be aware that the issue of Gwent tertiary college was raised a couple of weeks ago in an Adjournment debate. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister also addressed it yesterday, and asked to be kept informed about what is happening. I am sure that he will be. However, I cannot find time for another debate on that.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the right hon. Lady take particular note of yesterday's debate on the high-speed rail link to the channel tunnel? May I remind her that the issue affects the whole of the United Kingdom, and the north-west as we both know, and is not just a Kent or east London matter? The National Audit Office report shows that the loss on the sale of rolling stock almost exactly equals the missing money needed to complete the link right through to north London. Will she draw that fact to the attention of the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions? Will she ask him to make a full statement on the Government's proposals for the link?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman asks me for a statement on the matter, and goes a long way to justifying the House giving the issue more attention. As I said earlier, hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the missing money and the way in which taxpayers were cheated at the time of rail privatisation. I do not need to bring those facts to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is fully aware of them. My right hon. Friend has said that he will keep the House informed on the high-speed rail link to the tunnel. He made a statement when the emergency first arose, and will certainly be keeping the House informed of developments.

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in the past few days, an unarmed man was shot and killed in his home by Bedfordshire police on the misinformation of a gunman in the vicinity? Is she also aware that, the day before, a family in my constituency received compensation for very similar circumstances, when two young children who were left at home alone were confronted by police gunmen? Will she arrange an early debate to ensure that the matter is fully investigated, so that further such fatalities are avoided?

Mrs. Taylor: The issues that my hon. Friend raises sound very serious indeed; I can well understand her concern. She asks for an early debate, but I do not think that that will be possible. However, a Home Office Minister is present on the Front Bench, and I am sure that he has heard her remarks.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): A little later this month, European Culture Ministers will be visiting Macclesfield to attend a seminar at the excellent Shrigley Hall hotel in a wonderful hill village to the south of Manchester. Unfortunately, this long overdue and justified recognition of Macclesfield comes at a time when its museums are under threat of closure, because Cheshire county council—Labour-controlled—is dramatically cutting the grant for museums. Labour-controlled Cheshire county council blames that on the very unfair revenue support grant settlement given to it by a Labour Government. Will the right hon. Lady arrange for the appropriate Minister to come to the House to deal with future funding of very important local museums, such as the silk heritage museum in Macclesfield?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman just about kept a straight face during that question. I hope that he has given his constituency sufficient publicity. He will know that it is Culture, Media and Sport Question Time a week on Monday.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Can we have a debate next week on the other serious report published yesterday by the Comptroller and Auditor General and the National Audit Office on the supply of Westland helicopters to India under cover of the overseas aid budget? Twenty-one helicopters, costing £50 million, lasted for only six years and were then sold for £900,000. Their sole purpose was to ferry people to and from oil rigs. The Comptroller and Auditor General said that that served absolutely no purpose for the benefit of the poorest people in India. The people responsible—the previous Government—need to be held to account.

Mrs. Taylor: We could spend an awful lot of time in this Chamber debating all the issues for which the previous Government should be held to account. As we are looking to the future and pursuing legislation, we cannot, unfortunately, find time for all debates—even when there is a reasonable request.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Would the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to make a statement on any change in Government education policy since 1 May, owing to the fact that Lancashire county council proposes to remove concessionary bus travel from 16 to 18-year-olds who go to sixth-form colleges or sixth-form schools? That will deter many families in Lancashire—I believe the figure is 7,000—who will now have to find hundreds of pounds for bus travel, or perhaps will not put their child forward for further education. Has not education, education, education been replaced by back-door tax, back-door tax, back-door tax?

Mrs. Taylor: I wish that we had time to discuss all the measures taken by Education Ministers which have been so positive—not least the vast amount of money that we are putting into education which the previous Government denied to schools. Education is being improved in a range of areas—smaller classes, more money for books and a raft of other measures which are necessary because of the failures of the previous Government.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): May I return to the subject of the Hillsborough scrutiny of evidence report, which has been raised in the House previously? Again, I ask the Government to find time to debate the report on the Floor of the House. My right hon. Friend will be aware of the anger and frustration in Merseyside and beyond, which has been fuelled by the fact that we have been unable to find time for a debate. I urge her to find time as a matter of urgency. It may not be possible to have a debate this side of Easter, but could she perhaps arrange for a debate as soon as possible after Easter? It would be seen as a positive response if she could give some indication today.

Mrs. Taylor: Hon. Members have raised this issue in previous weeks, and I must refer to what I said then. However much we understand the concerns of those who have been affected, it is difficult to find time in the near future for a debate on this important report. I know that hon. Members who feel concerned about the matter have looked at ways of trying to get an hour-and-a-half Adjournment debate on the subject. I understand what my hon. Friend describes as the frustration and anger of hon. Members who want a full debate. I share his concern, as does the Home Secretary. We would like to be able to find time for a debate. He is right to say that there is no possibility of finding time before Easter. I will look at the possibilities after Easter, but I cannot give him a specific date—although we understand the nature and depth of the concerns that are felt.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): Does the Leader of the House understand why there has been such a concerted campaign to get a debate on her Government's proposals on the composition of the upper House? After all, it is clear that the Government intend to abolish the hereditary principle, but we do not know their intentions on the composition of the upper House in the future. Unless that is answered, we have no way of knowing whether what will be put in its place is any better or not.

Mrs. Taylor: I am interested to hear from the hon. Gentleman that there has been a concerted effort to get a debate on the upper House. This is the first business questions at which the matter has been mentioned. If that constitutes a concerted campaign by the Opposition, they still have a great deal to learn. If he thinks that this issue should take priority, perhaps he should have persuaded his Front-Bench colleagues to use an Opposition day for it.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): As my right hon. Friend knows, the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill returns to the Floor of the House tomorrow, but it may fall through lack of time. Is it possible, at this eleventh hour, for my right hon. Friend and the Government to follow the precedent set by my predecessor Sydney Silverman—the then Member for Nelson and Colne—on the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965, when the Government, under the Prime Minister Harold Wilson, allocated nine Wednesday mornings? Surely it must be possible for the Government to allocate time, perhaps on a Tuesday or Thursday morning, which would not eat into Government business, to allow the Bill to succeed.

Mrs. Taylor: I am not sure that it is time that is the enemy of the Bill. Time is available for it to progress if the opponents respect the overwhelming support that it has.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Will the right hon. Lady return to the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson)? Is she aware that, this weekend, the Prime Minister will be meeting Prime Minister Netanyahu of Israel? Given the serious stalling of the peace process and the continuing crisis with Iraq, will she please drop her churlish reply to my hon. Friend and agree that, although the Government behaved correctly—rightly so, since there was a possibility of British troops being committed to action—she should make time for the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House on his meeting with Prime Minister Netanyahu, and to answer questions on the peace process as well as wider middle east questions?

Mrs. Taylor: Both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have made it clear that they set great store by trying to make progress on the peace process in the middle east. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman supports what was done about Iraq—he made that clear at the time. I hope that he will also accept that the Government are endeavouring to make progress in those peace talks. We all have a responsibility there as well, and Ministers are giving those talks as much priority as possible.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): My right hon. Friend will be aware that, in local government, when councillors make a reckless decision that incurs a loss to their local authority, they are surcharged. When we debate the sale of the rolling stock leasing companies, would my right hon. Friend consider producing retrospective legislation to surcharge those Ministers responsible for the loss of £1 billion to the public purse? Will she also consider producing legislation that would inflict another windfall tax on those who profiteered from the sale, which would obviate the need for student fees?

Mrs. Taylor: Although it might be tempting to have retrospective surcharges of the sort my hon. Friend describes, it is not feasible.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): Will the Leader of the House tell us whether, on 20 March, when the Local Government (Experimental Arrangements) Bill comes before the House for its Second Reading, the Government will allow time for it to have a proper Second Reading debate? If there were time for such a debate, it would be interesting to explore the different views of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister on local government reform.

On the one hand, on Tuesday the Deputy Prime Minister proffered an olive branch of co-operation and partnership with local government, and, on the other, the Prime Minister yesterday wielded a big stick and told local government that, unless it did what he wanted, its services would be taken away. Which is it going to be, and can we have such a debate?

Mrs. Taylor: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to draw attention to a useful Bill and support it. Had he done so, I would gladly have agreed with him, although there is no prospect of any extra time—it is a private Member's Bill, and it will join the list in the normal way. In trying to manufacture a division, his comments were just plain silly.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that many Labour Members who represent rural constituencies would warmly welcome a debate on the future of the village school? Those village schools that managed to survive the previous Government, who oversaw the closure of between 90 and 100 schools in my county, mainly in villages, warmly welcomed the Government's brief announcement last week, but hon. Members know that village schools face genuine problems in maintaining academic standards, and local education authorities face problems in properly funding them. Therefore, a full debate would be of particular benefit to the House.

Mrs. Taylor: As I said, many positive statements have come out of Government recently on which I would like to be able to find time for a full debate. It would be good to contrast the statement of my hon. Friend with the pathetic record of Conservative Members when they were in government, as they closed 450 rural schools. With that record, it is perhaps not surprising that they do not know the difference between Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Will my right hon. Friend, in liaison with my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, consider holding a debate on the implications of the Krebs report on bovine tuberculosis? There is a growing awareness that some of the report's recommendations may not be practicable, and an examination of this growing problem—which is probably second only to bovine spongiform encephalopathy—is long overdue.

Mrs. Taylor: The Krebs report recommended a package of measures which, taken together, provide a coherent basis for moving forward. We have consulted on the report to find the best way of implementing the measures. The consultation period ended only last week, and the Government are currently considering the views that were submitted. The House will be informed of decisions in due course, but I am afraid that I do not think that it will be possible to have a debate along the lines that my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that house price gazumping has returned to England? Will she make time available to discuss how my constituents in St. Helens can enjoy the same protection as the constituents of our Scottish colleagues?

Mrs. Taylor: We all have constituents who have faced problems because of gazumping, which has, at times, been rampant and caused many difficulties. My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing is issuing a consultative paper, as we take the problem seriously and want to establish whether we can protect people who currently feel extremely vulnerable.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Can the right hon. Lady give us an assurance today, rather than next week? She will be aware of the point of order that I raised yesterday in the House. Does she agree that the Opposition have tried to be wholly supportive and constructive in the work of the Modernisation Committee and in the timetabling of the Bills that are currently before the House? Does she accept that, if timetabling is to work, there must be no repeat of yesterday's events, when a statement—it was not urgent or of international importance—took up one hour of the three hours that had been allocated for a debate on a crucial feature of the Scotland Bill? I know that she has tried to be entirely constructive in these matters, and I ask for an assurance that she will use her best endeavours to ensure that what happened yesterday never occurs again.

Mrs. Taylor: I am not sure that I can give the entire assurance that the hon. Gentleman wants. The Business Committee, which decides about business on the programme motion, takes into account the possibility of statements. Opposition Members often criticise us for not making the statements that they want. I should point out that Conservative Front Benchers asked 24 questions about the statement yesterday—clearly, some Conservative Members thought that it was important.

Conservative Members may ask why we did not make the statement on another day, but if we had made it the day before, it would have taken time from the Supply day, which is something that we have so far managed to avoid doing. We made the statement on the day that had been decided. The Opposition want statements, but when we make them, they complain, and when we do not make them, they complain.

Points of Order

4.12 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to raise a point of order relating to the Green Paper that was issued today by the Ministry of Defence. This morning, The Daily Telegraph carried a large article entitled, "Agency will help arms firms tap civilian markets", in which it was reported that the Secretary of State for Defence was likely to unveil plans today to set up a defence diversification agency involving the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, whose headquarters is in my constituency of Aldershot.

I inquired whether a statement would be made to the House today, but was told that the announcement would be made by way of written answer. When I made further inquiries, I discovered that a press conference was held this morning at the Ministry of Defence, at which journalists were able to question Ministers about these very serious proposals, which go to the heart of the defence industry. Members of Parliament, however, including many who have DERA sites in their constituencies, have had no opportunity to question Ministers. It is clear that the article in The Daily Telegraph today is based extensively on briefings provided by the Ministry of Defence.

On a point of principle, you have made it clear to the House that you expect important announcements to be made first to the House rather than to the world outside, although I accept that we are talking about a Green Paper. I would be grateful if you would rule on this matter, because I feel that we have been denied an opportunity to question Ministers that was given to others outside the House.

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman said, it is a Green Paper. According to my inquiries, the press conference to which he refers took place after the written answer and the Green Paper were made available to Members of Parliament. I understand that all the proper procedures were correctly followed.

Mr. Howarth: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. It is true that the Green Paper was placed in the Vote Office shortly before midday, but it is not true that the written question and answer were placed in the Library before the press conference started. The Library has informed me that the question and answer arrived at 12.30 pm, which is half an hour after the press conference started.

Madam Speaker: The question was:

"To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to publish the Government's Green Paper on Defence Diversification."

The answer was:

"We have today published our Green Paper 'Defence Diversification: Getting the most out of defence technology', as Command Paper No. 3861. Copies are available from the Vote Office. There will now be a period of consultation."

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your assistance, as the guardian of Back Benchers, over the debate on Tuesday evening on individual savings accounts and personal equity plans, and to the specific procedures used by the Paymaster General.

I tabled a written question to the Paymaster General last month, asking whether the findings of the consultation exercise on ISAs and PEPs that ended at the end of January could be published and the full findings placed in the Library for the use of all Members. He refused that request, and said merely that a summary of submissions would be made available, probably after the Budget.

It was clear on Tuesday evening that the Paymaster General was using submissions from investment houses and individuals, and quoting them selectively. The gist of the full documents was in fact rather contrary to the case that he was trying to make. Would it not be in the best interests of good debate in the House if he made all those consultation findings fully available in the Library, so that we can all be fully informed for debate in the future?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman does not give me the status of the papers to which he refers. If they are state papers, of course they must be made available. It appears from what he says that they are not state papers, so they do not have to be made available. Let me make it clear to the hon. Gentleman and to the House that I will not take points of order about the quality of ministerial answers. That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You may recall that, about two weeks ago, I raised with the Leader of the House a matter relating to the slackness and impertinence of some Ministers in not signing correspondence to Members of Parliament. The right hon. Lady, extremely courteously, said that she would make representations on behalf of both Government and Opposition Members. Since that complaint, I have had five unsigned letters from Ministers.

I regard it as wholly unacceptable, as I am sure you do, Madam Speaker, that, when constituents write to Members of Parliament to make inquiries of Ministers and the Government on matters relating to Government policy, we do not receive duly signed letters. Will you, on behalf of the whole House, make representations to the Government asking them to cease that practice forthwith, and to ensure that Ministers sign their letters?

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) rose—

Madam Speaker: No, I can deal with this, thank you.

I am entirely in sympathy with the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames). It happens to me as Speaker that I get letters unsigned by Ministers, and my office sends them back. It may delay matters, but it is worth it in the long run. Those on the Government Front Bench know my views on this, as do various Secretaries of State. I suggest that all hon. Members do likewise.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. This afternoon, I watched the proceedings of the House on television in my office. I noticed that some hon. Members are heard clearly on the microphone system, but others, sitting in other parts of the House, are not so clearly heard. One example this afternoon was the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans): it was hard to hear what he was saying. I put that down not to editorial interference by the BBC, but to bad positioning of the microphones.

The other day, an elderly constituent raised the issue with me. I carried out an experiment, and I am now reporting the findings. I ask your assistance, Madam Speaker, in suggesting to the BBC that it should use better or more directional microphone systems, so that all hon. Members can be heard, even if they are talking rubbish.

Madam Speaker: That is a most interesting point of order, but I would also encourage hon. Members to project their voices.

Mr. Hawkins: Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), Madam Speaker. You have said that you have been the victim of unsigned correspondence. This morning, in response to a letter I sent to the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, I did not receive a letter, signed or unsigned: my letter was returned simply with a yellow, sticky, Post-it note attached, on which had been scrawled a note by some person in the office of the Secretary of State. I have no doubt that, had you received such a response, your views would have been even stronger than those you expressed about unsigned ministerial correspondence. Will you therefore reinforce the point that such practices are to be even more greatly deplored?

Madam Speaker: As I have not received a sticky yellow note returning my correspondence, I can hardly comment.

BILLS PRESENTED

PORTS OF ENTRY (SPECIAL STATUS)

Mr. Gwyn Prosser, supported by Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, Mr. Ivan Henderson, Laura Moffatt, Mr. Derek Wyatt, Ms Jackie Lawrence, Dr. Stephen Ladyman, Mr. Nick Ainger, Mr. Robert Syms, Mrs. Louise Ellman, Dr. Alan Whitehead and Mr. Norman Baker, presented a Bill to make provision for special status for ports of entry to the United Kingdom so far as the law affecting local government and policing is concerned; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 April, and to be printed [Bill 137].

RECYCLED CONTENT OF NEWSPRINT

Mr. David Chaytor, supported by Mrs. Helen Brinton, Mr. John Austin, Mr. David Lepper, Mr. Stephen Pound, Mr. Tom Brake, Mr. Norman Baker, Mr. Matthew Taylor, Sir Sydney Chapman, Mr. Peter Bottomley, Mr. Cynog Dafis and Rev. Martin Smyth, presented a Bill to increase the amount of recycled paper used in newsprint in the United Kingdom; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 April, and to be printed [Bill 138].

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 26 February].

[MR. MICHAEL J. MARTIN in the Chair]

Clause 5

COMMENCEMENT

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

4.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): Clause 5 was the subject of some interesting discussion last Thursday. Briefly, the clause will enable the Secretary of State to appoint the day of commencement of the Bill's provisions, by way of a statutory instrument. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) tabled several amendments that would delay the commencement of the Bill's provisions. He would like Parliament, through the affirmative resolution procedure, to decide whether the Act should be brought into force, even though Parliament would have already approved the measures. The Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) explained that there was no justification for the use of the affirmative resolution procedure in that case and no precedent for such a measure.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire would also like us to wait until the Neill Committee on Standards in Public Life and the Jenkins commission on the voting system have reported, even though neither body is considering issues related to elections to the European Parliament.

It has also been proposed that parties must secure democratic approval at regional level of the party lists and the order in which the candidates' names appear. I know of no instance of a Government interfering in the internal affairs of political parties. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire may wish for that, given his party's difficulties, but I do not think that he seriously wants it. The Conservative party is clutching at straws and seeking to delay commencement by any means possible. Clause 5 simply allows the date of commencement to be determined in the usual way.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 5 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6

SHORT TITLE

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. George Howarth: Clause 6 provides that, if enacted, the Bill will become the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1998.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New clause 2

CONDUCT OF ELECTIONS (TRAINING OF ELECTION STAFF)

'.—(1) The Secretary of State shall—

(a) publish a detailed training manual for persons directly concerned in the conduct of elections under this Act and the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978; and

(b) establish and publish details of a standard of proficiency which is to be achieved by such persons.

(2) Local authorities shall certify to Parliament the number of persons achieving the standard established under subsection (1)(b) above.'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss new clause 3—Application of this Act to elections to be subject to implementation of section (Conduct of elections (training of election staff))—

'. The provisions of this Act shall apply only in the case of an election held more than twelve months after the requirements of section (Conduct of elections (training of election staff)) have been met.'.

Mr. Clappison: The new clauses deal with training for the new election system. Their purpose is to uphold our valued tradition of well-conducted elections, which the Minister will join me in wanting to maintain. They simply require the Secretary of State to publish a training manual for persons concerned in the conduct of the elections and to establish and publish details of a standard of proficiency for them, and that the system is in place in good time for the European parliamentary elections.

In all fairness, the Government must accept that the new system will be unfamiliar both to electors and to those charged with the conduct of elections. As we have said before in Committee, the simplicity of the new system, which the Home Secretary valiantly paraded as one of its virtues, has not been entirely self-evident during our proceedings. If he found the task of making the requisite divisions and understanding the difference between d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague difficult, we do not think that it will any easier for those charged with the conduct of elections to carry out the necessary calculations and operations. We think that the Minister will welcome the opportunity to say a little more about how the Government plan to equip the people who will run the elections, to ensure that they run smoothly and efficiently.

We note from the explanatory and financial memorandum that the Government estimate the cost of training for those operating the system at £4 million. The Government owe us a little more detailed explanation of that cost. How does it compare with the cost of training staff for previous European elections under the present system? Is it a one-off cost or will it continue to be incurred in future European elections? I hope that the Minister will be eager to give details of the training that the Government plan to give those who will conduct the elections. I think that he agrees that it is important that the Committee should be reassured that they will be properly trained, and that that training will be carried out in good time for the elections. Therefore, can the Minister tell the Committee a little more about the details of the training? Can he tell us, for example, on what basis those who are to be trained will be selected? Who will train them? I should welcome a response from the hon. Gentleman on those two specific points.

I would also appreciate a response from the Minister on whether any qualifications or experience will be required on the part of those responsible for training. What is the Government's time scale for the training? Can we be assured that the training that the Government plan will be in time for the elections? That is an important feature of our new clause. We want the training to be done in good time.

I have to say to the Minister—I do not think that I am being unkind—that I have not been entirely impressed by the progress of the legislation so far, the way in which it has been introduced or the changes that have had to be made. We want to be reassured that the problems that have occurred with the calculations of proportionality will not recur when it comes to training those who will conduct the elections. We want the Government to reassure us that the training will be carried out in good time.

Can the Minister tell us a little more about the arrangements for counting the votes by those who have been trained? For example, will the votes for one of the new large regions be counted at a single regional venue, or will there be multiple counts? If there are to be multiple counts throughout the region, on what basis will the locations be chosen?

Will the Minister tell us a little about the training of those who will do the calculations after the votes have been counted? I have raised a number of issues with him. I emphasise that we want to know how those who will do the calculations will be trained. We know that people in other countries have to do such calculations, but the calculations are new to this country and it is possible that mistakes will be made. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman joins us in not wishing to see the integrity and standing of our electoral system undermined by any mistakes. We want to see that people are well trained in advance, in doing what may sometimes be fairly complex calculations.

In the same vein, we should like to know where the calculations will be done. If there are multiple counts, will the calculations be done at the regional venue? If not, where will they be done?

The new clauses have been tabled in a helpful spirit. We hope that the Government will want to tell us a little more about the operation of the new system. It is fair to say that it is not an entirely simple system. It will be very new. We want to be reassured that its conduct will be up to the standards that hon. Members on both sides of the Committee have come to expect of the conduct of elections, which is a tradition of long standing in this country that we want to see maintained.

Mr. George Howarth: The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) explained the reasoning behind the new clauses, but I am not entirely convinced that he has introduced them in a deeply serious way, although he asked some questions that I shall try my best to answer. I am not convinced, and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman really is, that it is really necessary to include in the Bill the sort of detail that he suggests on training, but I shall cover the issues.

The Government's recognition of the need to train officers on the ground to use the new electoral system is clearly stated in the Bill, as the hon. Gentleman conceded. The Bill's explanatory and financial memorandum gives an estimate of £4 million for that purpose, and clause 4 provides for that cost to be met from the Consolidated Fund. That £4 million is a one-off cost; but because a subsequent Parliament may make changes to the legislation, it is not possible to say that there will never be a repetition. One cannot look into the future, but if changes were made in future, additional resources would be necessary to carry out extra training for the new system.

Officials in the Home Office are already holding discussions with the relevant bodies, in particular the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and the Association of Electoral Administrators. The hon. Gentleman asked whether a certificate or diploma qualification would be available and, although I am not aware of any plans to introduce a specific qualification for these European elections, I spoke at the Association of Electoral Administrators conference in Plymouth last week and awarded the first diplomas in competence in electoral administration, so I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is a proper certificate and that the curriculum includes European elections, in addition to all other forms of election. Therefore, there will be a certificate available and, although it will not be necessary in every case to hold that certificate, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman questions the competence of the electoral administrators we already use.

Mr. Clappison: I take it that the Minister has moved on from the question of cost, but before leaving it entirely, can he make it absolutely clear how the £4 million compares with the cost of training those conducting elections in the past? Is the £4 million a new cost?

Mr. Howarth: I am not in a position to provide that information. If, after discussions with the electoral administrators and others, that sum proves inadequate or compares unfavourably with previous costs, we shall take that into account. If, after checking the substance of the hon. Gentleman's question, I find that there is some difference, I shall let him know in writing.

The local authority chief executives and the electoral administrators are confident that they will be able to operate the new system without any undue problems. I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the men and women who are involved in the conduct of elections: they perform a valuable service and do so capably and professionally. In changing the voting system for future elections to the European Parliament, the Government appreciate that the job carried out by those officers will change. We shall assist local authorities as much as we can in preparing for that change, but we shall not take the unprecedented step of dictating the sort of training required and burdening them with draconian performance standards; nor do we wish the introduction of the new system to be postponed by an arbitrary period of delay.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question of the location of counts and of the calculation of the aggregates on a regional basis. My recollection is that counts will be conducted at parliamentary constituency level and that the aggregation of those results into a regional result will be carried out at a regional centre, according to a formula—either the one on the face of the Bill, or some other formula that has been agreed subsequently.

The Opposition are intent on preventing the new system from coming into force by any means they can devise. They have already shown that in their previous amendments, and they are doing so again in these new clauses. Although the new clauses raise subjects that are worthy of debate, they are not worthy of incorporation in the Bill. Unlike the Opposition, we recognise and acknowledge that the traditions of the electoral officers mean that they will be able to cope with the new system with their normal admirable ability. They will be properly trained, and I am confident that they will maintain their current high level of professionalism throughout 1999 and beyond. If the hon. Member for Hertsmere has the same regard for me as I am sure he does for those proficient officials, I am sure that he will feel inclined to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) say that his new clauses were helpful, not obstructive. New clause 3, in proposing an arbitrary 12-month delay, seemed to us an ingenious method of trying to derail the 1999 timetable, but we stand corrected on that. I was also pleased that the Conservatives were able to congratulate our election staff on the work that they do, and I was pleased to hear those congratulations echoed by the Minister.

It seems to be a feature of the debate about more proportional systems that opponents of proportionality tend to overstate the complexity of such systems. In fact, similar systems are used throughout the world, in many different arenas. Moreover, anyone who has watched election staff trying to do a multiple local government by-election count, perhaps at the same time as a general election count, knows that we already have a fair degree of complexity in our system, and that our staff are perfectly able to cope with it.

Liberal Democrats do not believe that it is necessary to have a doctorate in electoral systems, or to have completed a—

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) did not say that the systems were complex—he said merely that he did not understand them?

Mr. Allan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful intervention. One of the key features of debate on the Bill is that all of us have increased our understanding of more proportional systems. I hope that, as they come to understand such systems, Conservative Members will recognise their value and change their position, as they are changing their position on many constitutional issues.

In our view, it is unnecessary for the people responsible for the conduct of elections to have written a dissertation on the inherent differences between d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague, or to have passed a training course, and such provisions need not be in the Bill. We see no need to support the new clauses. We hope that Conservative Members, having heard the Minister's reassurances on the training of our staff and having praised their quality, will accept that that quality will be perfectly sufficient to cope with the system that the Bill will introduce.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I shall speak in support of new clause 2. Scrutineers from political parties play an important part in the electoral process, but the role of agents has not yet been mentioned. Under our current system, agents have a legal position vis-à-vis the candidates and, if they get things wrong in terms of expenditure, they can go to prison.

We are to have a new electoral system as a result of the Bill. Some time, registration of parties may well have to be introduced. Inevitably, the time will come when we must decide whether to have an agent system as before, and whether imprisonment is to be a penalty. Given the size of the electoral areas and the fact that a Conservative party agent or a Labour party agent for, let us say, the South East, may face legal penalties if things are not done correctly, publication of any training manuals on the conduct of elections would be useful, not only for the local government officers and others who deal with the election, but for the political party agents, who may have to scrutinise and/or risk objections or legal action. Such eventualities are quite likely, especially under a new system, and especially as candidates might not wholly understand the implications of what is going on at the count.

Therefore, it is sensible, if the system is to work and deliver a result, that we publish manuals to enable the political party agents to understand the ground rules, so that when the count takes place, and when expenses must be accounted for, everyone knows the ground rules.

The Minister may say that this is not the most appropriate moment to discuss that matter, but I believe that the Government must address the issues concerning agents, expenditure and possible imprisonment. Is it practical to expect an agent for the region of the South East, responsible for millions of voters and perhaps thousands of party workers, to be confronted with imprisonment, and is it practical to expect an individual to control an election campaign in the traditional sense? Those issues must be considered, and I should be grateful for the Minister's comments.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am delighted to be given the chance to say a few words.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) was somewhat pessimistic—but, I suppose, realistic—in his appraisal of the Tories' misfortune on 1 May. Perhaps the Conservatives are looking for a delaying tactic, to give them more chance of putting together a substantial case when the elections come. His speech was also a pessimistic appraisal of the education system, which the Conservative party lorded over for 18 years, because it implied that, in the 15 months before the elections take place, we cannot educate the electoral officers responsible for running and managing those elections, to equip them to do their job successfully.

4.45 pm

I have fought 25 elections in the past 30 years at three different levels, so I have some experience of elections going wrong. As someone who has been on the wrong end of two very narrow counts to get elected, or re-elected, to the House, I know too well of the arguments that occur because of the inadequacies of the system.

However, my worries relate not so much to the system that the Government will resource, or to training—although it is important—as to local government's failure to honour its commitment to the democratic process. For too long, local government has tried to get away with conducting the democratic process—that is, elections and the preparation of electoral registers—on the cheap.

We are about to embark on a new system, which the public will have to understand. I am sure that they will embrace it with enthusiasm, and will come to regard it as the system on which they would want all elections to be based. At such a time, it is important that local government—which has a responsibility to furnish up-to-date registers of electors, to inform the public and to run elections properly—is given the resources to enable it to fulfil that responsibility, so that it cannot make the excuse that mistakes were the Government's responsibility.

I listened carefully to what the Minister said about the training for which he would be responsible. Part of that responsibility must be pushed down to local government level, but it must be accompanied by sufficient resources. I should like an assurance—

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Does the hon. Gentleman consider that he is being rather broad-brush in his criticism? My local authority, Stroud district council, puts a great deal of resources and time into training and informing representatives and agents on how the election process will work. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that there is good practice in local government, and that it needs to be promoted.

Mr. Hancock: I entirely agree, and I sympathise with other hon. Members who have had bad experiences in elections. I know from first-hand experience over 30 years of the frustration of the person whose name is not on the electoral register—the person who takes time and trouble to inform the local authority that they live at a specific address, only to find that nothing is done about putting their name on the register. Too many such examples exist, but I welcome the hon. Gentleman's intervention in pointing out the good practice.

However, I seek a real assurance from the Minister that the training will not be confined to one level—that it will go right down the system, so that everyone involved in the elections has a fundamental grasp of what is expected of them. If that is done, we shall have, in 15 months' time, a successful new episode in the practice of democracy in our country, of which we can all be proud.

Mr. George Howarth: I shall try to cover as many as possible of the issues that have been mentioned.

In answer to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), we are consulting those responsible, both at chief executive level and electoral administrator level, and I believe that any difficulties that they have will be resolved. I am confident that, given their professionalism and the consultation exercise that is taking place, we can resolve some of the difficulties.

I was just trying to calculate how many elections I have stood in. I must have stood in fewer elections than the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South, but I have probably stood in about 12 or 14, at two levels—local authority and parliamentary. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I have been fortunate, in that I have never failed to be elected. However, I concede that, in the seats for which I stood, there was little chance of any other result.

I should correct a false impression that I may have given the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison). I said, wrongly, that the counts would be carried out at constituency level. In fact, the intention is that they will be carried out at local authority level. I apologise for that and set the record straight.

On the role and responsibilities of agents, which was raised by the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), there will be a single agent per list. That is the only way of resolving the problem. Although, as the hon. Gentleman says, it will be a more complicated role than that of an agent on a single constituency level, it will be better to have one agent per region for the list than to fragment the region into a number of constituencies.

Mr. Syms: I am glad to hear what the Minister says. It would be more sensible to have one agent for the entire region, but there are a number of wrangles and difficulties. What happens when a minor party—an odd and a sod—wants a recount of a whole region? Such questions must be sorted out in more detail. Under current law, there is considerable precedent—thick files of "Parker's Election Laws" and so on—to which one can turn. We are in a new ball game with the proposed system. The Government and others must get together to get the ground rules right.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that there are established procedures for requesting a recount, for example. It will be the responsibility, technically, of the agent to demonstrate to the returning officer or his or her representative that the required threshold exists to justify such a request. That could be done by the agent for the list in a region or by the agent for an individual named candidate on the ballot paper. Such details will be discussed in the training that we propose. I am confident that the i's can be dotted and the t's crossed in those details.

To answer the hon. Gentleman's further question, it will still be the agent's responsibility to ensure that he controls his party's electoral expenditure within the legal and agreed limits. All of that will be covered in regulations under schedule 2, which amends schedule 1 to the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978.

Whether intentionally or not, this has been a useful debate. We have covered various nuts-and-bolts issues, so perhaps the system will be better understood. I hope that as a result of those reassurances, the hon. Member for Hertsmere will consider it prudent to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Clappison: I am grateful to the Minister for the spirit in which he responded to the debate, which was introduced as a serious matter and which, as he says, has proved useful. I was slightly surprised by the partisan comments from some quarters, in view of the reasonably non-partisan way in which I introduced the new clause.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) referred in an intervention to the degree of understanding of the system on the part of various hon. Members. I did not say that I do not understand it—I never professed to do so. I said that the Home Secretary had got it wrong and made a mistake.

If the hon. Gentleman was present earlier in the Committee's proceedings, he will have heard the Home Secretary commendably and frankly acknowledge that he had been mistaken in what he told the House on Second Reading about the basis of the system. I do not think that the Under-Secretary will be particularly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter because, as I recollect, it was the Under-Secretary who had to put the record straight in a written answer after the Home Secretary got it wrong. I do not think that he will thank the hon. Gentleman for that reminder.

I have one other piece of advice for the Minister. He should not listen too closely to Liberal Democrat Members. They seem to be in an awful rush to enact the Bill. We think that in this case undue haste would be the midwife of chaos, which is the last thing that we want. We want a system that upholds our valued traditions of efficiently conducted elections, which hon. Members in all parts of the House will value. That is the spirit in which we tabled the two new clauses.

I put numerous questions to the Minister. They were serious questions, as he recognises. I should be grateful if he would reply to me in writing on the matters that he did not cover in his response to the debate. In that spirit, and in order not to delay the Committee, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1

New Schedule 2 to the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 6, line 6, leave out '6' and insert '7'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 60, in page 6, line 10, column 2, at end insert—

'County of North East Lincolnshire
County of North Lincolnshire'.

No. 61, in page 6, line 27, column 1, leave out 'East'.

No. 63, in page 6, line 27, column 2, at beginning insert—

'County of Cumbria'.

No. 62, in page 6, line 27, column 3, leave out '4' and insert '5'.

Government amendment No. 30.

No. 64, in page 6, line 35, column 3, leave out '10' and insert '9'.

No. 65, in page 6, line 38, column 2, leave out 'County of Cumbria'.

Government amendments Nos. 31 and 32.

No. 66, in page 7, line 38, column 1, leave out '& The Humber'.

No. 67, in page 7, leave out lines 42 and 43.

Mr. Greenway: This group of amendments provides the Committee with a further opportunity to reflect on the proposed electoral regions in the scheme proposed by the Bill and to question again whether they are the most appropriate.

I begin with a simple question: how does anyone know? There has been no public consultation, no White Paper, no review by the boundary commission. As I reminded the Committee in an earlier debate on the number of electoral regions, the involvement of the boundary commission was thought so important by the Prime Minister when he was shadow Home Secretary that, when the House considered those matters, the then Opposition would not support the creation of additional constituencies for the European Parliament in the United Kingdom. If the involvement of the boundary commission were so important then, why is it not necessary to consult the boundary commission now?

It is conceivable that some parts of England, especially, may have been placed in the wrong region. Our argument this evening is about not size, but the regional boundaries. The Minister, like the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), on a previous occasion in Committee, will no doubt tell us that the regions chosen by the Government are in effect the regions of the Government offices, which were introduced by the previous Government. However, it was not proposed that those regions should become electoral regions for the European Parliament. The previous Government's view is not a mandate for the imposition of the map for electoral purposes. There could be numerous examples of inappropriate boundaries. In the amendments, we have selected two examples.

The first concerns North and North East Lincolnshire. As a result of local government boundary commission changes, we have got rid of the county of Humberside and we have a unitary authority containing both North Lincolnshire and North East Lincolnshire, and Lincolnshire county council. Why is it appropriate to keep North and North East Lincolnshire with Yorkshire and to call that region Yorkshire and The Humber, and not to put North and North East Lincolnshire in with the rest of Lincolnshire, where we believe it would be more appropriately placed?

In an earlier debate, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) even questioned whether Lincolnshire ought to be in the East Midlands, and whether it should more appropriately be placed in the Eastern England electoral region. One can understand why. It is a largely rural county, which would be better placed with rural counties such as Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire.

We think—I ask the Minister seriously to consider this—that, having got rid of a boundary for local government, reinstating that boundary for the electoral regions for the European Parliament is bound to cause confusion in the minds of electors. That confusion will be all the greater because North East Lincolnshire, especially, is part of the Lincolnshire and Humberside South European parliamentary constituency. The MEP who represents those areas now will not be able to represent all of them in future, if she is successful in the election, because some of them will be in Yorkshire.

My second example relates to Cumbria. It is valid to ask whether Cumbria should be in the North West or the North East. Given Government statistical regions in the past, Cumbria has always been linked with Northumbria and Durham as part of the north. Indeed, Cumbria forms part of the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority.

5 pm

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): Not true.

Mr. Greenway: Before the debate took place, I took the opportunity of telephoning the office of the chairman of the authority on that point.

Mr. Hutton: If the hon. Gentleman had done his homework, he would realise that the south of the county, in the area which I represent, is part of the North West regional health authority.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman is right in that a tiny part of south Cumbria is in the North West RHA, but the major part of Cumbria, certainly in geographical terms, is in the Northern and Yorkshire RHA. Those boundaries do not reflect many other parts of public life such as the provision of water services, electricity and other energy supplies. As we discovered in a recent debate, there are media boundaries. Cumbria is covered by BBC North.

Mr. Hutton: Not true.

Mr. Greenway: It is true.

Mr. Hutton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: No. I am not giving way. We want to make progress. Again, one has checked this out.

The Government have made no attempt to discover local preference. How does anyone know where Cumbria would prefer to be in the proposed electoral regions? No one was asked. What if the Government, decide to change the regional boundaries? How many people, even in Cumbria, know what is happening? As I have said, there has been no consultation. That is a major deficiency in the Bill.

I presume that the Minister will speak to Government amendments Nos. 30 to 32. The amendments reflect some drafting deficiencies. I suspect that the problems with Sussex and Telford and The Wrekin are understandable, but it is rather surprising to find that the Home Secretary's local authority boundary—Blackburn with Darwen—is shown in the Bill as Blackburn. The right hon. Gentleman appears not to know the name of his local authority, or perhaps his departmental officials did not know.

There are serious shortcomings in the Bill, which we have sought to address by tabling amendments. There has been no consultation on boundaries and the boundary commission has not been involved. There is no provision for review and—

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I am intrigued. I have listened carefully and I yield to no one in my ignorance of the north-west. However, to what degree has the hon. Gentleman consulted the people of Cumbria before prescribing a different system from that which he prescribed when in government for the regional offices?

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman makes my point for me. There has been no consultation by anyone. The hon. Gentleman says that the Opposition should have consulted, but right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Benches are the Government. There should have been a boundary commission review. There is not even any provision for such a review after the first elections take place next year. Nothing in the Bill provides a mechanism for change. For that reason, we believe that it is correct—

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): The hon. Gentleman has told us why he believes that the regions that have been chosen may be inappropriate. Does he accept that, for the purposes of European parliamentary elections—as far as I am aware, those elections are what the Bill is about—it could be relevant to match those boundaries with the regions that are responsible for the distribution of European funds?

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman has anticipated me. The Government have imposed regions upon us but have failed to give the Committee proper justification for the regional electoral boundaries that are set out in the schedule and elsewhere. Furthermore, the Minister of State, Home Office did not give a satisfactory answer when the Committee discussed those matters previously.

The Under-Secretary has a new opportunity to offer the Committee a more convincing explanation. In particular, we invite the hon. Gentleman to tell the Committee why he thinks that North and North East Lincolnshire should be part of Yorkshire and why Cumbria should be in the North West region and not in the North East. As far as we are aware, there has been no consultation with voters in those areas. I cannot recall any previous occasion when such electoral boundaries were imposed by Government diktat without proper public consultation.

Mr. Hutton: I wish to correct the misapprehension under which the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) is clearly labouring, about Cumbria and its position in the United Kingdom. It is not true, as I tried to tell him, that Cumbria is regulated by the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority. Neither is it true that only a "tiny part" of Cumbria, to use the hon. Gentleman's words, is outside the Northern and Yorkshire RHA. Instead, we are talking about two parliamentary constituencies. As the hon. Gentleman will know, representing as he does one of the largest constituencies in the United Kingdom, those two constituencies cannot be described as representing a tiny geographical area.

Neither is it true that Cumbria is part of the northern region in terms of its utilities. My constituency and the constituency of the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) receive water from North West Water, and we receive electricity from the North Western electricity board, both of which are north-west-based utility companies. It is clear that the hon. Member for Ryedale has not done his homework satisfactorily. That undermines some of his arguments.

The hon. Gentleman's amendments are misguided and inappropriate for Cumbria, for two principal reasons. The hon. Gentleman implied that it is the Conservative view that Cumbria should be part of the North East. That assumes that there is a consensus in Cumbria about which region we should be in, whether the North West or the North East. There is no such consensus in Cumbria, and certainly not in my constituency. I suspect that that is the position in some of the constituencies of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends in Cumbria, whose support for the amendments has been noticeably absent.

The hon. Gentleman has done something of a disservice to his argument in criticising the Government for lack of consultation when the Conservative party has undertaken no such consultation of its own. The Opposition, without any consultation, propose that a county should be moved from one region to another. That is superficial and unhelpful.

For another reason, the amendments are mistaken. They are divisive and they rake over previous ground when no useful purpose can be served by so doing.

A decision must be taken. As I have said, my remarks are directed to Cumbria and not other parts of the United Kingdom. It is clear that the Government had to take a decision on the region to which Cumbria should belong. It is worth saying, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), that, when it comes to European issues and the Government office of the north west—of which, under the Conservative Government, Cumbria formed a part, it being part of that office's remit—Cumbria is part of the north-west as a whole. Notwithstanding the sensitivities of other areas of Cumbria, there is a strong rational case for Cumbria to be in the North West region.

The amendments are unhelpful and do not serve a useful purpose. They rake over ground where a decision has had to be taken. Worse than that, they distract attention in Cumbria, and in the north-west as a whole, from the future. There is no doubt—look at how regional development agencies and the European Union are evolving—that the best way for Cumbria to have an effective voice in Europe, Parliament and elsewhere is for Cumbrian MEPs to be part of the North West region. That is my view. It is also the strong view of my constituents. If the amendments are pressed to a vote, I look forward to voting against them.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said that there was confusion in the Government's mind when they drafted schedule 1, and referred to Government amendment. No. 32, which proposes to change the name of the county of The Wrekin to Telford and The Wrekin.

Before the Committee is invited to vote on the amendments, will the Minister say exactly what the Government have in mind for the county, because what is proposed is confusing? The original proposal to refer to The Wrekin as a county under the electoral arrangements was intelligible in the sense that The Wrekin district council will, on 1 April, become a unitary authority. However, the situation is further confused. If the Minister proposes to call the new county Telford and The Wrekin, he must bear it in mind that the name "The Wrekin" also applies to a Westminster parliamentary constituency. Notwithstanding the fact that The Wrekin district council becomes a unitary authority on 1 April, the parliamentary constituency of The Wrekin will remain part of the administrative area of the county of Shropshire. One would have thought that the original terminology was probably correct. The proposed amendment will simply add to the confusion.

The people of Shropshire who live in the parliamentary constituency of The Wrekin believe that they are, for administrative purposes, in the county of Shropshire. If the amendment is passed, the people living in the parliamentary constituency of The Wrekin will be very confused indeed.

Can the Minister clarify exactly what was in his mind when he proposed the amendment?

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I have followed the debate with particular interest, and some care. I am not surprised that hon. Members disagree severely about the relative proportionality of d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague, about modifying Sainte-Lague and so on. I am fascinated to discover that the Committee can disagree over which television stations people in Cumbria watch, and which health authorities cover which areas. The regional boundaries that the Government are trying to draw—for electoral purposes in particular, and therefore for purposes of identification—are inevitably artificial.

The hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) said that decisions have to be made. If the best that can be said is, "You have to define a boundary, so you have to take a decision," that tells us that the definitions in the Government's amendments are artificial, open to controversy and therefore open to improvement, as proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway).

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I am confused about the Conservatives' position on Cumbria. The two Conservative MPs for Cumbria support the North West. My own feeling is that the Conservative party's amendment has been moved for political gain. The Conservatives believe that they will gain seats by putting Cumbria in the North East.

5.15 pm

Mr. Green: I should not wish to comment on the motives of my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) in moving the amendment, except to say that they would have been for the best. If the hon. Gentleman disagrees with his hon. Friends on the Government Benches, that merely illustrates my point that the Government are confused. They are not sure where all parts of Cumbria properly belong. Any division that they try to draw is inherently artificial. Therefore, the regions have no validity.

The amendments illustrate a wider point. If the Government are seeking to introduce a proportional system for the elections and are getting into such trouble in defining the regions—not just their size but the boundaries—I am not sure why they did not start with a national list system. If they want a fully proportional system, that is available through national lists. The Government destroyed the constituency link anyway, so they may as well have a national list. The Government could have avoided the problems that they have caused themselves through those inadequate boundaries. Indeed, it would be easier to preserve proportionality, if the Government regard that as all-important, with a national rather than a regional list. I should welcome the Minister's comments on why the Government did not accept the logic of their own position. Although Opposition Members would not accept it, perhaps the Government should have done so.

Of all the points raised so far, possibly the weakest is that the Government's lack of consultation in creating regional boundaries is justified because the Opposition did not consult before tabling the amendments. Apart from the naivety of suggesting that, with the full resources available to the Government, which allow them to consult, there is an equivalent responsibility on the Opposition parties, we oppose the Bill. It is not our responsibility to make it perfect. We are trying, through the amendments, to make it slightly better than it is, but to suggest that every Opposition party should run its own consultation exercise on a bad Bill introduced by the Government is simply absurd. I hope that the Minister will not try to support that line of argument.

We also heard the argument that the regions are sensible because they broadly coincide with the regions covered by the Government offices, and that that will help MEPs to act on behalf of their constituents. That would be a logical argument had the Government preserved the constituency link. The idea that MEPs representing a wide region will act en bloc, across party, is absurd. In the South East, for example, much of the competition for European funds will be inside the region. They will not be looking only for money to go to a particular region. Distribution within the region will be equally important.

Mr. Syms: The Government have already crossed the regional boundaries, because the North West region covers Merseyside and the North West. They have already accepted the argument and are not keeping strictly to the regional boundaries.

Mr. Green: My hon. Friend is completely right. It is merely one more illustration of the fact that, even under the Government's terms, the Bill is defective.

I am simply attempting to address the points, which seem rather weak, made by hon. Members on the Government Benches. In practical terms, MEPs in the various regions will have to compete with each other if they have a constituency to represent, but they will not have a constituency. It will not be like existing MEPs, who, to some extent, try to replicate the job that we in the House do—represent the people of a particular area. The job of an MEP would be different if the constituency link were broken, so it is invalid to argue that electoral regions should coincide with regions covered by Government offices.

The Government's proposed system is deeply flawed. The amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale would improve the system slightly, but would not make it acceptable and democratic, and would not improve the job or the job description of MEPs. Nevertheless, I support them, because they would ameliorate some of schedule's worst effects.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said that confusion would be reduced if the lump of Humberside that lies south of the River Humber were taken out of the Yorkshire and The Humber region and put into another. Although Humberside was unpopular as a local government unit, it was recognised as an economic unit by the previous Government, who created the region of Yorkshire and Humberside. The hon. Gentleman's proposition does not make sense: taking a lump out of a region covered by a Government office would enhance confusion, not reduce it.

I would lend support, however, to the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there should be an independent review after the election, and hope that one will take place. Issues that arise during the election should be considered subsequently by an independent body, such as the boundary commission, but we are up against a deadline. The boundaries of the Government offices for the regions make most sense. Under the Bill, the North West and Merseyside regions have been merged—lumps were not taken out of one and put elsewhere, which would have caused a problem.

Comments were made about the fact that MEPs currently work en bloc, and it was suggested that they might work against each other. That would be disastrous, and we want the regions to be integral precisely to avoid that problem. We do not want half a dozen MEPs going off in different directions and losing European funds in the process: MEPs and their regional development agencies must speak with one voice to secure funds for the region.

Mr. Gill: People living in Gibraltar will be disappointed that my two amendments have not been selected for debate. They will think that the Minister has been leaned on by Foreign Office Ministers to ensure that the 18,000 people living there are not enfranchised for European Parliament elections.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I would not want the Minister to make any mention of which amendments have and have not been selected for debate.

Mr. George Howarth: I accept your ruling, Mr. Martin. The hon. Gentleman will have to find other ways in which to raise that matter, which has already been discussed.

The hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) let the cat out of the bag. Conservative Members have learnt nothing, and the public think that they are completely out of touch. It is no good the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) waving his hands in the air. It was silly of the hon. Gentleman to say that MEPs from the same region may not co-operate. In the House and in the European Parliament, Members of all parties co-operate for the good of their constituents. I hope that he did not mean what he said, and that he accepts that after the next election, MEPs, whatever party they represent and whatever list they have been on, will automatically work for the good of their communities, as we all do.

Mr. Green: My point was that the Government are breaking the constituency link. MPs work together because we have constituency interests, but breaking the constituency link will change that for the European Parliament.

Mr. Howarth: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has corrected the impression that he gave.

Mr. Gill: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: I shall give way when I have finished my point.The hon. Member for Ashford, perhaps inadvertently, created the clear impression that he did not expect MEPs from the same region to co-operate. If he is saying that he did not mean that, I accept it.

Mr. Gill rose—

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) rose—

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) rose—

Mr. Howarth: I am inundated with requests, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman first, because he was the first to ask.

Mr. Gill: The Minister said that MEPs will work hard for their constituents, as Westminster MPs do, but he has no grounds for saying that. What evidence has he that that will be the case, given that the close link between MEP and constituency will no longer exist? I invite the Minister to answer a question that has not been dealt with: how will the electorate get rid of an MEP whom they consider to be unsatisfactory? That has been within their gift, because they could organise constituency affairs to get rid of an MEP, which they will not be able to do under the list system.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Gentleman to go wide of the amendments. The question how to get rid of an elected representative has nothing to do with the group of amendments before the Committee.

Mr. Howarth: I am not clear what point the hon. Gentleman was trying to make that has not already been debated.

The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand that we are proposing a regional list system. We are not saying that such a system is the same as a constituency system. It will become more apparent as time goes on that Europe operates at a regional level, and that we should not pretend that cobbling together seven, eight or nine parliamentary constituencies will give an MEP a constituency that makes sense. The truth is that it is currently impossible for MEPs to represent the interests of individual constituents in the same way as Members of this House when their constituencies contain 500,000 people.

Miss McIntosh: I am concerned by the inferences that have been drawn from comments made to the Minister by my hon. Friends. Conservative Members are concerned that breaking the constituency link will have consequences for how future MEPs will behave. People who have been elected to Parliament or to the European

[Miss McIntosh]

Parliament, in which I have the honour to serve, have a code of conduct and etiquette. Representatives from other member states who are on the same side and of the same nationality have no constituency link and no code of behaviour. How will future MEPs work together without treading on each other's toes, and how will they behave towards the media and their own party?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady has direct experience of these matters, but I do not believe that we are letting loose on the country a horde of MEPs who are about to tear each other limb from limb. Whether they are elected from a list or as an independent, and whichever party they represent, those people will co-operate sensibly. I do not share the hon. Lady's gloom.

Mrs. May: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: Yes, but then I should make progress.

The First Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. Lady intervenes, I remind hon. Members that we are debating electoral regions. The amendments propose taking part of those regions out of the equation. Therefore, we would be going far too wide if we were to discuss the conduct of elected MEPs after the European elections.

5.30 pm

Mrs. May: I am grateful for your advice, Mr. Martin, and I shall endeavour to keep within the rules that you have just set out. Does the Minister accept that some of the electoral regions that will be created under the Bill are so large that there will be distinct differences within them? The South East, which will be represented by 11 MEPs, includes my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green). It is clear from the Government office for the south east that the region is so large that it will be difficult to represent every interest. For example, Kent and the Thames valley have different interests and Thames valley councils are increasingly working together rather than as part of the south-east. Does the Minister accept that that problem may arise?

Mr. Howarth: I shall return to that point, which was raised in a different way by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan).

It has already been explained to the Committee how the electoral regions provided for in the Bill came about. As has already been conceded, they are the regions that are served by the Government offices for the regions, with the single exception of Merseyside, which includes my constituency. Merseyside is too small to be a region on its own, so it has been combined with the North West. Some hon. Members may be aware of the origins of the exception for Merseyside, which would take too long to explain now.

When the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) was Secretary of State, he created a particular way in which to deal with the problems that existed in Merseyside at the time. The Government office for Merseyside developed from that. The regional development agencies that will be created by the Regional Development Agencies Bill, which has just completed its consideration in Committee, will have exactly the same regional boundaries. Many of the European issues will be dealt with by regional development agencies and there is a clear cross-interest in respect of matters concerning MEPs and regional development agencies.

We deliberately selected regions that were well known and well established so that there could be no suggestion that electoral boundaries were being manipulated for party advantage. Let me say to the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who skirted around the issue, that it was not appropriate for the boundary commission to decide the boundaries because they were already well established. The boundary commission has great expertise and does a very good job in trying to average out the size of constituencies, while reflecting the interests of different communities within constituencies. However, that is not an appropriate skill in these circumstances as we are dealing with a regional system.

The boundaries were established by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and confirmed by the Conservative Government in 1993. Conservative Members now allude to one or two anomalies that should be put right, particularly in Cumbria, Yorkshire and Humberside, but a great deal must have happened since 1993 for them to say that the entire system should be changed. I am confident that Cumbria will be well served as part of the North West electoral region.

Mr. Martlew: It should also be considered that Cumbria has never had its own MEP. It was always represented by the MEP for Cumbria and Lancashire, North, so there is probably some logic in my hon. Friend's argument. However, I would find it offensive if the same argument were used in respect of regional government as there is less enthusiasm for being part of the North West in the northern part of the county than in the southern part. In respect of Europe, we have always been connected to the north-west, but in respect of regional government and unitary authorities, the logical approach would be to include the north of the county in the north-east and the south of the county in the north-west.

Mr. Howarth: I can assure my hon. Friend that at this stage, I am not addressing what might happen in any future system of regional government. I recognise his knowledge, but no decisions have been made.

In respect of Cumbria, the argument put by the hon. Member for Ryedale was completely demolished by my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), who showed through his knowledge of his own part of the county the appropriateness of what is proposed rather than the Opposition's amendments. Similarly, I believe that people who live in North and North-East Lincolnshire will be well served as part of Yorkshire and The Humber. Although the county of Humberside no longer exists, over the years, and helped by the existence of the Humber bridge, close ties—both economic and otherwise—have been built up across the river. The experience of the Government offices for the regions has shown that Cumbria sits well in the North West region, while the region of Yorkshire and The Humber is well established.

The Opposition have argued that rural interests will not be represented properly in areas with large urban concentrations. In a proportional electoral system such as we are proposing in the Bill, all votes count. Targeting is no longer an appropriate campaign strategy. It is, therefore, in the interests of all parties, in order to maximise their vote across a region, to ensure that they achieve a geographical balance in the composition of their lists so that all parts of a region are equally represented. Similarly, once elected, MEPs simply cannot afford to neglect any part of their electorate.

Mr. Gill: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: No. The hon. Gentleman has spoken several times in the debate and I have already given way to him.

I have said that the regions in the Bill—including the North West, which encompasses Cumbria, and Yorkshire and The Humber—are the standard administrative regions used by the European Union for all manner of purposes. It therefore makes good sense to use the same regions for electing MEPs.

A number of hon. Members asked whether, at some point in future, it might be appropriate to reconsider the boundaries. That option is always open to Parliament, and if Parliament wished to do so after the application of the new procedures, it would not be out of the question. However, it would have to be on the basis that there was something wrong with the existing regions, and I do not believe that to be the case. There is no good case for departing from well-established existing boundaries, as Opposition Members accepted as recently as five years ago.

Finally, the three Government amendments are simple drafting amendments which make no substantive alteration to the Bill.

In answer to the point raised by the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), a number of newly created local authority areas have adopted new names. Perhaps I should point out, as the hon. Gentleman may not be aware of it, that The Wrekin has decided to change its name to Telford and The Wrekin, and for that reason, we have tabled an amendment to the schedule. We are merely reflecting a decision that has been made locally. We have consistently used in the Bill the names that are used or are about to be used in the local authority areas.

Mrs. May: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Howarth: I will give way briefly, but I want to make progress.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the Minister; I have a very brief point. I hope that he will not forget the question that I asked earlier. I have been listening hard and I do not think that he has responded. Does he accept that large regions, such as the South East, will have diverse interests in their different parts? That may be a problem for Members of the European Parliament trying to represent the whole region.

Mr. Howarth: I have covered that point in two ways. First, it is possible for elected representatives to represent the diverse interests of a region. Our constituencies show that. There is a substantial rural part of my constituency as well as a highly urban area. Secondly, it is open to Parliament to revisit the issue, although I do not think that that will be necessary for some time.

I am sure that the Committee will have no difficulty in accepting Government amendments Nos. 30, 31 and 32. I do not intend to detain us any further on that. I urge the Committee to reject amendments Nos. 59 to 67.

Mr. Greenway: I assure the Committee that we had no intention of being divisive when tabling our amendments. The purpose was to question and test the evidence of popular support for the regional boundaries and their appropriateness. The debate has shown that they are artificial and that at the margins there is no consensus.

Mr. Hutton: The Conservatives imposed them.

Mr. Greenway: Yes, but we did so for a different reason from that in the Bill. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) put his finger on the issue. There is a lack of consensus in various sub-regions about which region they belong to. If the Government accept the regional boundaries that we proposed for a wholly different reason—the setting up of regional offices—and say that they are cast in tablets of stone, not just for European elections, but for regional development agencies and, eventually, regional government, without the opportunity for a proper review, we shall continue to oppose them. Proper consultation is needed.

Given that the hour is pressing, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 30, in page 6, line 35, after 'Blackburn' insert 'with Darwen'.

No. 31, in page 7, line 21, leave out 'West'.

No. 32, in page 7, line 36, leave out 'The' and insert 'Telford and'.—[Mr. George Howarth.]

Schedule 1, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 2

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS OF SCHEDULE 1 TO THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT 1978

Amendment proposed: No. 33, in page 8, line 15, leave out 'candidates' and parties''.—[Mr. George Howarth.]

5.45 pm

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 25, in page 8, line 15, leave out 'and parties''.

Government amendment No. 34.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): I had assumed that the Minister would speak to the amendment. It would be helpful if we could start by hearing the Government's rationale for the amendment. I should be happy to respond to that.

The First Deputy Chairman: So that everyone knows that the Chairman is acting properly, I should explain that anyone is entitled to move an amendment formally.

[The First Deputy Chairman]

That is up to them. I have called the right hon. Gentleman. He can make his case if he wants to. It is up to him.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: If the Government are moving the amendment formally, this is the most disgraceful part of the debate.

Mr. George Howarth: I shall reply.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: It would be more helpful if the Minister made his speech now.

Mr. Howarth: I took it from the remarks of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) a few minutes ago that he wanted to make progress and that we could move forward. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to debate the amendment, that is fine. I had assumed that the Conservatives wanted to make progress.

The right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to give notice of his intention to speak on the amendment. Government amendments Nos. 33 and 34 are intended to clarify the original intention of the paragraph, which was to give the power to make regulations to extend the imposition of a limit on parties' national expenditure on European elections.

The European Court of Human Rights gave a judgment recently on a complaint by Mrs. Phyllis Bowman that legislation covering expenditure by third parties at elections infringes the right to freedom of speech under the European convention on human rights. The court found that section 75 of the Representation of the People Act 1983 restricted Mrs. Bowman's freedom of speech and was therefore in breach of article 10 of the convention.

The Government are considering the implications of the judgment carefully. It is a difficult area of electoral practice. We have asked the Committee on Standards in Public Life, chaired by Lord Neill of Blaydon, to look at that aspect of election funding in its wider review of party funding. We shall wait for the committee's view before taking any action on the judgment. In the meantime, the existing provisions of law continue to apply.

The amendments relate to the power to make regulations about the limitation of candidates' and parties' election expenses. Under the regional list system proposed in the Bill, the existing limitations on candidates' expenditure in constituencies cannot apply meaningfully. The electorate are being asked to vote for parties rather than an individual candidate, except in the case of independent candidates. We need to consider whether there should be limitations on expenditure and, if so, how they should be handled. It may be necessary to limit the expenditure by candidates and that by parties. Amendment No. 25 would restrict the regulation-making power to limit expenditure by candidates only. In the context of a regional list system, the limitation of candidates' expenditure alone is insufficient. I therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman not to press his amendment.

The Neill committee might recommend national limits on expenditure by political parties. If so, the House will have to consider that recommendation. In those circumstances, the regulations could be used to implement that proposal in relation to European elections.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am grateful to the Minister; that helps to start the debate.

It is a matter of record that, in the time that I have had this job and although, occasionally, the temperature across the Dispatch Box has risen ever so slightly, I have never been personal in my comments. I mean no disrespect to the Minister, but we find ourselves in the most serious situation and it is quite unacceptable that the Home Secretary is not speaking on this group of amendments. The Minister read his brief, but the seriousness of the situation in which we find ourselves might not be as apparent to some as he and I know it to be.

Not only did I write to the Home Secretary when the European Court of Human Rights decision was announced two weeks ago; I pointed out in Committee last week that we would be looking for a preliminary response from the Government. We are doing so not because we are seeking, in two weeks, to pin the Government to some definitive response to the judgment—I think that I know enough about it to share the Minister's view that the Government find themselves in a complicated and difficult situation—but because whatever decision emerges is highly relevant to the Bill, particularly the Government amendments. We tabled our amendment, in part, as a probing amendment to find out exactly what the Government intend. I shall talk generally about the Government amendments rather than specifically seek to defend ours.

When the Minister speaks again—if he catches your eye, Mr. Martin—I should be grateful if he will explain the phrase "a general election" in Government amendment No. 34. Those words have a particular connotation in this House and this country. I do not find them defined in the Bill in any way other than the conventional way yet, in the context of the Bill, we shall not be having a general election.

Mr. George Howarth: To clear up that point, "a general election" is a general European Parliament election.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: That is what I assumed the hon. Gentleman meant. I was—I think, helpfully—trying to point out that there is confusion about the phrase because it normally means something else in this country. Since the phrase is not defined in the Bill in the way in which the hon. Gentleman has just defined it, it would be helpful if he withdrew the amendment and, on Report, made clear what the words "a general election" mean in the context of the Bill.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the phrase "a general election" has always meant nothing more and nothing less than the opposite of a by-election? Local or European elections can be general if they are not by-elections. The term does not define only Westminster elections.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The Minister understands the point that I am making and the spirit in which I am making it. If the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) does not mind, I shall not get into a semantic discussion.

Mrs. May: Is my right hon. Friend concerned, as I am, about amendment No. 35, which was not selected for debate—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Lady mentioned an amendment that has not been selected. She should not do that type of thing.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I shall not follow my hon. Friend down that road.

We have no sense from the Minister's speech that the Government have the first idea of what they will put in place for the funding of European elections at a constituency and candidate level. There was nothing in his speech that indicated whether there might be limits, or whether such limits would be on parties at a regional level or on individual candidates on the list. There was nothing in his speech that indicated whether there would be any relationship between the amount of money that a registered party—we do not know what that means—could spend in a region compared with what could be spent by an independent candidate in that region.

The Minister and his right hon. and hon. Friends have spent some time stressing the fact that the Bill breaks the link between MEPs and their constituencies. The list system will be run from the centre and, as we established last week, much more undemocratically in the Labour party than in the other two parties. We have heard nothing of how the Minister envisages controlling expenditure from the centre at a regional or individual level. This is the worst example of the Government approach: "Trust us; we will come back with the regulation. We will give you an hour and a half to debate it and, with our majority, we will push it through."

Unacceptable as all that is, it pales into insignificance beside the Bowman decision. It might be for the convenience of the Committee if I remind it exactly what that case is all about. In the 1992 general election, as my memory serves me, Mrs. Phyllis Bowman, a senior executive of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children, had printed 25,000 leaflets setting out the views on abortion of the three main party candidates in the Halifax constituency. Given Mrs. Bowman's point of view—I shall be neutral and non-inflammatory—the record of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) was less attractive than those of the other two candidates. The leaflets were not effective, since the hon. Lady was re-elected.

Mrs. Bowman was taken to court, found guilty and prosecuted, and eventually appealed to the European Court of Human Rights on the ground that her freedom of expression, as guaranteed in article 10 of the European convention on human rights, had been transgressed. Two weeks ago, the European Court found in Mrs. Bowman's favour. It ruled that her freedom of expression under article 10 had been transgressed and it would appear that the part of our national law that stipulates that any individual cannot spend more than £5 promoting a person's candidacy in an election particularly upset the court.

The significance of the ruling should be understood. Expenditure on elections in our system—which was touched on earlier, not least in the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms)—is controlled by a legally enshrined agent. We have had a ceiling on constituency expenditure, which was possible because expenditure was funnelled down one channel. Individual expenditure up to a limit of £5 was thought to be de minimis and therefore not influential.

In effect, the decision of the European Court on Human Rights is that anyone can spend any amount of money in promoting or denigrating any candidate. That is open sesame—it destroys the basis on which we have funded elections in this country thus far.

During the Second Reading debate of the Human Rights Bill, the Government were generous in recognising that when the European Court of Human Rights had found against British law, Conservative Governments had always moved to change the law of the land. That generosity was appreciated and remarked upon at the time—indeed, it was true of previous Labour Governments also. We now find ourselves with a European Court decision, based on article 10—which is the subject of heated discussion in Committee on another major constitutional Bill—which says, in effect, that British law is no longer appropriate.

I heard what the Minister said—in the meantime British law remains as it is. Technically, that is true, but in practice it is not. If the Minister were to spend his hard-earned money on promoting the candidacy of someone at the local elections in just eight weeks' time—or on denigrating an old Labour candidate—he knows that he would not be taken to court, even though he had, prima facie, broken the law of the land. He knows that the European Court would nod his appeal through because it has dealt with the Bowman case.

In practice, if not in theory, we have no law governing expenditure at a constituency or regional level. The Bill does not address that point. What is worse, the Minister says that the matter will be referred to the Neill committee, but that committee's deliberations on the capping of party expenditure will be irrelevant until the Government decide what they will do to close the loophole.

If, for example, the Neill committee said that, at a general election, no party should spend more than the Labour party spent centrally at the last general election—£26 million—that would be irrelevant; anybody could add their expenditure in any constituency in the country in support of or to denigrate any candidate. There is nothing the Neill committee or the House can achieve other than by primary legislation. I mention primary legislation because the amendments and the schedule deal with regulation. The Minister and I will agree that we cannot address the consequences of the European Court's judgment by regulation.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that we cannot even address the matter by primary legislation? Our primary legislation must conform to the ruling of the court. The ruling in the Bowman case is simple—anyone can spend anything at an election. No matter what we do—by legislation or regulation—it will be pointless.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: That is a good question, because it goes to the heart of what we are discussing. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman is right. He might be right.

Mr. Syms: He is nodding.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Poole that I have been in the House with the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) for long enough to treat his legal judgments with great consideration. His batting record is reasonable by any lawyer's standards, but I am not sure that he is right because the judgment drew attention to the £5 limit.

For example, the Government might decide to change £5 to £1,000 and be willing to have that tested in the European Court. The consequences would blow a hole in our electoral system. If the hon. Gentleman and half a dozen of his friends decided to spend £1,000 each in the next-door constituency, that would have a profound effect on the election. They would, in effect, be spending virtually as much as the official expenditure channelled through the agent in the constituency.

Mr. Bermingham: The Bowman decision said that £5 was de minimis and ridiculous, but if one reads the judgment carefully, one sees that it goes further. In addition, it was a judgment of the full court, which makes it even more difficult to deal with. It says that a person is "entitled to spend"—it does not say that there should be a reasonable limit. That is why I advance the premise that we cannot alter the judgment, either by primary legislation or by regulation.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I have acknowledged that the hon. Gentleman might be right. I find it encouraging that we agree on the fundamental nature of the decision and on the coach and horses to be driven through our electoral law.

We are being asked to agree to two Government amendments that we do not find attractive. The Government want to come back to the matter later. The amendments are a cover because the Government have no idea what they should do and no idea of what the limits should be. They have no idea whether list candidates should spend money and, if so, how much. The Government have no idea what system to have in the first place, and they will not decide until Monday. They do not know how to deal with the issue of expenses. The Government are saying that we should touch the forelock and trust the Home Secretary and that that will be sufficient. It will not be sufficient. That is an unacceptable way to proceed in a constitutional Bill and it is made worse by the Bowman decision.

So that no one is in any doubt, the decision means that any vested interest group can target candidates—Labour and Conservative regional list candidates, Members of Parliament and local councillors. Any Member of Parliament who is on the wrong side of a vested interest group—perhaps for the best of reasons, and even if those reasons are supported by 99 per cent. of the constituents he has been elected to serve—can, because of the Bowman decision, be targeted financially. We saw what a rich man tried to do at the last election. A very rich man can decide to spend an awful lot of money in targeted seats to affect the outcome of the democratic process. A trade union might decide to target Tory Members of Parliament, if history is anything to go by.

The Government amendments have not begun to address the problem. They do not know what they are talking about. I felt sorry for the Minister when he was reading his brief because he knows that nobody sitting in the Box can come to his aid with any substantive information on the amendments. They are all quality civil servants, but they do not have a clue—because Ministers do not have a clue.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Minister is responsible for his brief.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I understand that, Mr. Martin. I was trying to pay a compliment, but I recognise that no one but hon. Members exists and so I shall talk only about the Minister. He does not know and I do not blame him—well, I do in one sense because before bringing this constitutional measure to the Committee he should at least have had some understanding of how the elections were to be financed, but he does not. He has no idea as to the division between the candidate, the regional list and the centre. In this case, it is not his fault, but the whole subject has been blown wide open by the European Court decision.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The right hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the difficulties that the Bowman judgment presents for our electoral law and the possibility of candidates being targeted by various different causes, but I hope that he recognises and will make it clear that the amendments clarify provisions that would enable a national limit to be set, thus preventing parties buying elections with substantial national expenditure. Does he accept the principle that there should be a national limit?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The right hon. Gentleman does not understand the Bowman decision. There is no such thing as a cap on national spending any more, whatever the Neill committee, the Government or this Committee might decide. For example, the Neill committee might say that the Government won the last election by spending £26 million nationally, so that will be the limit—that would scare the daylights out of the right hon. Gentleman's party—but it will be the limit only as regards a party's expenditure. There is no legal means of stopping anyone else in this Chamber spending more money on their own behalf to target the right hon. Gentleman or someone standing against him. He has not understood the significance of the Bowman decision.

We find ourselves faced with the most serious problem without the presence of the Home Secretary, or any response, despite the fact that we showed the courtesy of alerting the Home Office to the fact that we needed to have this debate. As I told the Minister, I am looking not for a definitive decision, but for some indication of how we might proceed. The hon. Gentleman and the Home Secretary might think that it would be worth consulting the other parties on this issue. I have always said that I am happy to meet the Home Secretary in those circumstances.

We will meet next week on Report. If the hon. Gentleman accepts my advice about amendment No. 34, which could be more felicitously amended, he could bring it back so amended to the House then and give us some early indication of the Government's thinking on this important issue.

Mr. George Howarth: The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), gave notice that he wanted to raise this issue. I would not want to minimise his concern, but, although he acknowledged one central fact in my earlier speech, he has not taken it fully into account.

Whatever else is happening as a result of the Bowman case—I shall refer to that in detail in a moment—in the meantime, the existing provisions of the law, section 75 of the Representation of the People Act 1983, continue to apply irrespective of whether we might need at some point to make regulations. So, unless and until it becomes apparent that regulations are necessary, that will be the case. It is not that there is nothing in existence—the existing provisions of electoral law are in place.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I said that, although the Minister was technically right to point out that that was the law of the land, in practice—I think I used the hon. Gentleman as an example—if he were to spend his money, illegally in terms of that legislation, the Committee knows that nothing would now happen to him. In practice, we have no limits, even though there is a law on the statute book and that is why the matter is of such urgency.

Mr. Howarth: The right hon. Gentleman is correct, and I am not trying to pretend that the Bowman judgment does not present difficulties: it does, and I shall describe what we are going to do about it. We are considering the implications of the judgment as it affects the areas of electoral practice that he mentioned.

In addition, the Committee on Standards in Public Life, chaired by Lord Neill, has been asked to study that aspect of election funding within the wider review of party funding that that committee has agreed to undertake. The important thing is that that review is under way. Obviously, the Bowman judgment needs to be fed into the process. No one could sensibly argue that that should not be the case. If an inquiry into party funding is under way, which has implications for election expenditure, it is sensible that the judgment and its implications should be fed into the process.

At the same time, we are taking advice on the implications, so I do not see that there is that urgency. In amendments Nos. 33 and 34, we are merely being prudent. I am not saying that we know for certain at this stage whether we will need to introduce regulations. Only when we have finished considering the matter in more detail and Lord Neill has had the opportunity to look into it, can we be certain about that.

6.15 pm

In those circumstances, it is prudent to put into the Bill a provision that would enable us to produce regulations. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire was kind enough to say that he did not think that we were involved in any conspiracy, and his arguments were reasonable. As he acknowledged, if we introduced regulations, they would have to be debated. It would be done not by the diktat of the Home Secretary or anyone else; it would be a matter for debate in the House.

If, as is often the case, consultation between the parties was necessary before the introduction of any regulations, I am sure that it would take place. The previous Government undertook such consultations, as did previous Labour Governments, and I would expect this Government to do so. The right hon. Gentleman says that the consultations should take place before the Bill comes back to the House on Report. I will pass that view on to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, but I think that, although a time will come when consultation will need to take place, it will not be before the Report stage.

The prudent move, which the amendments allow, is that we should have the scope to lay regulations if those should prove necessary as a result of the Neill committee and the advice that we will receive on the Bowman judgment. In the meantime, I am confident that the existing legal provisions apply.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the Minister also suggest to his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that Bowman is looked into carefully? Its scope may well need to be tested before the European Court before any regulations are laid that could make any sense and if Lord Justice Neill's inquiry is to have any meaning in the long term.

Mr. Howarth: I can assure my hon. Friend that the Bowman judgment is already being considered carefully. He makes an important point, but it has been covered.

In view of those matters, it is important that the ability to make those regulations should be within the scope of the Bill. Amendments Nos. 33 and 34 would help us with that.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Perhaps the Minister could have amendment No. 34 redrafted to make it clear what the words "a general election" mean.

Mr. Howarth: That is a fair point. As I said, in this context, they mean a European election. The term "general election" has usually meant any election that is not a by-election, as my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) pointed out. So the term applies to a general election for this Parliament and a general election for the European Parliament. Therefore, I do not think that it is necessary to clarify the amendment any further. That is an accepted principle, and that is why the amendment has been phrased in that way. With those comments, I hope that the Committee will support amendments Nos. 33 and 34 and that, if the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire thinks it appropriate, he will not press amendment No. 25.

Mr. Allan: The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) gave an apocalyptic view of the Bowman judgment. The judgment is significant, but we do not yet know whether it will be apocalyptic. It recognised the need to hold free elections—obviously, allowing a wealthy individual to buy a seat would contravene the principle of free elections.

The court considered whether the restrictions in the law that applied to Mrs. Bowman were proportionate to the effect that they produced. It made it clear that she was not promoting a specific candidate, but publishing information about all candidates. It also said that people who were pro-abortion might choose to vote, with the anti-abortionists, for the candidates she tried to highlight.

Mr. Bermingham: If the hon. Gentleman reads further, he will see that the judgment makes it clear that adverse or knocking copy can be electorally effective. We run the risk of going down the American road of black and negative advertising against both person and party.

Mr. Allan: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says. My point is that the courts will have further work to do in testing whether the Bowman judgment will cover a case in which, for example, the Minister—who is clearly a member of a party—spends significant sums promoting himself. I do not believe that we have yet reached such an apocalyptic position, although we have yet to hear the results of the Government's deliberations.

Another critical point is that the court, in justifying its judgment in the Bowman case, specifically referred to the fact that there were no restrictions on national or regional expenditure. Liberal Democrats are happy to support the Government amendments, as they would allow for regulations to limit national expenditure. We believe that such a limit has been a long time coming, and that it should be applied to all elections.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire did not refer to amendment No. 25, which he tabled. We believe that it would prevent the imposition of national limits, which is a disgraceful proposition, given the strong public support for them. Many people will ask why the Conservatives, with their record of dubious finance and heavy election spending, did not want parties' expenditure to be limited nationally.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: If the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) had been listening—I am grateful to the Minister, who seems to indicate his support before I have even made my point—he would have heard that I explained precisely what amendment No. 25 would do. As to his point about Bowman, those of us who have been in the House for some time have come to realise that it takes the Liberal Democrats a little longer to understand what is fairly obvious to the rest of us. His short speech underlined that point.

The Minister said that the Bowman case had been referred to Lord Neill, but the matter is not quasi-political—it does not require a cross-party decision on what would be an acceptable political framework. It is a fundamental legal question. I share the view of the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham). We find it difficult to envisage what the Government expect will emerge from the Neill committee on this issue.

Indeed, as I said, the consequence of Bowman is, in effect, to render null and void what emerges from the Neill committee's deliberations, unless and until the Government decide how to amend the law to bring it into line with the court judgment—that has always been the bipartisan tradition in this country. The Neill committee will then have the opportunity to decide what advice it should offer within that new legal framework. I do not expect the Minister to go into the matter now, but I want him to think about it and reflect to the Home Secretary hon. Members' sense of unease about the Government's response.

The Minister also said that there was no great need for urgency. I know that this is not the subject of the debate, so I shall not go into detail, but elections will take place throughout the country on 7 May, and it will be supposed that they will be subject to current law. We have established that that may be true in theory, but no longer necessarily in practice. I would have expected the Minister to think that that merited some urgency.

Again, I agree with the hon. Member for St. Helens, South—I hope that I am not ruining his reputation by agreeing with him so often—who made an important point. The scope and nature of the decision may have to be tested in the courts before hon. Members can form a view about what our response should be in terms of primary legislation. That will take time, and it will impinge on the European elections. Given the speed with which the European Court moves, it might even impinge on the next general election.

I assume that hon. Members will shortly consider in Committee the Human Rights Bill, at the heart of which this matter lies. Before we do that, it would help if the Government could give us some steer on the interrelationship between Bowman and the Human Rights Bill, as well as between Bowman and the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

Given that I have explained why we tabled amendment No. 25—the Minister heard and understood what I said, even if the Liberal Democrats did not—I am perfectly happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We are discussing amendment No. 33, which is a Government amendment.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: In that case, to be technical, if and when we come to amendment No. 25, we shall not press it further.

Mr. Linton: The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) said that amendment No. 25 was a probing amendment on the Bowman judgment. I think that we would all agree that it was necessary, as the judgment is currently the all-important issue in this area. Like him, I look forward to hearing the Government's response. I am not convinced that the right hon. Gentleman has identified what the final consequences will be. The £5 limit, for example, was an individual limit—it is not absolutely clear that, even if there were national limits, it would apply to third-party organisations.

My substantive point is that amendment No. 25 is not only a probing amendment—it would defend the status quo and an anomaly in law that allows the Conservative party to outspend every other party that is represented in the House. The "open sesame" to which the right hon. Gentleman referred already exists. Indeed, one could argue that it began more than 100 years ago, when legislation aimed at preventing corrupt and illegal practices in elections referred only to candidates, not to political parties.

Moreover, in the 1950s, a court decided that anyone could publicise political propaganda during an election provided that it did not refer to a particular candidate in a particular constituency. That judgment meant that a poster saying "Vote Conservative" did not count in terms of the limits, whereas one saying "Vote Bloggs, Conservative" did. That anomaly has allowed the Conservative party to spend without limit at every election since then.

The Liberal Democrats' record is not spotless, as in 1974 the Liberal party, as it was then, was the first to advertise in a newspaper during an election campaign, opening the anomaly even wider. Liberals have regretted setting that precedent ever since. I hope that they will support us in reversing the situation.

Under the status quo, which the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire wants to defend through amendment No. 25, we have the ridiculous situation in which spending on local campaigns, which are no more than a sideshow these days, is limited, but national spending is not.

6.30 pm

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting case for a limit on political parties being able to advertise in newspapers but not, presumably, for a limit on the amount that newspapers themselves can spend advancing a political cause. Is that perhaps because of Mr. Rupert Murdoch's shift of view during the general election campaign?

Mr. Linton: That does not figure at all in the Government's thinking or in mine.

At the general election, Conservative candidates spent £5 million, as they were limited by law, but the party itself spent £20 million, because there was no limit on that. It outspent the Labour party by about 3:2, and the Liberal Democrats by about 7:1. Conservatives have always denied that the anomaly exists; they did so in evidence to the Hansard Society and to the Home Affairs Select Committee.

The enormous anomaly is clear to every non-Conservative Member. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire is right to draw our attention to the Bowman judgment, but he surely cannot defend the existing anomaly.

Mr. Syms: Under the current electoral system, there is a clear division between what is spent in constituencies and what is spent nationally, for the sensible reason that most people who stand as candidates think that their vote will increase if they publish their name, photograph and personal details; so, in election campaigns, one can count the literature bearing the candidate's imprint and measure precisely what has been spent, whereas national expenditure is much more difficult to measure.

Under the regional list system—although we do not know the Government's final proposals—people will vote for one of the parties or for an independent. Most political advertising will by its nature be general rather than specific. In the South-East, for example, parties will probably not put all 11 of their candidates on every piece of literature, with their dogs and families. The literature will tend to say, "Vote Conservative", "Vote Labour" or "Vote Liberal".

Trying to control expenditure at a regional level will be a real problem. One will be able to identify the few leaflets that advertise specific candidates, and it will be relatively easy to tabulate the expenditure of the independents, but it will be extremely difficult to disaggregate regional from national expenditure and determine whether a regional agent is keeping within the limit.

At present, newspaper advertising and poster sites are excluded. Would spending on those have to come within the regional limit? How would one disaggregate the readership of the Daily Mail, for example, in the south-east, the west midlands or the north?

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman said that most advertising, and most voting, will be for a party rather than an individual candidate, and we feel that that strengthens the case for imposing limits on parties. He described some of the difficulties, but does he in principle think that those limits should exist?

Mr. Syms: Given the system under which we will have to operate, there will have to be a national limit. My principal point concerns how on earth we are to control a regional limit in a region the size of the South East, for example. How can we differentiate between national and regional spending?

It is perfectly easy to see who the candidates are, and what literature they have produced, in a single-member constituency, but what happens when someone in London hands out political leaflets to people getting on a train to Guildford? How do we disaggregate the expenditure? There has to be some limit somewhere, but the system chosen will be extremely difficult to operate.

Mr. Bermingham: The Bowman judgment is relevant not only to the European issue but to every form of election spending. That is my great worry. I do not want what happened with value added tax on second-hand cars—people were prosecuted and subsequently pardoned, simply because the European courts changed the law—to be replicated. I simply ask that we test what the Bowman judgment means, how broad it is, and what sums and persons it covers. Once we have done that, we will know how to frame our own legislation within the European law.

Mr. George Howarth: The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) said that he was not happy with the situation, but wanted to see how it developed and perhaps have a discussion at some point with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. He asked me to draw his observations to my right hon. Friend's attention. He knows my right hon. Friend quite well, as I do, and will know that he is an assiduous reader of everything that is put in front of him. I will draw the matter to his attention, but I am sure that he would have read the Hansard report thoroughly in any case.

We have had a useful debate on this difficult matter. Developments will have to take place. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) added one fresh point, to which I shall respond briefly. The matter is not as complicated as he makes out. If expenditure is limited to promoting a regional list or a candidate who wants to be a regional MEP, that would clearly be local expenditure, and would be covered by the relevant limits.

National spending limits are under consideration by the Neill committee, and I hope that we will find an agreed way of controlling such expenditure. The accounting might be more difficult than in a single constituency, but I honestly do not think that it will be impossible. Any regional agent should be able to resolve such a problem without too much difficulty.

I hope that the Committee will feel able to support amendments Nos. 33 and 34.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 34, in page 8, line 15, at end insert

'(including expenses incurred in relation to a general election as a whole)'.

No. 35, in page 8, line 18, leave out 'of MEPs'.— [Mr. George Howarth.]

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 8, line 31, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 18, in page 8, leave out lines 35 and 36.

No. 19, in page 8, line 41, at end insert—

'(c) the regulations shall require the name of each candidate to appear on the ballot paper.'.

Mr. Clappison: The amendments involve the important subject of by-elections, and we want it to be noted that we consider by-elections an important part of our political tradition from which we should not depart lightly. We need to know more about the Government's intentions. I cannot overlook the telling evidence of the manner in which the Government seek to deal with by-elections in the Bill.

The important subject of by-elections is buried in schedule 2 to the Bill, under the heading:

"Minor and consequential amendments of schedule 1 to the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978".

We regard the subject as far from minor, and its position in the Bill is telling evidence of the Government's chaotic approach. We need to know more about the contents of schedule 2. Apparently, regulations will have to be made to prescribe the procedure to be followed when a seat becomes vacant. Can the Minister give us some brief details of the proposed procedure? Will he spell out the "specified circumstances" mentioned in the schedule? We know a little about that subject from what the Home Secretary said on Second Reading, but the Minister should spell out the specified circumstances in which a by-election would be held.

We understand that it is the Government's intention that a vacancy will normally be filled by the next candidate on a party list, save in the case of the exhaustion of the list or the loss of an independent candidate. However, the Home Secretary said that that would depend on the next candidate on the list being eligible and willing. We need to know more, including the conditions that will determine whether a candidate is eligible and willing at the time of the by-election. Who will determine that? The regulations have yet to be made and the Bill gives no guidance. The Minister should tell the Committee more about that, because the Bill remains silent.

The amendments address an important subject, given the centralised control that the Bill will introduce and the power that it will give to the party machinery. Only this morning, my eye was caught by a headline in The Herald, which revealed that the Labour party intends to ban its troublesome, left-wing Scottish Members of Parliament, but I shall not pursue that point further. I can assure the Committee that I do not spend my time trawling through the newspapers looking for details of internal strife in the Labour party, but my eye was also caught by another headline that stated:

"What Derry's £59,000 could do for your walls".

I shall move swiftly on.

The amendments give the Government the opportunity to spell out how their alternatives to by-elections will work. We believe that by-elections have served this country well. They are a customary part of our political life and have had many desirable consequences for the quality and continuity of our representation in the European Parliament. The Government should tell the Committee more about their new system, instead of burying the subject in schedule 2.

Mr. Beith: Nobody loves European by-elections, least of all the electorate, who vote in extraordinarily low numbers. Under the proposed system, it seems sensible that the next person on the list should fill any vacancy that arises. I am reinforced in the view that nobody loves European by-elections by the fact that the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who is in her place, sees no urgent need to impose one on the electors of Essex, whom she represents in the European Parliament. She is not the first to decide that it would be unreasonable to impose a by-election on the electorate, and she has accepted the almost intolerable burden of representing at the same time the Vale of York in the House of Commons and Essex in the European Parliament. Given what hon. Members have said about the demands on Members of the European Parliament, that is a serious burden indeed. It is obvious that either she does not think that she should cause a by-election or Conservative central office has said, "For heaven's sake, don't make us have a by-election."

By-elections will have to be held in some circumstances, some of which are envisaged in the drafting of the Bill. For example, a party might run out of candidates on its list if it had won all the seats in a constituency, which might happen in one or two of the smaller constituencies. The Government may have not addressed the problem of someone leaving a party since being adopted to the list, either through expulsion—like the Lord Provost in Glasgow—or by voluntarily joining another party, as people do with increasing frequency these days. Some provision should be made for such circumstances, although few parties would be enthusiastic about invoking it, because it would increase the risk of legal proceedings on the expulsion of a candidate in the first place—the Labour party has much recent experience of such proceedings—and the party might not want to face the expense of a by-election. Certainly, most members of the public would think it ridiculous if someone could benefit from his position as next on a party's list, if he had chosen, openly and freely, to leave that party. However, in general, it would seem sensible to use the system set out in the Bill as the means of filling casual vacancies.

Miss McIntosh: I need not detain the Committee by explaining why it has not been deemed appropriate for me to cause a by-election. I merely point out that I follow a long and distinguished tradition, as the 19th Member of Parliament to have performed the onerous duties of dual representation. Indeed, many distinguished hon. Members who have found themselves in the same circumstances are now serving on the Front Benches.

We have seen the Home Secretary briefly this evening, but he is not present for the debate on these amendments. I hope that the Government will keep an open mind on continuing to hold by-elections. The same points that were made about the Government's choice of a closed rather than an open list, and about their rejection of the current system under which Members of the European Parliament are elected, are relevant. The purpose of a by-election is to maximise voter choice and to elect the candidate of the voters' choice at the time that the by-election is held. By-elections also test the popularity of the parties at the time, but the proposed system could reflect their position some three or four years earlier.

I do not have much sympathy with the argument made by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), that by-elections should not be held to save taxpayers' money, although that point greatly preyed on my mind in my own circumstances. The abolition of by-elections would have the same effect as the proposed closed list and give total control over decision making to the party hierarchies, not electors. I hope that the Government understand that Conservatives stand for democracy. We believe that the electors should decide, not party hierarchies. I hope that the Government will keep an open mind, especially on amendment No. 19, which would allow the name of each candidate to appear on the ballot paper. I hope that the Government will accept it.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): I support the amendments, because they draw attention to the profoundly undemocratic spirit of the Bill. The Home Secretary has spoken in unusually condescending and patronising terms of the electorate's inability to distinguish between candidates. He has said that ethnic minorities and women would be disadvantaged by anything other than a closed list system. However, those are deeply anti-democratic tendencies. If the Government chose not to hold a by-election, as provided for in schedule 2, they would compound the bad effects of a bad Bill.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) in pleading with the Minister to give the Committee some comfort and say that Ministers will keep an open mind. Those members of the public who are following these proceedings will see in the passage of the Bill a profoundly undemocratic process at work. Given Ministers' commitment to newness, modernity and democracy, I am sure that they will want to think again about the contents of schedule 2.

Mr. Gill: I rise to support amendment No. 18. If the two lines concerned are not removed from the Bill, this will be the most anti-democratic feature of a Bill already anti-democratic enough. The Committee fails to appreciate sufficiently that democracy in this country depends on people promoting others to represent them in the House of Commons or, in this case, the European Parliament. The Bill's statement that there may be circumstances in which vacancies will not be filled by election creates a dangerous precedent. The people are cut out of the equation altogether and the vacancies filled by the parties. That will lead inevitably to something that we have not seen in British politics before: corruption.

If the people do not have the ultimate sanction of voting out of office someone whom they regard as unsatisfactory or corrupt, such people cannot be removed. Under the schedule, it is possible for the parties continually to promote someone whom the electorate would not vote for because of such considerations. It is wrong that the electorate's opportunity to fill vacancies at by-elections will be removed in that way.

A vacancy may under these arrangements be filled by people whom the electorate have already rejected or who are unacceptable but who are parachuted in. That cuts across the spirit of our democracy. The voters must be the final arbiter in such matters, and the House and the parties must not remove that ability. This is a question not of the convenience of the House or politicians or of the convenience of and expense to parties but of allowing Britain's electors to retain their democratic right to be represented in whatever forum by people on whom they have had an opportunity to express some judgment. They should not have to be represented by someone on whom they have had no opportunity to express an opinion. The measure turns democracy on its head. It is anti-democratic and for that reason, I support the amendment.

Mr. Collins: In supporting the amendments, I note the extraordinary conversion of some parties on by-elections. I welcome the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) to the Committee. He won a famous by-election victory just over a year ago. He will remember in the first days of 1997 sitting alongside the present Deputy Prime Minister saying that it was a democratic abuse that the then Prime Minister had not called the by-election. The then Prime Minister went on to call it, but the party of the hon. Member for Wirral, South no longer favours by-elections.

Even more extraordinary was the proposition of the Liberal Democrats, who have bored the pants off the entire planet for the past 30 years about victories in council and parliamentary by-elections. They now say that they do not want by-elections to the European Parliament. We understand why: they have never won a European by-election and know that they never would. That is why they want to abolish them.

Mr. George Howarth: The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) and I have one thing in common: we have both fought by-elections. I was fortunate enough to win, and while it was unlikely that he could ever have won Bootle, he found another entry into the House.

Mr. Clappison: I fought it twice.

Mr. Howarth: Indeed, the hon. Gentleman fought it twice.

There is a fundamental misunderstanding, exemplified by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins). There is a difference between the utility of by-elections for this Parliament and their utility for the European Parliament. The purpose of the regional list system is to provide an element of proportionality in respect of votes cast for a party and the number of seats won. The Bill provides for the possibility of vacant seats being filled without a by-election, to preserve that element. A by-election for a single seat in a region would be won by the party with the greatest electoral strength there, irrespective of whether it had held the vacant seat. A by-election would disturb the element of proportionality that the regional list system brings to the result of the election. That would be unfair to the smaller parties. That is the difficulty with the amendments.

We want a proportional system for the European elections that reflects the different strengths of parties and different views across regions. A by-election held by any means imaginable would not fit the bill. Amendments Nos. 17, 18 and 19 would undermine that principle.

Amendment No. 19 refers to ballot papers for by-elections. It is customary that the same ballot papers are used for general elections and by-elections. As the Government have not confirmed that the ballot paper for general elections will include candidates' names, it would be foolish to include a provision specifically for by-elections in respect of an issue that has not yet been decided for general elections.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Does my hon. Friend agree that an electoral system without sufficient faith in the electorate to decide their representatives in a by-election must have a fundamental flaw?

Mr. Howarth: If we were dealing with a first-past-the-post, constituency system, my hon. Friend would have a point, but we are dealing with a proportional regional list system for the European Parliament. I could accept the premise of her argument only for a different set of circumstances.

I ask the hon. Member for Hertsmere not to press the amendments. They are conceived with a mindset that relates to first-past-the-post Westminster elections. They do not take account of the different arrangements that we propose. I ask him to accept that the amendments are inappropriate for our proposed regional list system.

Mr. Clappison: I have listened carefully to this useful debate. I am not convinced by the Minister's response. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) made an important contribution on the principle involved. The proposal has not only been introduced in a chaotic way; it is bad in principle.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) struck the nail on the head when he said that the guiding principle of Liberal Democrat politics is to do whatever is convenient for the Liberal Democrat party. I was surprised by the comments of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) about my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). They were not gallant. I do not recall the Liberal Democrat party taking such a purist approach to the necessity for holding by-elections when the previous Member for Torridge and West Devon joined the Liberal Democrat party. The Liberal Democrats must have had a serious argument about the necessity of by-elections. The problem was presumably overcome by the sort of chivalry that the right hon. Gentleman has just displayed and the natural charm and affability of the lady who then represented Torridge and West Devon.

We are not convinced by the Government's arguments. The schedule, instead of being tucked away as a minor and consequential amendment, should have been headed "Mistrust of the People". It is saying that the Government do not trust the people and would rather leave the matter to party bosses and lists, to shuffling around in back rooms under party control. That is a system that we abhor. However, although I have been less than convinced by the Minister's response, in view of the lateness of the hour and the need to make progress, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 40, in page 9, line 30, leave out 'and'.

No. 41, in page 9, line 32, at end insert—

'(c) for sub–paragraph (4) substitute—

Bill reported, with amendments.

Bill, as amended, to be considered tomorrow.

Prevention of Terrorism

7.1 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move,

That the draft Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Partial Continuance) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 24th February, be approved.

Last year, from the Opposition Benches, I said:

"In government, so long as the terrorist threat remains and there is no lasting peace, we shall maintain and operate the powers in the PTA".—[Official Report, 5 March 1997; Vol. 291, c. 928.]

Today, in seeking the renewal of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act, we seek to honour that commitment.

Like the previous Government, this Government are doing all that they can, with the police and the security agencies, to counter terrorism in the United Kingdom and that which is based from the United Kingdom. Strenuous efforts continue to be made to achieve a peaceful settlement, by consent, in Northern Ireland. But recent events in this country and across the world underline the fact that there are those who remain determined to use violent means to achieve their political ends. That is why we are seeking today the renewal of the powers under the prevention of terrorism Act.

The latest atrocity occurred on Tuesday night this week, in Poyntzpass, when Philip Allen and Damien Trainor—friends across the community divide—were shot dead while enjoying a quiet drink together in a public house. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in the House yesterday, the friendship that those men shared symbolised the future in Northern Ireland, while the gunmen who brutally murdered them represented the past. I am sure that the whole House will wish to join me in extending our sympathy and condolences to the Trainor and Allen families at this devastating time and in condemning those brutal murders.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Before my right hon. Friend goes on, may I say that I agree entirely, as everyone in the House obviously does, with his comments about the brutal atrocity yesterday. Is he aware that many of us are very pleased indeed that the leader of the Official Unionists and our hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) visited the bereaved families? Does he agree that that demonstrates that law-abiding citizens and their political representatives in Northern Ireland want to see a settlement whereby those terrible crimes will no longer be committed?

Mr. Straw: I share my hon. Friend's view. A terrible, appalling situation has arisen in Poyntzpass, a village which, as we now know—many with a better knowledge than me knew this before—had until earlier this week managed to avoid the troubles altogether. I pay tribute to both the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). I saw the right hon. Member for Upper Bann on television. I commend his statesmanship and his condemnation of people who claim to come from his community and appear to have committed those atrocities.

In looking at the context of this renewal debate, I want to speak about terrorism in Great Britain, about terrorism in Northern Ireland and then about international terrorism.

[Mr. Straw]

On terrorism in Great Britain, it is now getting on for a year since the general election campaign. One of the things that I remember about that period—others will have had personal experience of this, too—is how terrorists sought directly to disrupt the campaign. On 26 March 1997, two small high-explosive devices went off at Wilmslow railway station in Cheshire. Fortunately, there were no injuries. Then, on 3 April, two devices, one partially detonated, were found at the conjunction of the M1, M5 and M6 motorways around Birmingham. Very significant disruption of the road network ensued. Warrant Officer Alan Islam of the Royal Logistics Corps was awarded the George medal for his bravery in defusing one of the devices. A fortnight later, on 18 April, a small device exploded at a junction box near Leeds railway station and, on 25 April, two more small devices were detonated under a pylon near the M6 motorway. Over the same period, a considerable number of hoax threats were made, no doubt to cause fear and maximise disruption.

Since May, and the renewal of the IRA ceasefire on 20 July, no more terrorist devices have been found on the mainland of Great Britain. There have been considerable successes in the past year in the investigation of terrorism and the conviction of terrorists. Six men were convicted in July of conspiracy to cause explosions and were each sentenced to 35 years, imprisonment. Their intention had been to knock out the electricity grid in London and the surrounding area. In December last year, three men were sentenced to between 17 and 25 years for terrorist offences related to explosives finds. In each case, the police and the Security Service worked carefully and imaginatively to bring the terrorists to book. Their partnership against terrorism is working.

In Northern Ireland, in the period from last year's debate to 19 July—the day before the ceasefire came into force—13 people were murdered. They included two RUC officers, Constables Graham and Taylor, who were shot dead while on foot patrol in Lurgan on 16 June. During that same period, there were several attacks on the security forces and other forms of terrorist activity, including 87 punishment attacks.

In the wake of the restoration of the PIRA ceasefire on 20 July, the scale of terrorist activity in Northern Ireland has diminished somewhat, but it has not ended. Since the murder of the leading Loyalist terrorist, Billy Wright, by the Irish National Liberation Army in the Maze prison on 27 December last year, there have been three significant bomb attacks—in Enniskillen, Moira and Portadown—and 40 punishment attacks. Fourteen murders have been committed by paramilitaries on both sides of the sectarian divide.

Let me make it clear—I am sure that I also speak for the Opposition in this respect—that the recent setbacks will not deflect the Government and the parties from seeking a peaceful solution to the problems of Northern Ireland. The talks continue to progress towards an agreement between the parties, which can then be put to the people in a referendum. Above all, in my judgment and that of the Government, there is an overwhelming desire among the people of Northern Ireland for a lasting and democratic solution.

The third matter relating to the context of the debate is that of international terrorism. Thanks in no small measure to the work of the police and the security agencies, there has been no repetition here during the past year of the bombings carried out by international terrorists in the past; but the appalling attacks that have taken place elsewhere during the past 12 months demonstrate all too clearly the need for us to stay vigilant.

The House will recall, all too starkly, that in Luxor in Egypt, 58 tourists—including six from Britain—were slaughtered in an act of senseless violence. In Algeria, literally thousands have died at the hands of ruthless terrorists. The United Kingdom is in the forefront of efforts to increase international co-operation against the threat of terrorism. We hold the presidency of the European Union and the chairmanship of the G8 countries; we are progressing work in both those forums on, among other things, countering terrorist fund raising and arms trafficking by terrorists.

We are also determined to ensure that this country is not used in any way as a base for those supporting terrorism overseas. I have power under the Immigration Act 1971, as modified by the Special Immigration Appeals Commission Act 1997, to exclude any foreign national from the United Kingdom if his or her presence here is not conducive to the public good. I have used that power 26 times since becoming Home Secretary. In 1997, 12 people were detained under the prevention of terrorism Act in connection with international terrorism, as compared with two in 1996. Of those 12, criminal charges were laid in seven cases. It is simply not the case, as some abroad have suggested, that the United Kingdom is a safe haven for those who support or promote terrorism.

As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will make clear in an address to the Anglo-Arab Association this evening, we already do all that we can to curb the activities of any terrorists found here, to bring them to trial where they commit criminal offences and to deport them where appropriate. In addition, we intend to bring forward specific legislation as soon as possible to make it illegal to conspire in the UK to commit terrorist acts abroad. All that must and will, of course, be consistent with our obligations on asylum under the 1951 convention and our commitment to free speech; but the bottom line is that neither terrorists nor supporters of terrorism are welcome in any way in the UK and we shall do all that we can to make sure that that message gets across loud and clear.

As I made clear in my statement to the House on 30 October last year, the Government will never drop their guard in the fight against terrorism. In the light of all that I have just outlined, it is clearly vital that the police and security agencies continue to have the powers to prevent, where possible, and otherwise to investigate, terrorist incidents.

Informing our debate is the report on the operation of the prevention of terrorism Act in 1997 prepared by the reviewer, John Rowe QC. I am very grateful to him for his clear and independent scrutiny of the operation of the legislation and I am pleased that he was able to conclude that the provisions were operated carefully in accordance with the law.

The powers that Mr. Rowe's report surveys include those, in specified areas and for a limited period, to stop and search individuals and vehicles for articles connected with terrorism and to set up cordons and impose parking restrictions. Mr. Rowe reports that all those powers were exercised fairly and in accordance with the law in 1997. He draws similar conclusions about the operation of the powers to investigate terrorist finances.

Mr. Rowe's report records that, apart from air and sea ports, the arrest and detention powers were used in 1997 in Great Britain on about 30 occasions and in Northern Ireland about 500 times. In each case, he reports that the powers were used properly, as they were at air and sea ports in the same period. In Great Britain, the initial period of detention was extended on nine occasions, as against 23 in 1996; and in Northern Ireland there were 72 extensions, as against 48 in 1996. In his report, Mr. Rowe recommends that the existing port powers should be extended. We shall consider that recommendation in the context of the forthcoming consultation paper on permanent anti-terrorism legislation.

Let me deal briefly with the issue of a judicial element in extension of detention decisions. We have long believed that there is a strong case for that. Mr. Rowe, in his report, supports such a move in principle, while highlighting the inconsistencies that would arise if a judicial element were introduced in Great Britain but not in Northern Ireland. Of course, Lord Lloyd recommended as much in his inquiry into legislation against terrorism. The whole issue will be fully covered in the forthcoming consultation paper on permanent UK-wide counter-terrorist legislation but, until any new legislation is introduced, it would not be prudent to leave the police without the existing executive mechanism for extending detentions. Otherwise, they would not have the means to seek the extended detention of suspected terrorists.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Despite our respect for much of what he says, we do not accept Mr. Rowe's conclusion that we cannot do that in Great Britain so long as we cannot do it in Northern Ireland. Does the Home Secretary recognise that circumstances in Northern Ireland should not be a bar to improving the way in which the process is conducted in Great Britain?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman makes a strong case and it is palpable that there are several arrangements, especially in this sector, which differ between the mainland and Northern Ireland. We shall bear that point in mind.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I hope that my right hon. Friend will not follow the line of logic drawn by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). If it is right for changes to be made in Great Britain, it must be right that they should be made in Northern Ireland. Indeed, we have entered a derogation because of that.

Mr. Straw: I have already said to the House that it is hardly surprising that we wish to see a judicial element in extensions of detention in any event, but there is an issue surrounding how that is brought in and, as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, it is a fact that arrangements have differed in the past. I shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) says, but I ask him to be patient until we introduce the consultation document on the future of anti-terrorist legislation. By way of reassurance, I can tell my hon. Friend that I have looked carefully for a way to introduce a judicial element in the extension of detention decisions within existing legislation, but it is not possible to do so.

Let me now deal with exclusion powers. Since my statement in October last year, in which I announced the revocation of the 12 remaining orders, I have kept under close review the issue of whether or not those powers should be renewed. At that time, I said that, assuming the security situation did not change, I was minded to see the powers lapsed. Since then, I have, of course, been regularly briefed on security matters and I have kept in close touch with colleagues with responsibility for counter-terrorism. As one would expect, I have also closely read Mr. Rowe's views as set out in his report.

The House will be aware of this Government's long opposition to exclusion powers both on policy grounds, in that they amount to a form of internal exile fundamentally undermining the integrity of the United Kingdom, and because of their limited utility. Nothing in the current security situation, nor any argument of policy that has been put to me, shakes me from the view that it is right for those powers to lapse and the order before the House achieves that end.

I do not lightly set aside the views of Mr. Rowe on the matter. In each of his five years as reviewer, he has argued that the powers are useful and should be retained. Our different stances on that matter are, therefore, nothing new; but nor is it without precedent for a Home Secretary to take issue with a recommendation made by the independent reviewer of the prevention of terrorism Act. Lord Colville, Mr. Rowe's predecessor, in a major review of prevention of terrorism legislation published in 1987, argued that exclusion powers were "draconian" and that they should be removed from the statute book despite the fact that terrorist activity continued at a high level. However, the then Home Secretary, now Lord Hurd of Westwell, decided that it was expedient that they should be retained. We are grateful to reviewers, but Ministers must make propositions to the House, which the House must then determine.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that it is the responsibility of Ministers and the House to take decisions on those matters. In his earlier remarks, he referred to his statement last October, when he said that, if the security situation did not change, he would be minded to do as he now proposes to do. Will he explain to the House why he believes that the security situation has not changed, given that, since last October, according to the Government's own assessment, the IRA has returned to a campaign of murder?

Mr. Straw: As the whole House knows, the situation has changed in some particulars, but the issue is whether it has changed sufficiently to warrant the continued availability of the powers, day by day, to a Secretary of State. In fact, those powers will formally remain on the statute book in any event. I have considered the matter very carefully, as I hope that the hon. Gentleman would expect of me, but I do not believe that the situation has changed sufficiently significantly to justify those powers remaining operative, and available day by day to the Secretary of State.

As it happens, until there can be an opportunity for the House and the other place wholly to revise counter-terrorism legislation—and, I hope, to place it on a permanent basis—the powers will remain on the statute book, and could be activated if that was a determination of a future Government or in certain circumstances.

Despite the arguments about the effectiveness of the exclusion powers, it is worth pointing out that they were already withering on the vine under the previous Administration. No orders have been in force in Northern Ireland since 1995. Despite the fact that the ceasefire ended, none was reinstated in Northern Ireland after that period. As for the mainland, my predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), made no new orders in 1996 or 1997, despite a resurgence of violence, leaving 22 in force when I came into office.

Under the prevention of terrorism Act, it is my responsibility to ensure that exclusion powers are used only when I judge them to be expedient to prevent acts of terrorism. I repeat that it is my best assessment that I do not consider that their use can be justified, and therefore I have decided that they should not form part of the Act to be renewed this year. The forthcoming consultation paper on permanent counter-terrorism legislation will provide the opportunity for discussion on whether these powers should be retained permanently or abolished.

Before concluding, I shall make some brief remarks about that consultation paper, which I told the House in October 1997 that we were preparing. The consultation paper will draw very strongly on the recommendations of Lord Lloyd of Berwick's recent report on legislation against terrorism, but it will also take into account other matters.

Lord Lloyd was asked to consider the need for specific counter-terrorism legislation in the event of a lasting peace in Northern Ireland. Sadly, that eventuality has not yet occurred. However, that does not mean that we must shelve consideration of the recommendations. Terrorism is not a temporary phenomenon anywhere in the world.

The forthcoming paper will set out proposals for permanent legislation to deal with the continuing threat. The aim will be one robust and clear framework of powers for the whole United Kingdom—I say that to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North—both effective and proportionate to the threat, to deal with all forms of terrorism.

In the meantime, pending any changes in the principal Acts, the police and the security forces must continue to have the powers that they need to fight terrorism. Those powers are contained in the order before the House. Events of the past few days serve simply to emphasise the need for counter-terrorist powers, and the Government will not shirk from their responsibility to provide them. I commend the order to the House.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): Mr. Rowe, whose report is central to our debate tonight, should be thanked for his report, which reflects conclusions based on much detailed work and wise consideration. I am happy to join the Home Secretary in extending our thanks to him for the work that he has done.

In the context of Northern Ireland, Mr. Rowe says on page 10 of his report:

"I am clear in my conclusion. Both in Northern Ireland and Great Britain there was terrorist activity in 1997 and it has continued in 1998. Furthermore the threat of it is real.

In 1997 the outward indications of it in Great Britain were the explosive devices which exploded or which were found before they exploded"—

as the Home Secretary said—

"and in Northern Ireland there were many incidents of violence, whether or not with explosives and firearms, and they have continued into 1998.

The terrorist organisations—proscribed and otherwise—are still in place: they have their structures, and they are busy at various activities."

In the context of the international situation, Mr. Rowe said on page 12:

"The summary is this. On the one hand there have not been many major incidents in the United Kingdom during 1997, such as explosions or shootings; on the other hand there have been persons here committed to supporting terrorist acts here or abroad, with arms and violence, and they are still a threat."

He concludes on page 13:

"In all these circumstances the threat of terrorism here is a real one."

We agree with that assessment, so we support the renewal of the order. We are reinforced in that view by what happened in Poyntzpass earlier this week—to which the Home Secretary has referred. I make it clear on behalf of the Opposition that, as was the case yesterday also, we extend our sympathy and our condolences to the families and to the friends of those who were killed and injured.

Two men were friends for many years. They lived together happily. They drank together, happily. They worked and relaxed together, happily. It is worth taking a moment, in this very serious debate about security matters, to reflect on the fact that that is not an uncommon situation in Northern Ireland. The nature of terrorism and its reporting tends to focus on the evil—on the black deeds that are done. But there is much in life in Northern Ireland that is normal, and which all of us would recognise as being on a par with the type of activity that takes place in our own constituencies.

It may be worth reminding ourselves that the basis of that stability is something that is common to the Catholic and Protestant theological traditions in Northern Ireland—the belief, at the heart of the Christian gospel, that man was made in the image of God. Respect for individuals in our society ultimately derives from that piece of fundamental theology, and that was exemplified in that bar in Poyntzpass.

For several years, much effort has been made to find ways in which to enable members of the community to come together and do things together, in a way that became naturally more normal. I am sure that the present Government will continue with such efforts; I make no partisan point whatever. Attempts were made to generate employment, and to diminish and remove discrimination in the workplace.

I had the honour, in the House, to put integrated education on the statute book, to enable those who wanted to choose to have their children educated in that framework to do so. In the same piece of legislation, I introduced, in the new Northern Ireland national curriculum, education for mutual understanding and courses on cultural heritage, which for the first time opened up to the young people of the Province an understanding of the various traditions in which they found themselves. In that legislation, I also established the Community Relations Council. It is a matter of record that I made available grants, funded by the taxpayer, to explore the history of the Orange Order. I probably gave more support to the integration of the Irish language into the life of Northern Ireland than any of my predecessors.

I want to encourage the House by reminding hon. Members that all over the Province, there are good people, living and working together in a spirit of harmony, which was reflected by those two men—by Damien and by Philip—in the bar on Tuesday. However, I was also Minister responsible for security, so I have a fairly well-informed understanding of the callousness, the evil and the immorality that constitute those who take part in terrorism.

It is worth reminding ourselves that terrorism is worse than murder, for terrorism not only kills indiscriminately, but is intended to create fear. Above all, it is the refuge of those who have turned their backs on the democratic process—who cannot win in the ballot box, so they turn to the bomb and the bullet.

There is terrorism in Northern Ireland, whether it is on the loyalist side or the republican side, and whether it is associated with organisations that have been at the heart of terrorism for the past 30 years or with new groupings—or perhaps with new names for old groupings. That terrorist threat is real. Each bomb, each murder is an attack not just on individuals, but on the community.

There are other attacks—for example, the targeting of individuals. I pay particular tribute to the members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, prison officers and others, part of whose daily life is to be at risk of being targeted. I pay tribute also to civil servants. I have known people in all three categories who, at a moment's notice, have had to move house because of the risk to their lives as a consequence of such clandestine activity.

Fear and intimidation are generated through knee-capping and by threatening shopkeepers. I have met children who sat in their front room and saw their father gunned down in front of them.

Let us never in this House fall into the danger of discussing terrorism as some sort of intellectual concept that is distasteful. It is vile, wicked and evil, and it is designed to be such. Any democratic Government who seek to defend the rights of their people have a right to put in place orders that, in a normal environment, would cause significant debate. It is right for the Government to make those orders and to see that they are used.

I will articulate why we feel so strongly about the legislation and its annual renewal. I do not intend to go into history, but if the right hon. Gentleman hears in my voice the importance that we attach to it, he will understand, at least in part, why we reacted with so much anger, year after year, when mixed messages went out from this House as the renewal was debated.

The other reason why we feel so strongly about having the legislation available is that it sends a message to the good, law-abiding, resilient, upright people of the Province. I am biased. I declare a vested interest. I know that my accent sounds as though I was born and raised in Peterborough, but that is not the case.

I say with great pride, some emotion and much truth that the people of Northern Ireland deserve the highest praise for their courage, resilience and unwillingness to bow to the terrorist. I say the same of the police and the security forces. They have shown admirable courage, restraint and professionalism. They, too, deserve the renewal of the order.

The Secretary of State said that he would produce a consultation paper. He promised it last year and he has promised it this year.

Mr. Straw: I promised it for this year.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Exactly. I understand what the situation was on 5 March last year. We look forward to discussing the consultation paper when it arrives. Whatever may be the outcome of the consultation process on the issues surrounding detention, which we may want to discuss with the right hon. Gentleman in more detail depending on what is in the consultation document, I am sure that he is right to take the view that nothing should be changed in the interim. We support him in that judgment.

The right hon. Gentleman also said that he would allow exclusion orders to lapse. That has been a matter of considerable debate. No one in the House has always been entirely comfortable with the concept of exclusion orders, but there have been pragmatic and security reasons for introducing them.

I join the right hon. Gentleman in his judgment that Mr. Rowe offered him good advice, but he is the Home Secretary and the decision must be his. Whether or not we agree with his decision, I for one defend his right to make that decision.

The advice that the Home Secretary got from Mr. Rowe on exclusion orders was based on Mr. Rowe's summary in paragraph 30 on page 16, in which he stated:

"I have seen no improper use of the power of the exclusion order, this year or previously."

He went on to say in paragraph 33:

"My own view is that the exclusion power is effective. And it has been used properly. . . But as to the future, the announcement that the power may be allowed to lapse will not deflect me from my view: the exclusion order is a useful part of the prevention of terrorism machinery".

I have already underlined my acceptance of the fact that the decision is for the Secretary of State to make. I hope that he will do so with his usual sensitivity, recognising that there remains an argument for a different decision. I hope that he will not close his mind to the future possible use of such orders, should the situation deteriorate in a way that neither he nor I would wish.

However the future develops, we agree with the Home Secretary, as we made clear last year, that there will be a continuing need for legislation. I hope that the Home Secretary will abide by the view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who was his predecessor, and the views that he himself expressed on 5 March last year—that the House will need to be assured that the situation genuinely has changed before it will be prepared to reconsider with enthusiasm the legislation that we are discussing.

I take this opportunity to affirm again, although I expect that the Home Secretary does not need me to do so, that we support the Government in the talks process. We support the Government in their determination to try to find a way forward. We support the Government, as we demonstrated over many years, in recognising that there must be a political, not just a security solution in Northern Ireland.

I shall deal briefly with international terrorism, to which the right hon. Gentleman also referred. I refer to last year's debate in which the then Home Secretary, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe, said:

"One area that Lord Lloyd looked at particularly closely was legislation to deal with the activities of United Kingdom supporters of foreign terrorism. He concluded:

'The most significant additional measure which the Government can take is to amend the law of conspiracy so as to facilitate the prosecution of those who conspire here to commit terrorist acts abroad. It may take a prosecution or two before the measure takes full effect but it should then serve as a demonstration, both to those involved and to the international community, of the Government's determination to make the UK as difficult and uncomfortable a place as possible for supporters of terrorism overseas.'"—[Official Report, 5 March 1997; Vol. 291, c. 923.]

The Home Secretary has gone out of his way to say that the United Kingdom is not a safe haven for terrorists. He said that the Foreign Secretary would be making that point in a speech this evening. The right hon. Gentleman knows that that is a view that is shared across the Floor of the House, and that we robustly took the same view when we were in government.

The right hon. Gentleman and I, as present and past senior Ministers, also know that there is a perception in the wider international community that there is more that the United Kingdom Government could do to help to curb international terrorism. Both of us might take the view that some of the criticism to which this country has been exposed is unfair. Nevertheless, there is a sense in which, at least in part, that perception exists. Lord Lloyd clearly thinks that it exists.

We hope that the Home Secretary, in his consultation document, will spend some time reflecting on what other steps might be taken to enhance our legislative framework in order to deal with some of the threats that we face. If, at any point, the right hon. Gentleman would find it helpful to consult on these issues, we would be more than happy to do so.

We are here to confirm the renewal of the order; it is part of a continuing process. Already, Ministers—perhaps also Mr. Rowe and others—will be giving thought to whether there are other things that might be done that would be helpful in combating terrorism.

I shall mention briefly two areas that I hope the Home Secretary will consider further. First, there is the financing of terrorism. In the debate last year, my right hon. and learned Friend the then Home Secretary said:

"I am determined that the police should have all the powers they need to combat effectively the current threat from terrorism. That is why I intend to introduce proposals in due course to strengthen the existing controls on terrorist finances. Those proposals will build on Lord Lloyd's very helpful ideas."—[Official Report, 5 March 1997; Vol. 291, c. 923.]

We have not changed our view since last year.

We put in place some fairly draconian measures in a free society. With the support of the House and, in quite specific terms, with the support of the present Home Secretary and his colleagues who were then on the Opposition Front Bench, we introduced some additional preventive powers. Those powers have been useful, and Mr. Rowe commends their being and their use. However, the Home Secretary knows that those who operate in such a climate are seriously devious. I expect that the Home Secretary will share my concern, for example, about the money in Northern Ireland that appears to be getting into the drugs trade. I hope that he will commission, if he has not already, a serious review of what can be done to strengthen measures against the financing of terrorism.

I would also like the Home Secretary to consider intimidation—the creation of a climate of fear that stops short of actual violence, but which in itself can be almost as debilitating to a community and to individuals. I think of shopkeepers who are forced to close their legitimate businesses because somebody walks through the door and issues a veiled, and sometimes not so veiled, threat to their business and to their livelihood if they do not do what the bully boys say.

I think also of those shopkeepers who talk to us—and, no doubt, the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—about those who go into shops and say, "We are happy for you to continue trading but we want 25 quid a week." That 25, 50 or 100 quid, whatever it may be, goes to finance terrorism in whatever form. That happens on both sides of the community—I make no particular point—and it is a form of terrorism. It is part of the package that we all wish to resist.

I think of civil servants who are doing their job on behalf of the community, who in the doing of it expose themselves to threats from others in the community who want an unfair advantage or who do not want those civil servants to behave as their masters, the Ministers, would wish them to.

I think also of local newspaper editors, who are put under the most enormous pressure by quiet chats in their own areas to slant their newspaper coverage, one way or the other, to suit local terrorist activists. I could continue, but I do not wish to for I have made the point. I hope that the Home Secretary will consider the areas to which I have referred.

The powers set out in the order are necessary, are used and are effective. Unless and until the everyday world of Northern Ireland changes, along with international relations and intrigue, the powers remain a significant part of the democratic fight against terrorism. We support the order.

Issues of funding, stop and search, detention and border and port controls, to which Mr. Rowe refers—and others—raise various areas of civil rights. The most damning indictment in civil rights terms is denial of the right to live, along with the right to live a quality of life without fear. The House has never had any difficulty in deciding between those competing civil rights. The powers set out in the order must be retained and implemented, and we give them our unconditional support.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): It is not my intention to keep the House long. First, I join my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) in expressing my sympathy to the families and friends of those who were brutally murdered or wounded in South Armagh the other day. I urge my colleagues to put their names to the early-day motion, of which I am a sponsor, that expresses the revulsion that the House feels about that incident.

I welcome yet again, with two-and-a-half cheers, the progress that my right hon. Friend has made towards implementing what he said before the general election he would do. The decision to allow exclusion orders to lapse is of profound importance, including mental importance.

We were saying that a man or woman could be restricted to a particular area, as in Northern Ireland, or parts of Great Britain. We were saying also that they could not move or know the evidence that was being used against them: they could not challenge it. They were subject to an interview behind closed doors, and that was it. If they were sent back to Northern Ireland, they were made prisoners within their own community. Often, they were unable to obtain employment. Often, by the nature of what had been said about them, they were targets for the other side, whichever side that might have been. That was a denial of what the House stands for; we should not agree with it.

I welcome the steps that my right hon. Friend has taken and the fact that he has rejected Mr. Rowe's advice. It is interesting that my right hon. Friend is criticised for rejecting that advice when advice offered by Lord Colville to liberalise the legislation was continually rejected by the Conservatives when they were in power. They accepted no meaningful reduction of the draconian powers in the order.

I understand my right hon. Friend's difficulties and welcome his undertaking about the need for judicial intervention when a person is detained for any length of time so that we come into line with the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. I very much regret that one of the Human Rights Bill's main proposals was to put immediately into statute a derogation, albeit with provision for it to be removed.

It would have been far better to have a Bill without a derogation and then to include it, which would have shown intent and the direction in which the Government were going. The ability to have a derogation will exist irrespective of whether we have the Bill. It would have been a better example to have on the statute book the European convention on human rights in its entirety, without the derogation. The steps taken by my right hon. Friend are welcome.

I shall make one point on Lord Lloyd's report—we await with interest the consultative document that my right hon. Friend will produce. The document and the legislation must lean towards civil liberties. It is always difficult against a background of terror and violence to talk about the freedom of the individual, but if we are unprepared to accept those freedoms—I accept that the most basic and fundamental freedom is the right to life—in the most difficult situations, we are falling into the very trap that the terrorists create for us.

When we start to lower our standards, we do two things: first, we give terrorists the opportunity to cry foul, which they frequently do when they have been guilty of the most despicable acts; secondly, we allow ourselves to become hardened, to accept these things and to lower our own sensibilities. We cannot afford to let that happen when pursuing individual human rights. In human rights it is the hard case, the nasty case, the awkward case, that has to be defended, and we must ensure that all the rules—the proper rules, the rule of law—are upheld and not allowed to be bent, for whatever good, immediate, expedient or pragmatic reason, as that takes us down the spiral that the terrorists want us to go down, to give the pseudo-justification that they claim for their actions.

On international terrorism, my right hon. Friend made the point—it cannot be underlined too much—that although we cannot have in this country people plotting vile acts of terrorism, we must be careful with the regimes that allege that that is happening and remember the practices of the regimes themselves. It is strange that regimes that allow the stoning of women taken in adultery and allow public executions and hands to be chopped off for theft complain about the actions of some of their citizens in this country.

We may not justify what their citizens might be doing in this country, but we have a proper history of being prepared to be a haven for people who seek to subvert some of those regimes, some of which are our best customers for some of our best hardware. We must be able to say to those regimes that while their people are in this country and are not engaging specifically and directly in organising acts of terrorism, they will be allowed to stay, to protect their own lives and to establish their rights of free speech and criticism. It should not be a part of any British Government to take the role of a Rupert Murdoch with regard to criticism of the Chinese Government.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): We have heard in the two preceding speeches the balance that must be struck when trying to ensure that terrorists do not take away the civil rights of the people to whom they pose many other threats. We must ensure that we do not make it possible or easy for terrorists to take away the most basic civil right, people's right to life—the right that was so brutally taken away from Philip Allen and Damien Trainor in Poyntzpass.

It is not many weeks since a friend of mine, a much-loved Presbyterian minister who had served for decades in my constituency, was buried in Poyntzpass. He lived to be nearly 100 and hoped to see in his lifetime peace come to his beloved home Province. He would have been shocked to realise that his funeral would be followed not long after by those of two young men who had their whole lives ahead of them. Their ability to get on with each other across the community divide was one of the things that terrorists hate and attack.

In its brutality, the incident underlined that what terrorists destroy is people's ability to live their lives as they choose, which is one of the most basic freedoms. We must recognise that the problem may well increase, the closer we get to a settlement—a point that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has made. It is not that the people of Northern Ireland cannot reach a settlement or endorse one in a democratic vote, but that there will be many threats to them as they go through that difficult process. Furthermore, as is reflected in the order, there is a chance of threats to people in Great Britain.

None of that should deflect us from the search for a peaceful settlement—in which all the parties are currently engaged—but if anyone thinks that the arrival of a settlement will bring an end to terrorism, they are mistaken, because however broadly a settlement is endorsed, there will still be those who want to fight against it and try to use terrorist methods to do so. The broader the settlement, the more the supply lines of terrorists can be broken, their refuges removed and their ability to operate in a community destroyed, but their efforts may linger for a little while, even if a settlement is achieved. That fact underlines the necessity for the order.

It is a matter of regret that we have to have extraordinary security powers, which in some measure undermine or remove some of our civil liberties, but they are part of the process of protecting the most basic liberty—the liberty to live one's life without the threat of violence. Because the powers are exceptional, we subject them to exceptional scrutiny. Mr. Rowe's report is part of that process. He states:

"The PTA makes inroads upon civil rights; there are offences which are unusual, and there are powers which are larger than ordinary".

They are extraordinary because of the nature of the threat that we have faced.

We welcome the Government's intention to consult on the implementation of more permanent UK-wide counter-terrorism legislation to deal with longer-term threats and look forward to the discussions that will take place on the consultation document. International terrorism is unlikely to disappear and various groups around the world may resort to it. In the longer term, we hope that legislation will be more limited in scope and more precise in impact than that which has been necessary to deal with the Irish-based threat of recent years.

I emphasise the targeting of the financing and organisation of terrorism. Mr. Rowe stressed the importance of measures aimed at undermining the funding of terrorism. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) drew attention to the intimidation used to obtain such funding. Even when terrorist organisations are not bombing and killing, their structures remain in place and their fund-raising and organisational activities continue. We should direct as much effort as possible at intimidatory and illegal fund raising.

For two consecutive years, Mr. Rowe has highlighted concern about the adequacy of staffing of port control facilities, where the legislation is implemented. He has not said that there is a crisis, but Ministers should consider the matter carefully.

In an intervention, I made it clear that Liberal Democrats want a judicial role in the extension of detention, which is an extraordinary power. The Home Secretary has indicated his interest in moving on the matter. Mr. Rowe is in favour of the proposal, but believes that it would not be right to implement it in Great Britain if it cannot be implemented in Northern Ireland. Mr. Rowe has made it clear in consecutive reports that the proposals could not be implemented in Northern Ireland because judges there cannot yet be asked to extend detention.

Aspects of the judicial system in Northern Ireland, such as the Diplock courts and non-jury trials, are not ideal. I hope that those aspects will be changed as soon as is reasonable, given the security situation in Northern Ireland, but there is no barrier to the judiciary in Great Britain becoming involved in extending detention. People in Northern Ireland may be denied a further safeguarding of their civil rights because of the problems of the judiciary having that power at the moment, but that does not justify not proceeding with the measure in Great Britain.

We agree with the Home Secretary that exclusion orders should not be continued. They send the wrong signal. The signal that we are trying to send is that people are citizens of the United Kingdom, no matter what part of it they live in. The discussions on the future of Northern Ireland are not designed to take away that entitlement. Indeed, they may produce further entitlements, especially if a settlement is reached that makes different sections of the community in Northern Ireland feel comfortable with the constitution: a minority of the community has been unhappy with it for many years.

Exclusion orders send the wrong signal. They no longer have the same security value and they give ammunition to people outside the country who argue that our activities in Northern Ireland are repressive when, in fact, they protect the civil rights of citizens in every part of the community.

I made the point to Mr. Rowe that, when these and other measures are being scrutinised, as much detailed information as possible must be examined. His review of decisions, which is a random examination of cases, is important because people who do not see such information must be confident that he can say with certainty that procedures have been followed correctly and that processes have been used in the right way and for the right purpose.

Mr. Rowe should play the same role as the commissioner under the Interception of Communications Acts and be able to examine intelligence information without identifying sources. Then, we could be sure that the information justified the action. If the information that is available to him is only second hand, he will not be able to make the judgments that we want him to make. Such judgments should be examined by one person occasionally rather than by a wider group of people. The fewer people have access to that information, the easier it will be to maintain security in the future.

Mr. Rowe does not want to see the details of the intelligence information on which decisions are based, but giving him a role similar to that of the commissioner under the Interception of Communications Acts would help him to make his decisions.

The order should be renewed. The powers, which are necessary, are exercised by people in the various services who often place their lives at risk while defending us all. We always emphasise the maintenance of civil rights, but we also acknowledge that the order is a regrettable necessity.

8.5 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): I represent a town that knows only too well the consequences of our failure to defeat terrorism. Warrington has suffered two IRA bombings, the second of which killed two children and injured several other people. Where I come from, we never underestimate the magnitude of the terrorist threat.

A large number of people of Irish descent live in my constituency. They are law-abiding people and I am conscious of the need to protect their civil liberties. I am acutely aware of the balance that must be struck in anti-terrorism legislation. Wherever the terrorist threat comes from, there will always be tension between the rights of those who may be suspected, sometimes wrongly, of committing a crime, and the rights of those who must be protected from violence.

We walk a tightrope, and we must be honest as legislators and admit that we do not always get it right. Few hon. Members would argue that the prevention of terrorism Act is flawless, but, equally, no one could argue that such legislation should not remain on the statute book. As the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) rightly said, terrorism is not only about murder, but about undermining the fabric of society. Terrorists attempt to make normal life impossible. While the terrorist threat remains, there must be a law on the statute book to combat it.

It is our duty to think clearly about which powers in the order are necessary. There is no dispute about several of them. The reviewer showed clearly that powers to stop and search and to impose cordons and parking restrictions have been operated carefully and in accordance with the law. Those powers must be used only in specified areas and for limited periods, but those who argue that they should not remain on the statute book are telling my constituents that the police and the security forces should be denied the power to prevent someone from driving a bomb into the middle of town if they ever, God forbid, received information about another bombing in my area. My constituents would not accept such an untenable argument.

We all agree that the powers that we are discussing tonight represent a restriction on the civil liberties of ordinary law-abiding people. Of course they do—but the greatest restriction on anyone's civil liberty is the ending of his or her life. Two children in Warrington suffered the greatest possible restriction on their liberty.

I accept that there is more concern about the powers of arrest and detention under the Act. The evidence is that they are used sparingly in Great Britain, although perhaps more widely in Northern Ireland. However, each time they are used is a cause for concern. Although I believe in the right of the police to detain suspected terrorists, I was pleased that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said that he would consider introducing a judicial element into the continuation of that detention. The threat to civil liberty is such that ultimately we shall have to take that course of action. I accept that it cannot be done under the current framework but I hope that the matter will be addressed in future.

I cannot support the use of exclusion orders, however, and I am glad that they will be allowed to lapse. I do not believe that they work or that they prevent terrorism; they merely move the threat somewhere else. They introduce into the United Kingdom a form of internal exile that cannot be tolerated in a united country.

The decisions that we have to make this evening are not easy, straightforward or welcomed by anyone in the House, but I believe that we have got the balance about right. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that what we have before us tonight will not suffice in the long term.

The terrorist threat will not go away. Even if we achieve peace in Northern Ireland—as all right hon. and hon. Members hope—there will still be a threat of international terrorism. Last year, 12 people were detained under the prevention of terrorism Act in connection with international terrorism. We need to ensure international co-operation against that threat, but in the long term we need permanent anti-terrorism legislation that has been properly discussed and considered by the House. I hope that we shall press ahead with the consultation that my right hon. Friend mentioned and that, in due time, proposals will be brought before the House for us to debate and consider properly. Until then, my constituents and others deserve protection from acts of random and senseless violence. If the House wills those ends, it has to be prepared to legislate the means.

The Act is not perfect, but the order gives my constituents and others the protection that they need and for that reason I commend it to the House.

8.12 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I rise to support the extension of the legislation for another year. I shall not try to emulate the speech by the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) as I could not better his eloquent description of the threat. I shall refer to some specific points in Mr. Rowe's report and then make some general comments.

We owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Rowe for his report. It meets the standard of previous reports and contains the views of many who have commented on the legislation and acted for the House in that respect. We need to put on record our indebtedness to him for his careful work.

I support the action that the Home Secretary has taken in respect of exclusion orders. As he knows, we have been critical of exclusion orders as a matter of principle. The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) described them as "internal exile", but that is not entirely accurate. I could be attracted to the notion of internal exile, properly described, particularly the way in which it operates with regard to the Mafiosi in Italy, where it has been extremely effective. However, exclusion orders are a crude device and they are objectionable in principle.

I note with interest Mr. Rowe's comments on detention powers. I wish that some of those who criticise the legislation, the powers of detention and the provision for the extension of detention for up to seven days would read pages 26 and 27 of the report and see Mr. Rowe's careful consideration of the use of those powers. He does not act as a judge deciding whether detention was correct in any particular case; he simply checks that the procedures were followed and that the legislation was properly applied. However, one could not fail to read that passage and similar passages in previous reports without realising that the powers are being exercised sparingly, here and in Northern Ireland.

I note the comments of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) with regard to intelligence, and I do not disagree with his suggestion that Mr. Rowe might look more closely into the cases. Of the three extensions of detention founded purely on intelligence grounds, two cases resulted in criminal charges, so intelligence is not being used simply to cover abuse of the legislation.

The House will know that in previous years we argued for a judicial element in extensions of detention. I consider the comments that have been made on the issue this evening to be misconceived, as is Mr. Rowe's report. People are paying too much attention to the word

[Mr. David Trimble]

"judicial" and giving it an interpretation that is understandable here, without appreciating that the term originates in the European convention and the practice of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg.

When we talk of a judicial element in the extension of detention, we mean judicial not in the sense of a High Court judge, but as the word is applied in the European convention and defined by the European Court of Human Rights and within the practice of other European legal systems. It would mean importing into our legal system a feature of continental procedures. It should not involve giving our judges a task that is inappropriate for them. I hope that we do not do that.

It would be much better to look at the practice elsewhere. In many respects, that is unnecessary and our own practice is superior to that in continental countries, but because of the interpretation of the convention by the European Court at Strasbourg, it is necessary for us to follow what I consider to be the inferior practice of some continental legal systems. However, in this context the word "judicial" should be understood as it applies in the convention and as it is interpreted by the European Court at Strasbourg and by other continental countries. If it is understood that the term "judicial" does not apply to proper judges and that distinction is borne in mind, there is no problem with judicial participation and no distinction needs to be drawn between Northern Ireland and Great Britain. Therefore, I consider the discussion on the issue to have been misconceived.

On port and entry powers, I note Mr. Rowe's reference to manifests on page 34. His comments are eminently sensible. I mention in passing that we have a common travel area in the British Isles, but it seems to operate more on informal understandings than on a clear legal basis. I sometimes think that there is a case for having our own mini-Schengen agreement, to put matters on a more regular basis. However, that is another issue.

I underline the points made by other hon. Members with regard to terrorist financing. It is an important issue—the Achilles heel of terrorist organisations—which, until recently, has not received much attention. I consider that it is still not receiving enough attention. There are powers in the existing legislation and we are told that they are being utilised, but we see little evidence of that. We see very few cases being brought and very little sign of money and assets being confiscated. That is the test of the effectiveness of the legislation. The powers are used largely to deter and to gather intelligence.

There is a parallel with the approach to intercepted communications. Too often, the emphasis is on gathering intelligence rather than finding evidence with which to obtain convictions. There is a difference in approach between the security services and the police forces. We need the approach of the police forces, whose aim is to obtain evidence to secure convictions. Gathering intelligence is not sufficient—we must go beyond that.

Hon. Members have also referred to international terrorism. The evidence of arrests and charges shows the need to maintain the legislation to deal with that. The treatment of people who sought political asylum in the 19th century is no longer practical. At the end of the 20th century, with modern communications and travel methods, those who come here seeking political asylum could easily be involved in terrorism and pose a threat to other countries. We have an obligation under international law to ensure that our territory is not used as a base to attack societies elsewhere. That may mean an occasional regrettable intrusion into the circumstances of those who have sought refuge here, but that is unfortunately necessary.

I endorse the comments that have been made about the appalling murders this week at Poyntzpass. I also reflect on the bombs at Moira and Portadown, in my constituency, together with all the shootings and other incidents that have occurred since Christmas. We should consider the period since Christmas as of a piece. There has been a series of events aimed at destabilising the situation. I fear that that is likely to continue—indeed, it may even intensify.

It is difficult to be clear about who is responsible. There is a tendency in the media to pass off the bombings as the work of what is called the Continuity Army Council or the Continuity IRA, but I must enter a question mark on that. The Continuity Army Council has been around for a long time and has not had the manpower, the skills or the resources to mount operations such as those that we have seen in recent weeks. There is speculation about defectors from the mainstream IRA. There were some defections before Christmas, including Mr. McKevitt, the former quartermaster of the IRA who left to form a separate group. We also believe that there are people who may be called defectors who are still in place in the mainstream IRA.

The likelihood is that the recent bombs in Northern Ireland have been constructed by such people, who are still members of the mainstream IRA but who are co-operating with recent defectors—perhaps even some with a CAC background, although I am inclined to discount that. The bombs are probably constructed by the McKevitt group and sympathisers in South Armagh. There is reason to believe that the North Armagh IRA was responsible for delivering the bombs to Moira and Portadown.

Elements in the republican movement are involved in those operations. The question is whether they are doing so as part of an overall plan or independently. A recognised IRA codeword was used for the Portadown bomb and the bomb scare in Armagh the same day, but it was a couple of months out of date. I suggest that that was carefully contrived to enable some to come to the conclusion that because the codeword was out of date, those responsible must have defected from the organisation.

We do not know whether we are dealing with a real split in the republican movement or a pretend split. We must remember that we are dealing with a conspiratorial organisation. No apparent effort is being made by the leadership of that organisation to restrain its members from acting contrary to the ceasefire that is allegedly in place. It is likely that the IRA is deliberately increasing pressure through violence to take advantage of the Government's no claim, no blame approach. While pretending that a ceasefire is in place, the republican movement is going back to violence, but trying to cast the blame for it on other elements, to avoid the opprobrium that would come from the nationalist community if there was an open and avowed return to violence.

We must not underestimate the fact that there is no general support among nationalists in Northern Ireland for a return to violence. That is part of the reason for the underhand behaviour of the IRA. The IRA also wants to provoke and manipulate loyalists. It is clearly succeeding in that. There is reason to believe that the leaders of the mainstream loyalist paramilitary organisations want to maintain their ceasefire, but some groups, such as the Loyalist Volunteer Force, have broken away. There is also evidence to suggest that elements in the mainstream loyalist paramilitary organisations have returned to violence. That may have ended for a while, but there is no assurance that that suspension will continue.

The explanation for the events since Christmas is that the republican movement knows that the political process will not deliver its core objectives. In the words of a leading republican at a meeting in South Armagh a few months ago, they are going back to what they do best in the hope that that pressure will produce political movement from the Government. Over Easter and through the summer, we can expect continued violence. The medium-term objective will be preventing an agreement or wrecking any agreement that comes into operation.

Some commentators and analysts take an optimistic view of the situation, while others take the more pessimistic view that I have expressed this evening. The Government must be prepared for the worst eventualities. It would be terrible if they allowed terrorists to dictate events. Some fear that that has already been happening in recent weeks and months. I sincerely hope that the Government will prove by their actions that those fears are groundless.

Mr. Paul Stinchcombe (Wellingborough): I shall be brief, because I have only a few points to make. A week or so ago, I spoke in the House in support of the Human Rights Bill. I bow to few in the strength of my conviction and commitment to human rights. However, none of us should forget that the greatest human right is the right to live—and not just to live, but to live in peace, free from fear, violence and intimidation.

As with all rights, that is matched by responsibilities. Perhaps the greatest responsibility is that which falls on the shoulders of the Government, to take action as necessary to protect their citizens. Therefore, as long as there is a terrorist threat to our citizens, we must take measures to ensure that we can meet it. Even if and when, as we all hope and pray, Northern Ireland finds its peaceful solution, the threat will remain by virtue of the terrorist threat from abroad.

However, because we are committed to human rights, we must tailor our measures carefully. We must meet the terrorist threat, but in ways that do not trample unnecessarily on the very human rights that we endeavour to protect. It is for that reason that I support the decision that the time for exclusion orders has gone. I agree with everything that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said on the issue. Exclusion orders were draconian and objectionable in principle. The powers were already in decline, and it is right that they have disappeared.

I also take the view that the case for introducing a judicial element in the process of extension of detention is compelling—as touched on by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and others in the debate. Such protection should be built into permanent legislation, which is now due, and when passed, should be national in character, covering the entirety of the United Kingdom.

In opening this debate, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary called for a robust, clear but proportionate framework of powers across the UK, to meet the terrorist threat. That should indeed be our aim. I hope that, one day soon, it will be our achievement.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): In supporting the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) and many of the points made by the Home Secretary, I shall be selective.

The first theme to which I shall refer is the Government's plans for reforming the framework of counter-terrorism legislation, of which the prevention of terrorism Act and the continuance order are essential parts. I have no quarrel, in principle, with such a move at all. Indeed, on the contrary, I welcome it; it is overdue. The legislative framework is contained principally in two Acts. One is described as temporary, and the other as emergency—showing that its provisions were not intended to last long.

Both Acts represent the latest versions of legislation that was introduced well over 20 years ago in response to the threat of terrorism. Sadly, the intervening years have made a mockery of the hope that legislation to combat terrorism can be regarded as temporary. It is a fact of life that the threat of terrorism is here to stay, at least in foreseeable circumstances, and it is therefore right that the Government should think of creating permanent legislation.

The Home Secretary referred to his statement on 30 October, when he announced that he and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland intended to publish proposals in the form of a consultation paper early in the new year. I suppose that, as we are still in the first quarter of the year, this is still early in the year. Obviously, the subject is immensely complicated. There are conflicting issues to be taken into account and difficult balances to be achieved. All that requires careful consideration. I nevertheless hope that we shall not have to wait very much longer; we may soon become a little impatient.

Although I do not complain about the delay in the appearance of the consultation paper, I quarrel in one respect with the Government's handling of anti-terrorism legislation so far. There are strong arguments for ending internment and for allowing the power to exclude to lapse. We shall be looking for the emergence of a package of measures from the consultation process, the totality of which meets the threat of terrorism and safeguards, so far as possible, human rights and civil liberties. I genuinely believe that the Government have been mistaken to anticipate selectively what should have been considered part of a debate on a total package.

With regard to exclusion orders, I must confess that I am not yet convinced by the Home Secretary's line. I dare say that, in that respect, I am in a minority of one, but I shall nevertheless state my views on the subject. I do not share the negative view of the effectiveness of exclusion orders that many hon. Members have expressed. Exclusion orders have been effective on occasions. They can disrupt the chain of communication and command, without which terrorist operations cannot take place. They are a weapon of pre-emptive strike; they prevent terrorism. Moreover, the use of an exclusion order marks the recipient of it and makes him virtually unusable to a terrorist organisation. In that sense, of course, arguments for exclusion orders reflect arguments in favour of internment.

The Home Secretary has not yet convinced me on another point. The fact that exclusion orders have been used with decreasing frequency in recent years is not a justification for abandoning entirely the power to use them in future. I find it impossible to say that, some time, somehow, circumstances will not arise when, in the absence of evidence to bring other charges, the use of an exclusion order might frustrate a terrorist operation and save human life.

Back on 30 October, the Home Secretary significantly based his justification for ending exclusion orders on two considerations. One was the fact that Viscount Colville, in his 1987 review of anti-terrorist legislation, had recommended it. The other was that the Home Secretary had taken into account the views of those who advise him on security matters. The annual review of the PTA is not written in stone; it does not have divine authority. However, it is worth recording and noting that Viscount Colville's successor is, effectively, one of the Home Secretary's security advisers—albeit one who operates in a narrowly defined remit—and Mr. Rowe does not agree with the Home Secretary.

We should note that, in his report, Mr. Rowe confirms the firmly held opinion of police officers "that the power is of use in combating terrorism".

In the same paragraph, he continues:

"I have seen, in times past, two clear instances where an exclusion order deterred the excluded person from engaging in terrorist attacks in Britain."

As hon. Members know, he offers his personal view that the exclusion power is effective. He concludes with this sentiment, which I share:

"the announcement that the power may be allowed to lapse will not deflect me from my view: the exclusion order is a useful part of the prevention of terrorism machinery".

For the time being at least, I continue to share that view.

The final theme that I wish to explore is judicial involvement in extending detention. The House will know that, two years ago, Mr. Rowe argued against that. He reasoned that it would be "unusual . . . a straining of the judicial function."

He argued that a judge acting in such a capacity would be acting

"in name only . . . exercising a function which could be called judicial only because he happened to be a judge by his profession and occupation."

I noted with interest the comments of the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) on that, and I must confess that I, too, must have missed an essential point. All the debates on extending judicial involvement in which I have taken part over the years have also failed to make the distinction that he made. Nevertheless, Mr. Rowe reported last year that he had undergone something of a Damascene conversion. His view had changed, not least because judges were much more involved in one-sided, ex parte and secret hearings in respect of applications for public interest immunity certificates.

In a debate last year, I incurred some unpopularity among my right hon. and hon. Friends by saying that I had an open mind on judicial involvement, although I was not convinced by the arguments of the Home Secretary and Mr. Rowe. My view has moved on from last year, and I now accept in principle the desirability of judicial involvement—as I understood it, before the statement of the right hon. Member for Upper Bann. It is right for the Government to consider carefully how it can be implemented.

I accept in principle the desirability of the Government's aspiration to bring about judicial involvement in extension orders, but there are accompanying dangers. The issue is not clear cut. It is imperative that judges are not regarded as an arm of the Executive. That would undermine the independence of the judiciary. The other danger is that extensions of detention are an obvious part of the process of arrest and detention, and that, arguably, is not an area in which the judiciary should become involved.

Finally, I agree with Mr. Rowe's conclusions unreservedly. There is a need for a prevention of terrorism statute and for the provisions of the PTA, and I share his opinion that each of the sections is needed for the forthcoming year. I deeply regret that, in one respect, that is not the view of the Government.

Mr. Straw: This has been an interesting debate, which has showed the widespread agreement in the House for the proposals in the order—that, with the exception of part II of the 1989 Act and one or two other more detailed points, the PTA should be renewed for the forthcoming year.

I wish to pick up a number of the points raised in the debate. Before I do so, I pay tribute to the eloquent words of the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), who spoke movingly from his own experience about the situation in Northern Ireland. He spoke about the way in which—despite the terrorism and the efforts of the terrorists to pull the communities apart—there are thousands of people from both sides of the divide who have been determined to make unity and not division the reality in their lives. The right hon. Gentleman drew not only on his experience as someone who comes from the Province, but on eight years as an Under-Secretary and Minister of State attached to the Northern Ireland Office from 1984 to 1992.

The right hon. Members for North-West Cambridgeshire, for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) asked whether adequate steps were being taken to target effectively the finances of terrorists. The frank answer is no. I am not satisfied with the powers—but not the efforts—and the results being achieved in pursuing terrorists and other serious criminals in a way that often can hit them the most—through their bank balances, safe deposit boxes and the cash they have stashed abroad.

There are two problems. The first is the insufficiency of the existing powers; the second is the problem of following up court decisions to fruition. In terms of the non-terrorist situation, the amount we take in each year is tiny compared with the ostensible value of the orders achieved by the courts. I am concerned about that. So far as terrorism is concerned, we are examining it closely in the context of the consultation document that we shall publish shortly. I will come to the question of when precisely, which was raised by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter).

In October, we were looking at whether we could use civil procedures to bear down on the confiscation of assets generally. Those techniques have been used successfully in the United States, Canada and—it must be said—the Republic of Ireland. We are examining their experiences because we cannot have a situation where serious criminals—terrorists or not—achieve substantial increases in their incomes and then use the protection of the law to stop us getting at their funds.

The right hon. Member for Upper Bann raised an interesting point about the terminology of the European convention on human rights. Article 5(3) of the convention states:

"Everyone arrested or detained should be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power."

The right hon. Gentleman was right—it is always worth while examining the texts. We are doing so in the context of the consultation document. The obvious way of doing that is through a judge, but it must be borne in mind that there are many stipendiary magistrates, and their numbers are increasing.

I had a meeting the other day with a magistrate from a continental country—I shall not mention which one. Magistrates in that country are judicial officers, but some of their functions are a combination of the functions exercised by the police and Home Office officials in this country. We must recognise that it is against that background that the European Court of Human Rights has come to its decisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) apologises through me to the House for the fact that he has had to leave before the end of the debate. He asked whether we should have included within the Human Rights Bill a derogation relating to the PTA. We regret the need to start the Bill's life with the derogation, but it is unavoidable if we are to preserve the existing power to extend detention. Only fresh primary legislation to introduce a judicial element will get over the need to continue the derogation. Under the Human Rights Bill, the derogation will itself lapse after five years, unless it is specifically renewed.

The hon. Member for Basingstoke referred to the exclusion powers, and I understand his point. He quoted Mr. Rowe, and accepted that, in other respects, Mr. Rowe's views—and his own—had changed. I am grateful to Mr. Rowe who has, as usual, done a thorough job. It is a fact that on some issues we are bound to take different points of view. It is worth drawing it to the attention of the House that, although he has reported from time to time the view of the police and the security forces in favour of exclusion orders, he has also reported that this is not a unanimous view. I draw to the attention of the House paragraph 29 of his 1995 report, in which he said:

"The overwhelming majority of port officers gave me the answer that the orders are useful and should be retained. But there was a fair number of officers, of all ranks, who held the opposite view."

That is a fact and, in reciting the opposite view, he said:

"On the other hand, the argument is that in the absence of exclusion, a known and experienced member of an organisation can be noticed at the port, and followed thereafter, and kept under surveillance."

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for missing the first few minutes of his reply. Having been in the Chamber since 4 pm, I had gone to get something to eat, so I apologise for missing those first few minutes. He has been talking about detention and the derogation. Can he remind the House how long that derogation still has to run? I am trying to tempt him into speculating whether his legislation will be before the House before that derogation is up, or whether he contemplates having to renew it.

Mr. Straw: I was not talking about the derogation that has been entered on the record before the Council of Europe, derogating from the European convention. I was talking about the fact that we have had to repeat that derogation within the body of the Human Rights Bill. It is within that that the derogation will lapse within five years, unless it is renewed under powers given in the Bill. I anticipate that we shall sort this problem out well within the five-year period, including making provisions within article 5(3) for a judicial element in extensions of detention. The right hon. Gentleman was in government for much longer than I have been so far and will be aware of the pressure on parliamentary time. However, it is no great secret that I hope and believe that we should legislate permanently in that field in the next two or three years.

The hon. Member for Basingstoke gently tweaked me for the fact that, in my statement on 30 October, I said that I hoped to publish the consultation document early in the new year. That was being over-optimistic. It is now early in the new year, but I am anxious to publish it in the next two or three months. It is a complicated, but also an important, matter.

I think that I have answered the main specific points that right hon. and hon. Members have raised. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe), in a short but eloquent speech, said that we needed to remember that the greatest fundamental human right was the right to live, free from fear, intimidation and terror. It is the duty of the Government and of the House to secure that fundamental right above all. Without it, no other rights or freedoms can be enjoyed. Against that background, and with that fundamental right in mind, I commend the order.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Partial Continuance) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 24th February, be approved.

Owen Oyston

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jane Kennedy.]

8.52 pm

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this a particularly difficult issue to raise. Members of Parliament do not usually stand up in the Chamber and allow themselves to be identified with those who would seek to defend a man successfully prosecuted for the offence of rape. What I say here this evening could easily be misrepresented.

I take that risk because I believe that someone must speak up on this case. Arising out of the Oyston trial, I see the danger of future miscarriages of justice, where cases are badly investigated, men are charged with rape and juries convict on the basis of uncorroborated evidence in closely contested cases. I am talking about convictions in the complete absence of medical or scientific support.

This debate is about the case of the rape of a 16-year old girl by a 57-year-old man. I am arguing that the case raises issues of public policy and natural justice. I want it to be referred to the Criminal Cases Review Commission.

This was one of a series of six such allegations made against this man. A magistrate found no case to answer in three of the cases. A Crown court acquitted him in two. The allegations, which a jury upheld, were that the man indecently assaulted a young woman, whom I will call J, in the back of a car in the presence of two other passengers, one of whom was her friend. Twenty minutes later, J alleged, he raped her in his own bed in his own home. Both allegations were challenged by J's friend Lysa Rubotham, who was in the car and in the bedroom.

I have met Mr. Oyston on two occasions. The first time was in 1988 when, following allegations by a Conservative Member of Parliament about his activities in Derbyshire, I met him in a hotel in my constituency to confront him with the allegations. I conducted my own inquiries, which included interviewing people in Derbyshire. The allegations proved unfounded.

I then presented Mr. Peter Carter-Ruck with a file of papers that had come my way from a number of sources. Those papers were, I believe, used in a successful libel case. My activities included tabling an early-day motion, which proved a considerable embarrassment to Mr. Oyston. I did so in the belief that I was acting in the public interest. Allegations had been made that were damaging to the Labour party and, as far as I was concerned, someone had to investigate.

On the second occasion in 1995, Mr. Oyston asked to meet me in the House of Commons and told me that he was the subject of a conspiracy—his words. He was being prosecuted for rape. I could not comment on the issue of conspiracy—I have no knowledge of those matters. He told me that he had been very stupid, an admission he was subsequently to make in the course of his trial. He also told me that he had been having sexual relationships with young women. He seemed to me to be admitting that he had taken advantage of his position as a media tycoon. During the meeting, I spoke to his lawyer on the phone and told him that I was not prepared to take any action, because I believed that the matter was sub judice. However, I did state that I would like to be kept informed of developments because of my previous inquiries in the late 1980s. I have now read much of the evidence in this case, including sworn statements to the police and affidavits in relation to the new evidence. I have also read the available transcripts of both trial and appeal.

The question is whether a charge of rape should have been brought against Owen Oyston. Oyston admits that he took advantage of young women. The House will deplore such conduct, and I find it unspeakable—but such is life. We have never legislated to make such relationships illegal, although some hon. Members may want to. However much we might condemn such behaviour, it is not a criminal offence, whereas rape is a particularly serious and nasty offence.

Did a change in the law on rape, five days before Oyston was charged, prejudice his trial? I have often asked why that change was introduced only five days before he was charged and whether there was a connection. A rule that had obliged judges to warn juries about the dangers of convicting on the uncorroborated word of one complainant in a rape case had been abolished. In 1993, the then Home Secretary said that it had to go. He said that it was outdated and demeaning to women, particularly in rape cases. I believe that that rule change was critical to the Oyston trial.

The danger of the change was outlined by Baroness Mallalieu in some detail, on Second Reading of the Criminal Appeal Bill 1995 in the House of Lords. Indeed, I am informed that, in north-west England, at least six other rape cases since 1995 have resulted in what has been described as grotesque and disastrous injustice, involving the suicide of innocent people and the gaoling of others who have made false allegations. Because of shortage of time, I have been unable to examine the detail of each of these cases.

In the case against Oyston, the prosecution brought an uncorroborated allegation of rape. However, the defence produced an eyewitness, Lysa Rubotham, J's friend—the other woman in the car whom the Crown acknowledged to have been present. I have interviewed this woman. During an interview at my home four weeks ago, she told me that she believed that an injustice has been done. She insisted that no assault had taken place in the car in which she was travelling, and that no rape had taken place in the house that the two girls had visited.

The case hinged entirely on the credibility of the two women witnesses. Both the Crown and the defence agreed that the two women had been present in the defendant's home on the only occasion when an offence could have been committed. Lysa Rubotham believes that J lied to the court. She told me that she would believe for the rest of her life that an injustice has been done. In my home, she openly wept over her failure to be believed in the court.

No other material evidence was available to the defence or the jury, as J could not say in what precise part of any year, season or month any offence had been committed. Most remarkably, she allowed two whole years to pass before she revealed to anyone that the rape had taken place.

Did the police, in the gathering of evidence, act as even-handed investigators? The first police interview notes in the case are now missing. Summing up for the defence in the Oyston trial, Mr. Anthony Scrivener said that Lysa Rubotham, who was questioned on 24 occasions, was asked only once—informally and on the telephone—about J's allegation. Scrivener said:

"It does not require a great brain to realize in the circumstances that Lysa Rubotham must be an important potential witness.

She was never asked to make a statement about it. Obviously a material witness—and when she was asked she indicated to the police that she would not be corroborating the police's version of it and so" the police felt that "it was not necessary to make a statement."

Another important question is whether the witnesses were treated equally. Why was J given anonymity, whereas the character of the only other eye-witness, Lysa Rubotham, was torn to shreds before the jury? Was article 6(3)(d) of the European convention on human rights breached? Under that article, everyone charged with a criminal offence has a right to "examine or have examined witnesses against him and obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him."

As the complainant in a rape case, J was granted anonymity and protected from certain lines of cross-examination under section 2 of the Sexual Offence Act 1976. She could not be asked about her sexual and personal life. No such protection was afforded to Lysa Rubotham, whose evidence directly contradicted the evidence of J. Miss Rubotham was cross-examined in the way that rape complainants used to suffer in the days before the 1976 Act. That could hardly be described as examination "under the same conditions" as described under article 6.

Lysa Rubotham was named. Her home address and carefully selected photographs were published in many newspapers. As she feared, she was forced by the Crown to reveal details of her youthful promiscuity. She was portrayed in newspapers after the trial as a liar and a loose woman. After she had admitted having a sexual relationship with the defendant, she was asked by Mrs. Helen Grindrod, for the Crown, to say whether she had had promiscuous sexual encounters, at the age of 17, with four business men, who were all named in open court.

The questioning was designed to demonstrate that, although Lysa Rubotham was a friend and colleague of the complainant, she was promiscuous and might have a stronger loyalty to the defendant and be prepared to lie on oath for him.

The trial judge told the jury that one of the two witnesses must have lied to them. He also told them that their resolution of the conflict of evidence was central to the question of guilt. Since the two contradictory witnesses were not examined "under the same conditions", as required by the European convention, the jury could not weigh accurately the evidence of one young woman against the evidence of the other young woman.

Many people in Lancashire believe that the defendant was denied a fair trial. My view is that, if each of the witnesses had been treated in the same way, the jury might well have come to a different verdict.

I received a letter from a woman in Silverdale in Lancashire. It says:

"Re: Owen Oyston.

Dear Sir,

I have been interested to read that you, as I am myself, are greatly concerned at the misjudgment used in the above case and are willing to help to right an obvious breach of what is fair in:

The way the case was conducted.

The biased questioning of participants.

The length of the sentence handed out.

The obvious bias of the policeman involved, whose comments were totally unacceptable on television."

I confess that I was unaware of those matters.

"The sending to Garth prison of a man who has never been involved in violence. One of the prisons used for the worst type of offender.

This man, whom I have never met, has obviously upset people in high places. I can only conclude that what has happened to him is as the result of a deliberate conspiracy.

Please join with me in righting this wrong and bring it to the notice of Parliament."

The letter was signed.

I do not want to comment on any conspiracy theories, but I thought that that letter was an indicator of the opinion of many people in Lancashire who have been following the case, and I thought it appropriate to read it to the House.

There is one aspect of the preparation of the case against Owen Oyston that I find particularly disturbing. Why was the evidence of the appalling and chronic abuse of drugs not adequately researched or considered by the police, the Crown Prosecution Service, the Crown court, or even the Court of Appeal? At one trial, J was formally given immunity from prosecution for past drug abuse. However, the police did not carry out a full inquiry into her heavy use of amphetamines, Ecstasy and cannabis. This was a woman whose memory of events, late one night four years earlier, would be so vital to the jury at the trial of Owen Oyston.

The question is whether courts should be allowed to rely in rape trials wholly on the evidence of those who have repeatedly used drugs. I note that, once again in our legal system, three Court of Appeal judges have been able to reject a mass of new evidence—some of which has recently been drawn to my attention—gathered in a man's defence after his conviction, but unavailable to his lawyers or to the jury in his trial.

As I have said, raising a case of this nature is very difficult for a Member of Parliament, but I feel very, very strongly that something is wrong, and that the truth has got to come out. A barrister recently said to me that the Oyston trial had implications for the whole of the law on rape. Something, somewhere, is wrong. The law is being brought into disrepute. I can only foresee great injustice being done in the future, unless we again review the law.

Before his trial, Owen Oyston was told by lawyers that, if he was prepared to say that he had consensual sex with J, a conviction for rape would be very unlikely, because of the operation of the law on consent. However, Oyston refused to adopt what he claimed was a dishonest defence. Both Oyston and Lysa Rubotham were adamant that no sex, consensual or otherwise, had ever taken place between Oyston and J.

[Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours]

Although I have not met Oyston for three years and have not been able to discuss the case with him, he has let it be known from prison that he will not admit his guilt, even to placate the parole board. His message from prison, to the girl who gave evidence for him, was:

"You told the truth. I will not make a liar of you by admitting a crime I did not do. I would stay in jail for ten years if it was needed to prove my innocence and your honesty".

As we adopt the European convention on human rights, do we not have an obligation to show that our own house is order in that difficult area of the law? It is with that in mind that an application will be made to the Criminal Cases Review Commission for a review of the Oyston case. The commission has two criteria—exceptional circumstances and new evidence. The application can meet both criteria. I earnestly hope that the commission, when it receives the application, will refer the matter back to the Court of Appeal. There is sufficient new evidence available to warrant its intervention.

Finally, I should like to make it absolutely clear that neither Mr. Oyston nor any member of his family has asked me to raise this case in the House. I have done so of my own volition. I believe that something is not right.

I wish to leave the House with some very simple facts to consider. First, Oyston admits that he had sexual relations with young women. Secondly, he has consistently denied rape, even though that may have adverse implications for parole. Thirdly, no scientific evidence for rape exists. Fourthly, no medical evidence exists. Fifthly, there is no firm date for the offence. Sixthly, the police lost the original interview notes. Seventhly, the incident was not reported until two years after it took place.

Eighthly, the accused refused to admit to any sexual activity even though that could have enhanced his prospects of acquittal or brought a lighter sentence. Ninthly, the friend of the victim, Lysa Rubotham, who was present throughout, insists that no rape took place. Tenthly, the victim admitted to being a regular user of hallucinatory drugs. Something is wrong, and I want something done about it.

9.14 pm

The Attorney-General (Mr. John Morris): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on his good fortune in securing this debate, and thank him for his courtesy in providing advance warning of the points that he intended to raise. It must be the best part of 30 years since I replied to an Adjournment debate.

Although I cannot endorse my hon. Friend's portrayal of Mr. Oyston's conviction as a miscarriage of justice, I acknowledge his courage and sincerity in bringing the matter before the House. The House has no more sympathy for properly convicted rapists than do the people we represent. He acts, however, in the best parliamentary traditions by putting forward with his customary vigour the case of an individual whom he believes to have a legitimate grievance, notwithstanding that his cause may be unpopular and that he has criticised that individual in the past.

My hon. Friend's difficulties go deeper, because I know he recognises that questions of guilt or innocence in individual cases are a matter to be determined through judicial processes rather than in a political forum. Similar constraints attach to my role, as I would not expect to answer to the House for the nitty-gritty of each and every one of the 1.3 million cases conducted annually by the prosecuting authorities that I superintend. He largely recognised these limited roles by stating at the outset that he seeks consideration of the case by the Criminal Cases Review Commission.

Mr. Oyston had his appeal to the Court of Appeal dismissed. He does not require my leave or that of a court to apply to the CCRC. He is entitled to do that as of right. The commission has no power itself to change the decision of a court. Its task is to consider whether there is some merit in an applicant's case, and, if so, to examine it to decide whether it would have a real possibility of succeeding if it were given a further hearing in an appeal court. The commission reaches its decisions impartially.

I want to elaborate slightly on what I have already said, but there is not the time tonight to go into my role and duty of superintendence of the Crown Prosecution Service. On 19 December 1979, Lord Havers gave a written answer to the House on that matter. Had there been time—I have only eight minutes—I could have set that out.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Cannot my right hon. and learned Friend speak until 10.30 pm?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): The hon. Gentleman is correct: there is no shortage of time.

The Attorney-General: I am obliged. I can deal with the matter in extenso. I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for putting me right, not for the first time.

I have a statutory duty to superintend both the Crown Prosecution Service, which was responsible for the prosecution of Mr. Oyston, and the Serious Fraud Office. The term "superintendence" has been in use for more than 100 years. To my mind, it strikes a proper balance in our democratic society between the need to ensure proper accountability to Parliament while guarding against improper Executive or political influence over the prosecution.

In a speech outside Parliament in 1979, Lord Havers explained his views of "general superintendence" over the Director of Public Prosecutions' activities and the extent to which he was responsible to Parliament for them. He added:

"but I am not responsible for the individual decisions of the DPP or his officers. The DPP, although being an officer under the Crown, is thus completely independent and non-political. He"—

she at present—

"acts for the public, in the public interest, and for no one else. He will of course discuss particular cases with me and consult me generally; but the decisions taken in the field where he is vested with the discretion to prosecute will be his decision."

I referred earlier, when I wrongly thought that I did not have the time to give the quotation, to Lord Havers' written answer. He said:

"My responsibility for superintendence of the duties of the director does not require me to exercise a day-to-day control and to give specific approval of every decision he takes. The director makes many decisions in the course of his duties which he does not refer to me, but nevertheless I am still responsible for his actions in the sense that I am answerable in the House for what he does. Superintendence means that I must have regard to the overall prosecution policy which he pursues. My relationship with him is such that I require to be told in advance of the major, difficult, and, from the public interest point of view, the more important matters so that, should the need arise, I am in the position to exercise my power of direction."—[Official Report, 19 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 187.]

My primary responsibility, therefore, is to oversee the effective and efficient administration of the prosecuting authorities that I superintend. Hence my establishment of the Glidewell review. I cannot and do not hold myself out as responsible for the day-to-day conduct of each and every prosecution, although these constitutional niceties explain to the House how I approach my responsibilities.

The comments by my hon. Friend raise three key questions. The first is whether Mr. Oyston should have been prosecuted. The evidential test is that there must be sufficient evidence to provide a realistic prospect of conviction. Given the verdicts of the jury convicting Mr. Oyston of rape and indecent assault of this girl, which were upheld by the Court of Appeal, I do not think that I need say more about that first test.

The second test is that the prosecution of the case must be in the public interest. There can be few, if any, circumstances in which, if the evidence were sufficient, the public interest would not require prosecutions in relation to rape and indecent assault such as were alleged against Mr. Oyston.

The second question raised by my hon. Friend concerns the law on corroboration. He is right to say that, before 3 February 1995, the law required trial judges in cases involving allegations of sexual misconduct to give a warning to the jury to the effect that it would be dangerous to convict the defendant on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant.

The warning proved a fruitful source of appeal by those convicted, and was often seen as casting an unwarranted slur on female complainants. In 1991, the Law Commission recommended the abolition of the relevant law. After full debate here in Parliament, that recommendation was implemented by sections 32 and 33 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

Those provisions do not mean that a warning is never given. Trial judges still have a discretion to give the warning, but there has to be an evidential basis to justify the warning. It is not to be given merely because the female makes an allegation of sexual misconduct. I should be surprised indeed if this House voted for a reversal of that position. To meet the question asked by my hon. Friend, as a matter of fact, the trial judge exercised his discretion in Mr. Oyston's favour, and did give such a warning to the jury.

Before I move to the next of my hon. Friend's points, I digress to note that the two criticisms are markedly at odds with the criticisms generally levelled at the Crown Prosecution Service for being reluctant to prosecute, and the criminal justice system for making it too difficult to bring rapists to justice, in particular through inadequate protection of the complainant. Prosecutors might perhaps be forgiven for thinking at times that "damned if you do, damned if you don't", is their eternal lot.

That brings me to my third issue. My hon. Friend refers to the evidence of Lysa Rubotham, and the point he makes excellently demonstrates the limitations on the House and on myself. My hon. Friend saw her, and clearly formed a favourable impression. The jury also saw her—and, for that matter, saw the complainant as well. They heard Lysa Rubotham give evidence, and the cross-examination which followed. They clearly did not believe her. I have no means of reconciling those views, and nor does the House.

The issue as to the cross-examination of J, as referred to by my hon. Friend—Miss C, as she is referred to in the law reports—about her previous sexual experience is one which Mr. Oyston's learned and very experienced counsel was more than able to deal with at trial and at the Court of Appeal. The trial judge was in the best position to decide what questioning would be allowed.

The nature of the defence was that the events had not taken place at all, and not that she had consented, which is a frequent defence in such cases. I repeat, the defence was that the events had not taken place at all, and not that she had consented. None the less, there was in fact limited cross-examination about the previous sexual conduct of the complainant directed specifically to the issue which was said to be the defence.

My hon. Friend has also raised the manner in which this witness was cross-examined about her sexual history. He has referred to article 6 of the European convention on human rights. It is true to say that section 2 of the 1994 Act limits the manner in which a complainant in a case such as this can be questioned, but only if such questioning cannot be justified in the context of the case.

Further, the trial judge is under a duty imposed by the common law to do his utmost to restrain unnecessary cross-examination of any witnesses. Additionally, the Bar Council code of conduct requires counsel to limit cross-examination of witnesses to matters which are not merely scandalous or intended to vilify, insult or annoy the witness. Such protection is afforded to both complainants and other witnesses.

In any event, the article 6 point was not and could not then be pursued by defence counsel at either the trial or before the Court of Appeal. I contrast that with the situation that we hope will prevail when the Human Rights Bill has been passed by both Houses and the European convention has been incorporated into United Kingdom law. If Mr. Oyston's advisers now feel that there is merit in that point, it is a matter for them how to pursue it.

My hon. Friend spoke of fresh evidence. The Court of Appeal considered the fresh evidence. There were doubts about the weight that could be attached to some of it, and, in any event, the court declined to accept that it could have an impact on the safety of the verdicts. I should say, for the sake of completeness and with all due respect to my hon. Friend, that what he says about the complainant's involvement with drugs seems to exceed what was said by Mr. Oyston's counsel at the trial, who at one stage in cross-examination put it no higher than "dabbling".

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The reason why there is more information about that aspect of the trial is that, in a subsequent trial, in which a Mr. Peter Martin was prosecuted, the barristers were able to extract far more information from J on that matter. In my view, that information would have been relevant in the previous trial, if it had surfaced at that stage.

The Attorney-General: I do not have with me the dates of that trial, which, as my hon. Friend said, was subsequent, in order to compare them with the date of the appeal in the Court of Appeal. If there had been a change of position by defence counsel, one might have been right to anticipate that that point would have been explored in that court, so my hon. Friend's point lacks the force that it might otherwise have had.

I stress, because it is important for future debates of this kind, that the House is not in a position to review the guilt or innocence of those tried in our courts on allegations of criminal misconduct. There is an established appeal procedure, and, if and when that is exhausted, convicted persons can apply to the Criminal Cases Review Commission. Previously, Mr. Oyston would have had to petition the Home Secretary; that is no longer the case. Since 31 March 1997, the Criminal Cases Review Commission has been up and running.

In Mr. Oyston's case, the Court of Appeal has recently given its view that the convictions were safe. Mr. Oyston now has the right to apply to the commission if he so wishes. He does not need the leave of the courts, the Home Secretary or myself. It will be for the commission to assess the merits of his application, and, if so invited, it may take account of, and give full weight to, matters to which my hon. Friend alluded.

I cannot say more. Parliament has set up the Criminal Cases Review Commission, and, if Mr. Oyston so wishes, he may avail himself of its procedures.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes to Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 6 March 1998

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Countryside Issues

9.34 am

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I have the honour to present a petition that has been signed by 100 residents of my constituency, who live in one of the rural areas there. It reads:

That the non-rural population of these islands has become distanced from the realities of meat, egg, milk production and pest control.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House;

(i) takes notice of the concerns expressed by those who marched on 1st March, 1998;

(ii) endeavours to keep animals and animal welfare in perspective,

(iii) refrains from interfering with traditional British rural pastimes such as foxhunting.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Shooters Hill Fire Station

9.35 am

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): I have a petition from the residents in the vicinity of Shooters Hill fire station, who request that the House of Commons urge the Home Secretary to refuse to grant permission to the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority to close Shooters Hill Fire Station.

This afternoon, I shall be presenting a similar petition of 13,000 signatures to No. 10 Downing street.

To lie upon the Table.

Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New clause 1

FOX CONTROL IN NATIONAL PARKS

'.—A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 1(1) if he uses a dog for the control of foxes in the interests of sheep farming within the boundaries of any national park.'.—[Mr. Campbell-Savours.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.36 am

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 3—Mink—

'.—(1) Subject to compliance with subsections (2) and (3), hunting of feral mink with dogs shall be permitted on any land, river, lake, waterway or coastal area at the request of the owner or occupier thereof where that person reasonably believes that mink need to be controlled there in order to protect or conserve fish (whether required for angling or human consumption), waterfowl, ground nesting birds or other wild life.

(2) Any person hunting mink under subsection (1), should take all reasonable steps to avoid unnecessary damage to habitat or wild life.

(3) When any otter is located during the course of hunting all dogs under the control of the person hunting shall be withdrawn from the vicinity immediately.

(4) Hunting of feral mink shall not be permitted in any area certified by the Environment Agency or the Scottish Environment Protection Agency as unsuitable for hunting because of likely disturbance to the habitat of wild life, provided the relevant Agency controls the mink in such area by other means.

(5) For the purpose of this section "owner" shall include riparian owner.'.

New clause 6—Gun Packs—

'.—(1) A person does not commit an offence under section 1(1) if as a member of a gun pack:

(a) he hunts foxes with dogs for the purpose of culling, whether or not foxes are killed by dogs in the process, or

(b) he hunts an injured fox in order to kill it with dogs where it is reasonably believed by the person in control of those dogs to be the most effective method of killing it.

(2) In this section "Gun Pack" means any club or association registered with the Welsh Farmers Fox Control Association or any like Fox Control Association with similar purposes established in England, Scotland or Northern Ireland and which operates according to the code of practice prescribed by that Association'.

New clause 7—Control of foxes in national parks—

'.—A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 1(1) if he uses a dog for the control of foxes in the interests of animal husbandry within the boundaries of any national park.'.

New clause 19—Circumstances in which shooting is unsafe or impractical—

'A person does not commit an offence under section 1(1) if he hunts any wild mammal with dogs on land where the owner or occupier thereof reasonably considers that such hunting is necessary in order to kill, control or disperse such mammals and either:—

(a) because the public have rights of access thereto or such land is in close proximity to a highway or public right of way or otherwise the owner or occupier reasonably considers it unsafe to kill or control such mammals by shooting, or

(b) the owner or occupier of such land reasonably considers that it is impractical to kill or control such mammals by shooting.'.

New clause 25—Licensing of terrier work—

'.—(1) Terrier and other work by dogs to dig out foxes shall only be allowed under licensing arrangements.

(2) The Secretary of State shall determine whether it is expedient to establish a licensing authority for terrier work.

(3) If the Secretary of State determines that a licensing authority shall be established, it shall be funded by a separate levy on terrier packs and shall be run at no cost to public funds.

(4) The conditions attaching to licences for terrier work shall be established by the authority, but shall include—

(a) a prohibition on the use of hard or baiting dogs;

(b) a provision that foxes bolted using terriers or other dogs shall normally be despatched with a suitable firearm and by no other means; and

(c) a requirement for all dogs used for this purpose to be fitted with electronic locators to establish their position underground.'.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose—

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Before we start the debate on this wide-ranging group of new clauses, may I seek your guidance on a question of procedure? At some stage, no doubt, we shall have a Division on new clause 1. There are those of us who would, for example, disagree with new clause 1 but agree with new clauses 3 and 6. Will we have an opportunity to have separate Divisions on new clauses 3 and 6 and, for all I know, on other new clauses in the group?

Madam Speaker: At this early stage of the debate, I am not prepared to commit the Chair. I need to hear the debate. I am aware that there are distinctions between the new clauses. I shall consider separate Divisions when we reach that stage. I understand the point of order that has been raised by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This is not a wrecking new clause.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Rubbish.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I support the Bill, and I voted for it on Second Reading. I remind my hon. Friends that if they wish to know the origins of the new clause, they should check Labour policy documents from the mid-1980s. References to the contents of the new clause are to be found in agriculture policy papers written by members of the Labour party and approved by the national executive committee of the Labour party before the 1987 general election.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) rose—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I do not intend to give way. I know that the intention of Conservative Members is to wreck the Bill. I am not in the business of wrecking this particular Bill.

When the Bill was considered in Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster), who has been a doughty campaigner on these issues and has handled the Bill with great skill, unfortunately, in winding up one of his contributions, made a statement that I thought should be addressed on the Floor of the House. It involved an interview with a man called Mr. Christopher Ogleby from the Coniston hunt. He had said during the course of his interview that he hunted in the Lake district with a fell pack for reasons of sport. That might well be the case for Mr. Ogleby, but the reality is that there are many people who hunt in the Lake district, not necessarily for sport, but out of necessity. They believe that it is the only way of dealing with the fox as a predator.

I want to say a few words about how the fox is a predator in the Lake district and, I presume, to some extent in other national parks. Every year, farmers telephone the local hunt in my own and neighbouring constituencies and ask those in it to clear the fells of the fox. They do so because they are worried about lamb losses. Over the years, the anti-hunting lobby, of which I would generally form a part, has argued that it is untrue that foxes take lambs. I have seen lambs that have been taken by the fox. It often happens in my constituency. I cannot allow the debate to proceed on the basis of something that I know to be untrue.

There is adequate evidence that, in the Lake district, on the fells, the fox takes the lamb. I am told by those who support the Bill that the way to deal with the problem is to shoot the fox, but I invite my hon. Friends to think through the implications of shooting in the Lake district post-Cullen, because people are moving from handguns to rifles. They are holding them legally. There is a great danger that people will come into the national park with rifles under the pretext that they are shooting foxes, and there will be an accident, possibly in an area where tourists are using the countryside tracks.

The House should remember that we are also considering introducing right-to-roam legislation, to increase access in areas where there are many tourists. It is quite wrong for Parliament to carry through legislation that will in effect allow people to carry guns into the heart of my constituency. I am arguing for an exemption in national parks, because, historically, the fell packs have had a useful role to play. We are not talking about what I call social hunting in the national park, with people galloping around on horses, wearing red coats and blowing horns, although on occasion they do blow horns. We are talking about packs with only two or three people on foot, with dogs—packs that are called out by farmers to clear the fells, especially during the lambing season. That is what I am seeking to protect through my new clause.

I understand that the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) will argue against my case, on the basis of what happens over the border in areas outside the national park. That is for him to argue; I am protecting the foot packs that exist in the national park. Many of his constituents in the Blencathra hunt, which is based in his constituency, look favourably on my new clause, because they believe that it is the only way to proceed.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I seek your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as this is a wide group of new clauses, which range from the national parks to new clause 19, which is—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. It is for the Chair to decide on those matters. The hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) should not intervene in that way.

Mr. Baldry: New clause 19, which stands in my name, relates to hunting where shooting is impractical. I seek your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on whether it is your intention that we should debate the new clauses in this group, which are rather diverse, clause by clause, or will you allow us to debate all six new clauses?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Madam Speaker has already dealt with that in part. The new clauses were grouped in this way so that the debate can range over all of them. We shall eventually vote on new clause 1. Whether the House divides on the other new clauses will depend on how the debate has proceeded.

Mr. Baldry: I was not asking about voting so much as introducing—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members can discuss any of the new clauses that are grouped in this way.

Mr. Baldry: In that case, I shall speak to new clause 19, which stands in my name. I am not sure why hon. Members on the Government Benches are so restive. Some of us sat for many weeks in the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, and for many weeks the Committee did not progress further than line 1 of clause 1. We were then confronted with the extraordinary situation whereby the Bill was effectively rewritten. The Bill before the House today consists almost entirely of new clauses, which were not before the House on Second Reading, so it is not unreasonable that we should turn our attention to these issues.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): May I be clear about this, as it is alleged that filibustering might occur today? My hon. Friend said that in Committee it took many weeks to reach the second line of the Bill, but is it not true that the filibustering that took place in Committee was by the Bill's supporters, not its opponents?

9.45 am

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend is correct. The House and the country can draw its own inferences from the fact that those of us who were opposed to the Bill played an intelligent and constructive part in the Committee's proceedings, because, if passed, the Bill will be part of the criminal law of this country, so it is important that Parliament should get it right. It was a frustrating role, because for many weeks it was clear that the supporters of the Bill did not wish to make progress, simply because they wanted to hog the Committee's time.

Mr. Garnier: Does my hon. Friend recall that not only did the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) encourage filibustering tactics throughout the first five sittings of the Committee, during which we discussed only the first two lines of the Bill, but he then tabled amendments and voted against them?

Mr. Baldry: Absolutely. If ever there were evidence of the tactics that the hon. Gentleman adopted, it is that he tabled and voted against his own amendments, which was pretty bizarre.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): Will my hon. Friend remind the House how long the Committee spent on the first two lines of the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) responds, there is little point in going over the time that the Committee took. Will he now address himself to the new clause before the House?

Mr. Baldry: I hope that I shall dispatch the new clause much more speedily than the time it took the Committee to get through line 1.

Clause 3(1) provides that a "person does not commit an offence . . . if he uses a dog to stalk a wild mammal . . . for the purpose—

(a) of obtaining"—

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In respect of your ruling, I am at a loss to understand the dilemma that my hon. Friend faced. I understand that the Bill is regarded by its proponents as a matter of some urgency, and that they feel, perfectly legitimately, that there is a strong case that the law should be changed. I heard my hon. Friend refer to the public being able to draw inferences from the delays. I am not sure what inferences he is talking about. I was hoping that he could explain to the House the inferences that members of the public might be able to draw.

As I understand your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you think that my hon. Friend should not legitimately explain what went on in the Standing Committee. The purpose of today's exercise is to report the Committee's proceedings to the House, and people like me have come here with a relatively open and detached mind on these matters. I cannot do my constitutional duty and reach a proper and detached judgment on which way to vote—in the event of any votes being reached—unless I am allowed to listen to members of the Committee explain precisely why a Bill that was so urgent when it left the House became so dilatory in Committee. We could have dealt with this urgent matter many weeks ago, so will you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, allow my hon. Friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already dealt with that point of order. The purpose of today's proceedings is to discuss the new clauses before the House.

Mr. Baldry: The 14 new clauses that now form part of the Bill were not before the House on Second Reading, so we are considering an entirely new Bill today. The Committee having spent so many weeks considering just line 1, the Home Office panicked and had to rewrite the Bill entirely.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am concerned by what my hon. Friend has just said. I was under the impression that this was a private Member's Bill, yet we hear that the Home Office is responsible for a massive redraft. I hope that, in what has so far been an excellent speech, my hon. Friend will explain precisely what has happened for the benefit of the House, which is very interested in private Members' Bills. He says that much of what we are now debating did not exist on Second Reading or in Committee. The House has a role to play in scrutinising not only what has happened, but the detail of the new clauses.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members may refer to those matters, but only in so far as they are relevant to the new clauses before us.

Mr. Baldry: The clauses before us are all new and, as I am sitting next to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who chairs the Procedure Committee, I should tell him that although the Government claim to be neutral on the Bill, when they saw that the way in which it was drafted by the hon. Member for Worcester was such a complete and utter shambles—a dog's breakfast—they felt beholden at least to put some order into it and redraft it. I suspect that it is for the Procedure Committee or some other Committee of the House to decide whether it is appropriate for the Government to profess to be neutral, while helping hon. Members by drafting their Bills.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): My hon. Friend would be the first to acknowledge that there are such things as private Members' Bills in the form of Government handouts. I took through the House a private Member's Bill that was essentially a Government Bill and assisted the Government in getting their business on the statute book, when there was not enough parliamentary time for them to do so themselves. Does my hon. Friend suggest that the Bill, in its present form, is effectively a Government handout?

Mr. Baldry: I can report only that the Bill consists almost entirely of new clauses written by parliamentary draftsmen on behalf of the Home Office.

Conservative Members who, at some time, had the opportunity of serving in the previous Government, know that when Ministers introduce new clauses, they have the benefit of notes on clauses. A Committee usually has the benefit of notes on clauses, too, because, as a courtesy, Ministers make them available to members of the Committee. This situation is truly bizarre, because the Minister concerned wanted to remain neutral and did not even give the notes on clauses to the promoter of the Bill. Thus parliamentary draftsmen handed to the Minister new clauses that he did not understand, and the Minister handed the new clauses to the hon. Member for Worcester, who understood them even less, so neither was in a position to explain them to the Committee. They were totally unable to explain to the Committee the meaning of simple English legal words such as "permit" or "allow".

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend is being a little unfair on the Minister, who sat patiently—he was probably suffering from great frustration—as he listened to the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) attempt to explain what the Bill was about. I appreciate that it was a difficult task. However, the Minister moved away from his neutral position when he voted in favour of an amendment that introduced the concept of intention into the hunting issue. He should be congratulated on that, because he was brave enough to move away from the Government line, to attempt to improve the original clause 1, which has long since disappeared from the Bill. I suspect that that vote was the genesis of the complete redrafting of, and the throwing away of much of the rubbish in, the original Bill. I therefore hope that my hon. Friend will not be quite so cruel to the Minister.

Mr. Baldry: I like the Minister. He is a nice guy. I make no complaint against him, but it was his misfortune to be on the Bill. Because he was desperately trying to maintain his neutrality, he kept secret from the Committee all the notes on new clauses from which the Committee would normally benefit.

Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have been listening to the speech of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) for some 14 minutes and he has yet to discuss the new clause. I wish to know when he will address the new clause.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the Chair.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you make it absolutely clear to everybody in the House that any reference to the new clauses, whether in Committee or elsewhere, is in order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Provided that hon. Members refer their remarks to the new clause under discussion, that is correct.

Mr. Baldry: I was surprised by the point of order from the hon. Member for Worcester, because I and other members of the Committee listened to him with great courtesy week after week, hour after hour, yet he does not have the patience to listen to me for just 14 minutes.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): My hon. Friend is not being totally fair to the Home Office. The Home Secretary made it clear to The Daily Telegraph and The Times that he had nothing to do with drafting the Bill. We know that the Home Office has given a handout Bill, but the Home Secretary says that it has nothing to do with him. Moreover, we do not even have an Agriculture Minister on the Government Front Bench—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) responds, I repeat that I should be grateful if he would now deal with the new clause before the House.

Mr. Baldry: Clause 3(1) provides that "A person does not commit an offence . . . if he uses a dog to stalk a wild mammal . . . for the purpose . . . of obtaining food for human consumption . . . controlling the number of a particular species in a particular area, in order to safeguard the welfare of that species . . . if he takes reasonable steps to ensure that the wild mammal is shot as soon as possible".

Under the clause, if a dog is used to stalk a wild mammal, steps must be taken to shoot the wild mammal as soon as possible, so it follows that a dog must not, in any circumstances, be allowed to kill it. However, the Bill permits dogs to be used for certain purposes.

10 am

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): We must get to grips with the use of the word "dog". Is my hon. Friend aware that a dog is something other than a hound, and that the animals that we are discussing should properly be called hounds? The Bill's title is incorrect.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend may wish to develop that point later, but the lack of understanding of how the countryside works among the supporters of the Bill has characterised proceedings.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): I was not a member of the Committee, so will my hon. Friend explain whether it discussed the clause? Currently, one can allow a dog to chase and kill rats. Under the Bill, would one now have to shoot the rats? Are rats more appealing than any other animal to the Bill's promoter?

Mr. Baldry: It is clear that the Bill allows the hunting of rats and rabbits with dogs, but not of hares or foxes. The Bill should be entitled, Some Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill. It is difficult to find any intellectual justification for hunting some wild mammals with dogs, but not others.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend has referred the House to the exemption in clause 3(2), and to the word "shot". As I understand it, the protection provided by clause 3 applies only in the limited circumstances there set out. He will know that some wild animals, such as hares, are often dispatched otherwise than by shooting when removed from cover, perhaps by being struck on the head with a stick. Is not clause 3(2) ineffective in providing the protection that one assumes the Home Office intends to confer?

Mr. Baldry: None of the Home Office's new clauses was examined with the care with which they should have been, because the Committee spent so many weeks considering the first line of the original clause 1. The promoter of the Bill was keen to rush through consideration of the 14 new clauses so that the Bill could reach Report today, otherwise we would have had a rather dull Friday. The Bill has monopolised Standing Committee C, so no other private Member's Bill is in Committee. As my right hon. and learned Friend said, the exemptions are limited and have not been discussed thoroughly.

Clause 3(1)(a) and (b) provide a complete defence for the sport of stag hunting in the west country, but not for fox hunting when a fox is killed by hounds above ground. Stag hunting contrasts with fox hunting, because the hunted animal is shot with a shotgun at close range when it is at bay, which is the first opportunity to shoot it at such a range that its immediate death, by a clean and painless kill, is assured, and when it does not present a moving target. That fully meets the requirements of clause 3(2).

When the Home Office redrafted the Bill, the promoter of the Bill may not have realised that clause 3(2) provided a defence of stag hunting, but it clearly does so, in the normal use of English law and language. In contrast, foxes do not stand at bay at any time or for any reason. Thus, they seldom present a stationary target for shooting, and are never still when aware of a human presence. Shooting foxes is impractical, and fox hunting when a fox is killed above ground could never meet the requirements of clause 3(2).

The purposes of stag hunting in the west country are covered by clause 3(1)(a) and (b), and the purpose of fox hunting is covered by clause 3(1)(c), yet fox hunting would be made illegal and stag hunting not. That is another example of the Bill's illogicality. Clause 3 refers to "a dog", and hunting involves a number of hounds, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) has made clear. However, section 6 of the Interpretation Act 1978 provides that in any Act, words in the singular include the plural, and words in the plural include the singular. Under the Bill, however impractical or inhumane it may be, foxes could be controlled only by shooting.

Mr. Gummer: Who will decide the moment at which it is appropriate to shoot? My hon. Friend sensibly said that the appropriate moment in a stag hunt is when a stag can assuredly be shot. The Bill does not deal with the issue of who decides the appropriate moment. Stags have been hunted for many centuries, so people know what is the appropriate moment. Could someone tell a huntsman, "You had a chance to shoot the stag 25 minutes ago. Because you did not do it then, you may not do it now"?

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend makes a good point, which applies to several issues dealt with by the Bill.

The Bill provides for severe criminal sanctions. If it becomes law, magistrates will have to make value judgments in difficult circumstances. As a lawyer, I am concerned that owners or occupiers would be committing an offence if they permitted hunting on their land. Not only would the Bill criminalise everyone involved in field sports; it could put every farmer in the country in jeopardy. In Committee, the Bill's promoter and the Minister were unable to explain the meaning of the word "permit". Would farmers or landowners be committing an offence if they actively did not prevent a hunt from taking place on their land?

My right hon. Friend made the good point that it will be extremely difficult for people to know whether and at which moment they are committing an offence. We are dealing with natural events, which humans cannot always control.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): May I draw to my hon. Friend's attention a matter that touches on the point made by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours)? Keepers may be out night after night with a rifle, trying to shoot a fox that is doing demonstrable damage to lambs or ground game. Could the right time for the keeper to shoot be defined, or does my hon. Friend agree that, as the hon. Gentleman said, foxes are most effectively dealt with in such circumstances by the fell packs?

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. The Bill has been drafted by people whom I suspect have little understanding of how the hunt and the countryside work. It is being promoted by people who represent urban constituencies and have urban values. They want to impose their urban values on the countryside.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): My hon. Friend has raised a point that worries me, as a lawyer—the question of "permit" and the potential criminal penalties that might be visited upon some farmer or landowner who has not been involved in any activity. Are not Labour Members being intolerant? It is noteworthy that many of those in the House today are new Labour Members. At the same time as they seek to destroy the privilege of an Englishman's home being his castle by supporting the right to roam, they want to impose criminal sanctions on landowners and farmers who may not have been involved in any activity. Is not it the criminal sanctions that are of particular concern to law-abiding farmers and landowners?

Mr. Baldry: It is staggering that the potential jeopardy in which the Bill will place every farmer in the country has not been picked up by the media and is not fully understood throughout the country. It should be, because under the Bill, many of the masters and fellows of a number of Oxford and Cambridge colleges are likely to find themselves up before the beak.

I can hardly believe it, but it is obvious that there is no understanding among Labour Members of the fact that one can have an interest in land other than as an owner or occupier. No Labour Member appears even to have heard of the Law of Property Act 1925, under which lords of the manor retain the hunting rights over considerable tracts of land. If hunting takes place on that land, will lords of the manor—many of the titles have been flogged to Americans—be liable to criminal sanctions? As my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) said earlier, enormous numbers of people will be in jeopardy under the Bill, on terms and in circumstances that are unclear.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): As my hon. Friend knows, I was not a member of the Committee. Earlier, he mentioned shooting at night. How will the Bill impact on current legislation dealing with night shooting licences? He, like me, served as a Minister at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which issues the licences. Will there be a huge new bureaucratic system, whereby people will have to apply for more night shooting licences, with all the bureaucracy that that entails?

Mr. Baldry: If my hon. Friend were to ask the hon. Member for Worcester about night shooting licences, I suspect that he would not have the foggiest idea what my hon. Friend was talking about. The hon. Gentleman did not have the benefit of notes on clauses, but he wanted to rush through the Bill. I shall gladly give way to him if he wants to tell me what night shooting licences are—but in fact on this matter, like on many others relating to the countryside, he has no knowledge.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend mentioned the lack of understanding among Labour Members who represent urban areas. I want to correct him on that point. Although Labour Members may be urban folk, there are still plenty of people who live in towns who perfectly understand the case that my hon. Friend is making. Many of the people who come to Leicestershire to hunt live in London or other conurbations. I hope that my hon. Friend will not fall into the trap of saying that this is a country versus town issue; it is a liberty of the subject issue, among many others. I am sure that my hon. Friend will take that into account in the remainder of his remarks.

Mr. Baldry: Throughout the Committee proceedings, my hon. and learned Friend demonstrated that he was much more inherently fair-minded than me.

Mr. Colvin: One of the most notable absentees from the Labour Benches is the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. My hon. Friend referred earlier to fell hounds. One of the most famous packs of fell hounds—John Peel's hounds—comes from the Minister's constituency, so if anyone should be participating in this debate, it is he.

Mr. Baldry: I do not think that MAFF—where I served until the election—has had any involvement in any stage of the Bill. Therefore, there has been no advice from anyone who has any understanding of the government of the countryside.

10.15 am

Mr. Gummer: Another notable absentee is the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), who speaks on behalf of the Church Commissioners. No one seems to have noticed that under my hon. Friend's interpretation of the Bill, there is no doubt that the Archbishop of Canterbury could be in jeopardy—[Interruption.] It is a serious matter. The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) and, even more, the Home Office that has helped him with the total recasting of the Bill, are in a difficult position. If the Archbishop of Canterbury and other leading prelates are to be arraigned before the courts because someone has inadvertently shot—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions are going wider and wider of the mark. I ask the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) to stick to discussing the new clause.

Mr. Baldry: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend referred to MAFF. He will be aware of the precise terms of new clause 1 and new clause 7, which I tabled. Both new clauses suggest that hunting should be permitted in the interests of husbandry, as broadly defined. Would it not be of enormous convenience to the House to have a spokesman here from MAFF, who could tell us whether we are right to think that there are circumstances in which good husbandry requires fox hunting?

Mr. Baldry: A number of other new clauses probe whether such advice could be obtained.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): My hon. Friend was developing an important argument in response to the intervention from my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), namely, that the Bill—in particular, clause 8—would impose what some would call very draconian criminal sanctions. My hon. Friend's new clause 19 specifically refers to an offence being committed by "the owner or occupier". Surely, as we emerge into the 21st century, we all believe that a wild animal has the right to be humanely dispatched—and the person most likely to be sufficiently skilled to dispatch that animal is the keeper or person charged with killing it, not the owner or occupier, who may be opposed to hunting but allow it on his land to control an animal that is creating a nuisance.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is there anything in "Erskine May" that would allow you to stop this absurd and undemocratic filibustering by Conservative Members?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a proper point of order.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made a sensible point

At the heart of the debate is the fact that many of us—as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) said, town dwellers as well as country dwellers—actually understand how the countryside works and has evolved over many centuries. Keeping control of pests has evolved over many centuries, as has doing so humanely. The Bill was drafted in haste. It contains severe criminal sanctions that will not benefit anyone.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): If I understand my hon. Friend correctly, the burden of his argument is that the Bill has been badly drafted. New clause 1 refers to hunting with dogs. Does my hon. Friend agree that, in general parlance, a dog is taken to be the male of the canine species? Therefore, if the Bill as it stands is enacted, there will be a total exemption for hunting with bitches. [Interruption.] I am fascinated by the mirth of my colleagues. If the Bill's supporters fully understood what the Bill was about, they would surely understand that basic difference and rephrase the Bill accordingly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not debating the Bill in general: we are debating new clauses.

Mr. Baldry: As the Bill's promoter finds it difficult to tell the difference between a dog and a hound, I am not surprised that he cannot tell the difference between a dog and a bitch.

Mrs. Browning: The point referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill would surely not be acceptable to Labour Members, because it would allow no gender balance.

Mr. Baldry: A shot at a fox from anything other than close range, particularly when it is moving, is difficult. It would be impossible to ensure a clean kill, and a shot is likely to cause injury and extreme suffering. That applies even to gun packs in Wales, where the fox is flushed from cover by hounds and fired at with a shotgun while it is in motion.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): My hon. Friend's point is central to the new clauses. Clause 3(2) of the redrafted Bill states:

> "Subsection (1) applies to a person only if he takes reasonable steps to ensure that the wild mammal is shot as soon as possible after it is located or emerges from cover."

Subsection (1) is the anti-hunting provision. New clause 6 deals, in part at least, with the issue of gun packs. What is the attitude of the Bill's supporters, in so far as my hon. Friend has been able to divine it from Committee, on gun packs and the issue of culling foxes, partly by the use of hounds or dogs and partly by shooting? It is totally unclear to me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's intervention is becoming a speech. He must be brief.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I fully accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall finish in a few words. Could my hon. Friend answer that important question?

Mr. Baldry: I do not think that the Bill's supporters have applied their minds to the issue of gun packs.

The Bill was running out of time in Committee, and the Home Office told its supporters, "The Bill as drafted is such a mess that we cannot let it return to the House. The only way in which it can make progress is by the acceptance of all the new clauses." There are 14 new clauses, and this is the first time that the House has seen them. Because of the conduct of the Bill's supporters in Committee, they ran short of time and, despite the agreement of those who opposed the Bill—the sittings motion, for example, could have taken us through the night, and we were perfectly co-operative on that—issues such as gun packs were not properly debated. My right hon. and learned Friend is right to say that the Bill's supporters never turned their minds to these issues. It would be interesting to hear whether the Bill's promoter and his supporters can coherently and intelligently explain any one of their proposals.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Is not the problem that my hon. Friend is trying to find the Bill's rationale, particularly in the context of new clause 1, but that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), when moving new clause 1, gave the game away by justifying it not in terms of animal husbandry or animal welfare, but by saying that we need not worry about the new clause, because it would not involve people dressing up and riding around on horses? Is not class bias the key to the Bill and to that new clause?

Mr. Baldry: One of the more bizarre features of the Bill is that throughout its long time in Committee, the hon. Member for Worcester said many times that he was a keen angler. We were never able to establish why field sports should be regarded as "cruel" while angling was not. How can one philosophically justify one but not the other? We were told by the hon. Gentleman and by others that it was because field sports—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is again going wide of the mark by dealing with a matter that would have been more appropriate on Second Reading. Will he please return to the new clauses?

Mr. Hogg: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) said that 14 new clauses that were not envisaged on Second Reading have been introduced. You will wish to take that into account when considering whether there should be a stand part debate on every clause. I hope that you will give full weight to what my hon. Friend said, namely that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We do not have stand part debates on new clauses.

Mr. Baldry: The only way to minimise the possibility of a fox being injured is to use a rifle to shoot it when it is unaware of the presence of the shooter, who must be a skilled and experienced marksman. That is the only humane way to kill a fox. [Interruption.] I am not sure why Labour Members think that the humane killing of foxes is a matter for laughter. We are debating serious issues, and people might be put in jeopardy. The fox can be shot humanely only when it is unaware of the marksman's presence and is motionless, and that be done only at long range. Even in ideal circumstances, there is not a 100 per cent. guarantee of a clean kill, as I am sure many of my hon. Friends who are experienced marksmen will agree.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): My hon. Friend's point goes to the heart of the argument. In stag hunting, the stag is brought to bay and can be shot cleanly because it is standing still. I spoke to some of my farmers last weekend, and we discussed the shooting of foxes by rifles. They said that they thought that less than a third could be killed cleanly. That is probably too high an estimate. What about the other two thirds of foxes, which could be wounded and left to die a lingering death? Are not people concerned about that?

Mr. Baldry: Apparently not. My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Bill, if passed, will cause an enormous amount of unnecessary suffering and cruelty in the countryside. I hope that hon. Members and those outside understand that.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am interested in the clean kill syndrome. I do not know how many times the hon. Gentleman has been at a hunt, but has he been present when there was not a clean kill? What happens to the fox at such times?

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman should address the issue that fox hunting has managed over the years effectively to control a pest. If he thinks that marksmen in the countryside seeking to pick off foxes at long range with high-powered rifles is a better way to control the fox population, that demonstrates how little he understands the countryside.

Mr. Soames: Although I am a keen shooter, I have never shot and would never shoot a fox. Can my hon. Friend envisage a fox obediently and politely standing still while it is shot or does he anticipate, as I think he does, that someone trying to kill a fox will lie up somewhere and take pot shots at a moving target at a range of possibly 300 to 400 yd? However good and experienced a marksman someone may be, he will not kill a fox—he will wound it, if he even hits it. May I tell my hon. Friend that much the most effective way of controlling the fox population remains hunting with hounds?

Mr. Baldry: I would go further than that, in developing my hon. Friend's point, and say that, in some instances, the use of a rifle is plainly unsafe. It is obviously unsafe to use a rifle where there are footpaths, roads, walkers, farm labourers or buildings that may be out of the sight of marksmen.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): Before my hon. Friend moves on to his point on the safety of other people using and living in the countryside, may we return to the issue of bitch packs? I do not know whether that is a serious issue, but one of the hunts in my constituency uses a bitch pack. After killing a fox, bitches typically do not eat the carcase; they cleanly kill the fox and leave it there for the huntsmen to pick up. Many of the foxes that huntsmen pick up have serious injuries from bad shooting.

10.30 am

Mr. Baldry: I have absolutely no doubt that that is correct. It should be evident to every hon. Member that no fox will stand still and invite a shooter to shoot it, and that, if one attempts to shoot a moving target, the chances of a clean kill are minimal.

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): Does my hon. Friend agree that not rifles but shotguns will be used to kill foxes, and that nothing could be more cruel or give a fox a worse death than shooting it with a shotgun?

Mr. Baldry: That is absolutely right.

Mr. Colvin: In the interests of saving the time of the House—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I shall make only this intervention, which will save my having to make a speech. The point that is being made is valid. During consideration of the anti-fox hunting Bill tabled by the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), the point was made that, that year, the Cambridgeshire hunt had kept a statistical record showing that 40 per cent. of foxes killed were suffering from gangrenous gunshot wounds. It is worth putting that percentage on the record.

Mr. Baldry: I agree; the point is well made.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Baldry: I am sure that other hon. Members would like to speak to this group of new clauses, so I must make some progress.

If there is to be a right to roam, there may be many areas where ramblers are walking—quite properly and lawfully—and they could be vulnerable to being shot by a rifle. Powerful rifles have a range that could exceed three miles. A shot can be fired that finishes outside the range of the human eye. In more densely populated parts of the country—where people, animals, cars and buildings can be concealed from view—the danger caused by stray bullets and ricochets need only be imagined. Shooting could pose a significant risk of property damage, and even of human injury or death.

Thus, there are areas in which it is impossible, impractical or unsafe to shoot foxes effectively and humanely. In those areas, shooting will be either impossible, dangerous or inhumane. A wounded mammal's suffering is very great—far greater than that which would be caused even by illegal means, such as gassing or poisoning. Wounded foxes suffer prolonged pain and stress for hours, days or even weeks. They die, eventually, from gangrene or starvation.

It could be suggested that foxes should be trapped or snared. The law requires that traps or snares be inspected every 24 hours. In 24 hours, the stress suffered by a wild animal held captive in unnatural surroundings is extreme. There have been cases in which snared foxes have bitten off their trapped legs to get free. Moreover, the use of such traps and snares poses a danger to other species, such as badger, deer and otter, and even to farm animals such as sheep and lambs, which are to be protected. In such areas, the safest and the most efficient and humane method of control is to hunt the fox with dogs and hounds, and to allow the hounds to kill the fox—which they can do instantly. Consequently, there is no suffering, and no danger to the public.

I therefore hope that the House, in considering this group of new clauses, will carefully consider new clause 19.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I wish to speak to this group of new clauses, but especially to new clause 3, which deals with mink. Although I was not a member of the Standing Committee, I read with interest all its proceedings. I should, therefore, like to correct a misapprehension about my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and myself, which was expressed in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey). He said:

"Neither of them represent a rural constituency . . . their views are not valid because they come from areas where . . . the need for hunting is not understood."

He went on to say:

"in terms of the Bill they could be likened to the dogs involved, inasmuch as they seem to be barking on this issue."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 28 January 1998; c. 123.]

The ancient borough of Newcastle-under-Lyme, which I am proud to represent, has nine parish councils, three of which are in my constituency. Until recently, we had a cattle market. Indeed, the office of the National Farmers Union is in the town centre, and I often meet its representatives. They would be very interested in the observation by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole that we are not a rural constituency. They would also wonder why I am barking, and why I regularly meet them to discuss rural issues. If my hon. Friend cannot recognise where the countryside is, no one should take any notice of his views on it, as he is incapable of dealing with the matter comprehensively.

New clause 3 deals with the protection and conservation of our wildlife. In Standing Committee, no one on either side of the argument disputed the fact that mink are vicious creatures and need to be controlled. No one disputed the fact that they kill indiscriminately; neither did they challenge the evidence that I produced on Second Reading of the devastation caused by mink to the bird colonies of black-headed gulls, common gulls and common terns on islands in Scotland. Neither did they challenge the newspaper report in the Evening Courier (Halifax) of a cat torn to pieces by a mink. People who love cats—there are many cat lovers in this country—should take note of this Bill and of the need to protect cats.

The Committee also did not deal with the case of the two children's guinea pigs, one of which was killed outright, whereas the other's face was so badly torn that it had to be put down. Neither did Committee members deal with the case of the woman who told of savage attacks on her ducks and chickens, which were her livelihood. It did not deal with the fishery manager who estimated that, in two years, he had lost to mink more than £1,000-worth of fish, most of which were left to die with fins torn off and lumps bitten out of them.

The Committee also did not have any response to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, which said in a letter to me that "many birds are destroyed by mink and . . . the problem is perhaps out of control."

I emphasise the words "out of control". The Committee also did not deal with the leaflet from the Game Conservancy Trust which, in recognising the serious problem, said that more attention should be given to mink control. Therefore, I am not alone in thinking that mink should be controlled.

All those matters were ignored in Committee—they were neither disputed nor discussed. Committee members who supported the Bill decided that there was no need for mink control.

I have, therefore, had to table new clause 3, which deals with the conservation and protection of wildlife. Subsection (2) of the new clause states:

"Any person hunting mink under subsection (1), should take all reasonable steps to avoid unnecessary damage to habitat or wild life."

Of course! But which group is more likely to take those reasonable steps than mink hunters—who really care for wildlife and are doing something to preserve it?

Mr. Soames: Does the hon. Lady agree that many local councils and other bodies that are responsible for good order on river banks are extremely grateful to mink packs for the work that they do in keeping the river banks a better and safer place?

Mrs. Golding: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I have a letter from East Dorset district council, which has congratulated the mink hounds group in the area on helping it to control the mink population on the Moors Valley river. The council found that the mink were getting out of control and called in the hounds. In fact, they managed to catch a fair number of mink. Some people might think that the hounds do not catch mink, but I have here the record of one of the hunts which shows how many have been caught and how our wildlife has been preserved.

[Mrs. Golding]

Subsection (3) of new clause 3 states:

"When any otter is located during the course of hunting all dogs under the control of the person hunting shall be withdrawn from the vicinity immediately."

That is the rule of the organisations involved and it already happens.

Mr. Gray: Would the hon. Lady care to comment on the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, under which it is not illegal to hunt an otter, but just illegal to kill one? The reason is that it is extremely difficult to ascertain whether one is hunting an otter or a mink. Has the hon. Lady given any thought to how a hunt would ascertain whether it was hunting a mink or an otter and, in particular, how it should proceed if it discovers that it may be hunting an otter?

Mrs. Golding: As I understand it, the hunt examines the tracks of the animal, and if there is any possibility that the animal is an otter, the hounds are immediately withdrawn.

Subsection (4) states:

"Hunting of feral mink shall not be permitted in any area certified by the Environment Agency or the Scottish Environment Protection Agency as unsuitable for hunting".

Who could dispute that? There can surely be no argument abut it. If certain areas are protected, there should be no hunting there.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Lady is making a thoughtful speech, and I congratulate her on it. I advise her not to be too discomfited by the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey). He appointed himself as the official cheeky chappie of our Standing Committee. I urge her not to be too concerned by what he had to say at any stage.

Subsection (3) deals with otters. In Committee, the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), who is one of the sponsors of the Bill, alleged that mink were under threat from otters because otters hunted and killed mink. I am reasonably sure that the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) knows rather more about the subject than the hon. Member for Basildon. Will she comment on the hon. Lady's allegation?

Mrs. Golding: Certainly I can comment on it. I read the Committee proceedings closely. The hon. Lady did indeed say that, but when challenged by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik), she immediately changed her mind, so I am not sure whether her views are valid. I thank the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire for his gallant protection of myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): The hon. Lady is most welcome; it was the least I could do for such honourable Members.

Mrs. Golding: The hon. Gentleman follows in the footsteps of his predecessor.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Lady was setting out the purpose of subsection (4) of new clause 3, and I entirely understand what she has in mind. Does she consider, should the Bill go any further—to another place, for example—that there would be merit in amending subsection (4) so that if there was a refusal by the Environment Agency or the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, there could be an appeal to a magistrates court or Crown court? Otherwise, the absolute say rests with the agency, and that may be deemed to be unsatisfactory.

Mrs. Golding: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but subsection (4) provides that the relevant agency should control the mink in such areas by other means. That puts the onus on the agency, so I think that the point is well covered.

Subsection (5) states:

"For the purpose of this section 'owner' shall include riparian owner."

There can surely be no dispute about that.

The Bill is supposed to deal with the protection of our wildlife, among other things. If we do not destroy mink, they will destroy our wildlife.

10.45 am

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): Will my hon. Friend say a little about the suffering that mink will undergo if an alternative method such as caging is used? How likely is it that the mink will suffer even more? Some hon. Members who were anti the factory farming of mink for fur said that caging animals made them go mad and that they suffered enormously. How does my hon. Friend think that caging compares to hunting with dogs in terms of cruelty?

Mrs. Golding: I certainly do not want to follow that line of inquiry; it goes rather wide of the Bill. However, trapping can by its very nature be destructive. Traps have to be examined once every 24 hours and recharged with fresh meat, otherwise the mink will not go near them. People claim that hounds destroy and disturb wildlife on the river banks, but having traps on the river banks means that people have to trample the land every day, which is even more destructive.

Mrs. Browning: I agree with the hon. Lady. Does she agree that on average a mink hunt—I have one in my constituency—will, in a season, cover some 800 sq km and that the equivalent in terms of trapping costs alone would be about £200,000?

Mrs. Golding: Yes, those are the figures that I have been given. There is also a problem with trapping in that it is absolutely useless in tidal waters, as I am sure the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire will confirm. Keepers on the River Dovey say that they cannot trap mink because of the tidal waters.

Mr. Öpik: I can confirm that. There is an emphatic belief that the Bill would herald the end of much other wildlife due to the proliferation of mink in that neck of the woods, were it to be passed in its current form.

Mrs. Golding: I understand that mink go through the water no more than twice in any season, which I would not regard as a disturbance of the wildlife.

I hope that new clause 3 will be accepted. It deals with the protection and conservation of our wildlife and with the people who go out in all weathers to control mink, which are vicious and unnecessary and do nothing but damage our wildlife.

Mr. Öpik: I served on the Standing Committee, and I have to say that I am glad that I am not the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster). Like him, I am a member of the class of 1997, but I believe that his job has been immeasurably more difficult than mine as he is the promoter of this Bill. Things have been a bit strained from time to time, which is hardly surprising, but I am sorry to say that the debates have at times got a bit personal. The issue should not be personal, despite its very strong emotive elements and the feelings that it arouses on both sides of the debate.

In speaking to new clause 6, I hope to reaffirm that my motive is sincerely to create good legislation and proper reform.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman and I both served on the Standing Committee. On the subject of being personal, will he join me in thanking the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara), who chaired the Committee ably and with great good humour during the eight or 10 weeks that it sat? He was sometimes assisted by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie).

Mr. Öpik: I echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. All hon. Members who served on the Committee have sincerely held views which they expressed with a good deal of humour. I do not question the motives of the hon. Member for Worcester or organisations, such as the League Against Cruel Sports, that worked on the Bill. My argument with the hon. Member for Worcester relates to the content of the Bill and not his reasons for introducing it.

Let me explain my reasons for introducing new clause 6. Gun packs are an absolutely vital and central element in the rural activities that I have observed in Montgomeryshire and mid-Wales. The new clause seeks to modify the regulations proposed in the Bill to make them more workable. I do not disagree with the reference to flushing in the Bill. Last summer, the hon. Member for Worcester listened to my concerns about gun packs and changed the Bill, as then drafted, to accommodate my wishes. I praise him for that. He was willing to listen and was sincere in his desire to draft proper legislation.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): As a Member for mid-Wales, I feel that there is no doubt that the arguments that were put to the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) were compelling as there is a huge problem of fox infestation within the monoculture of woodlands in mid-Wales, particularly those that have been planted since the war.

Mr. Öpik: I reiterate what my hon. Friend says as his constituency borders mine within Powys. The problems in Montgomeryshire are not confined to mid-Wales, but affect many parts of the United Kingdom, particularly Cumbria, Scotland and other outlying areas. There is a fairly successful long-standing tradition of gun packs stretching across the United Kingdom to a greater or lesser density, so in speaking for mid-Wales, I am also speaking for other hilly and less accessible parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I am extremely worried about the new clause singling out gun packs. Although there may be some controversy about whether hunting purely with hounds controls foxes, it may prevent other more cruel ways of culling foxes. We should remember what Mr. Scott Henderson KC said in his 1951 report to Parliament:

> "We have no hesitation in saying that unless great care is taken shooting may be an extremely cruel method of control."

Will the hon. Gentleman address that point?

Mr. Öpik: Indeed. Without opening up to debate issues that are not currently before us, I acknowledge that many people believe that shooting is more cruel than hunting with hounds. I shall not stray too far from new clause 6, but the argument is that hounds either kill the fox or they do not; there is no halfway house. There is no question of wounding the fox so that it runs off and dies in agony, or even of starvation, having been rendered unable to hunt. My personal view, having seen gun packs in Montgomeryshire, is that an expert gun pack involving sufficient numbers of individuals, by and large gets the fox straight off. Having said that, the central point is what happens if the fox is wounded and runs away.

Mr. Hogg: I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) said. Apropos of the use of gun packs, does the hon. Gentleman agree that if people use shotguns to shoot foxes, it is vital that they use a very heavy load of shot and do not use the same shot that they use for pheasants or birds generally?

Mr. Öpik: There is a belief that a massive attack of that nature is more likely to achieve a result straight off than using a narrower-bore shotgun. Having said that, I am not an expert in ballistics and there are probably others here today who could furnish the House with more detailed information.

Mr. Soames: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that any gun pack would seek to use BB shot, which is a heavier shot with 11 pellets per cartridge. That is a very heavy load indeed, and is the absolute minimum requirement to knock over a fox. Will the hon. Gentleman clarify another point? Although new clause 1 seeks to confine the activity to national parks, it has almost the same effect as new clause 6 in that it refers to packs that exist solely to help farmers control the fox because of the very real damage that it does to the land. Does he also agree that many gun packs, when finding a fox in a thick wood, will chop the fox on the spot, so it will never get out? Indeed, it will be killed in cover.

Mr. Öpik: I thank the hon. boffin—the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames)—for his education about ballistics. I shall address his second point in just a moment. First, let me explain why I am taking so many interventions. As hon. Members know, I have always believed that sensible interventions add value to the debate. It is not my intention to delay the House unduly.

[Mr. Öpik]

I shall now answer some of the points that have been made about why I, along with the hon. Members for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), have tabled new clause 6. The Bill is not about whether or not we should permit the killing of foxes, although the debate sometimes strays into that territory; it is about the process that should be used to cull foxes. I cannot place too much emphasis on that distinction, which is crucial to our debate. I would like to believe that hon. Members on both sides of the argument support the hon. Member for Worcester in his desire to ban inhumane and barbaric activities from the countryside. It goes without saying that there is a need for definition and that is the grey area that we are discussing today.

Nevertheless, the debate is not about whether or not foxes should be killed. All three major political parties in the United Kingdom accept that, in certain circumstances, there is justification for killing foxes. That point was recorded on a number of occasions in Standing Committee. In that context, the entire debate revolves around how it should be done.

Let me explain what gun packs are and how they operate as that is fundamental to the new clause.

Mr. Hancock: Is my hon. Friend seriously suggesting that hounding an animal across the countryside and allowing it to be torn apart by dogs is not barbaric?

Mr. Öpik: Once again, I am referring only to gun packs—[Interruption.] I shall give way to my hon. Friend so that he can clarify his point.

Mr. Hancock rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) is quite correct. He must stick to the new clause.

Mr. Hancock: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for taking a further intervention. He was making a point about the style of death involved and suggesting that shooting animals could lead to a fox dying a pretty barbaric death. I was trying to draw a comparison between what happens when an animal is shot and possibly wounded, and what happens when an animal is chased across the landscape by hounds and then torn apart in an obscene and barbaric way.

Mr. Öpik: I do not want to deviate too much from the new clause, but as I always try to answer direct questions directly, perhaps I shall be forgiven if I take 30 seconds to address my hon. Friend's point. No doubt we shall return to the specific issue that he raised about hunting with hounds and killing foxes when we debate other clauses and amendments.

In my view, however, the emotive language that my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) used emphasises a problem that we have had throughout the debate. The debate tends to shift from philosophical consideration of the moral right of animals to be treated in a certain way into the domain of feelings and emotions. I do not blame my hon. Friend for having feelings and emotions on this matter, but I believe that it is unhelpful to shift from one to the other in the process of a logical argument.

Mr. Colvin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Öpik: I see that you would like me to move on, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I shall give way, and take the risk that the intervention will be regarded as out of order if it concerns hunting with hounds.

11 am

Mr. Colvin: My intervention concerns shooting. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) mentioned the Scott Henderson report. I refer the hon. Gentleman to that report, because I believe that it answers the question that he was asked. The Scott Henderson report, to which members of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals contributed, concluded that any method of controlling foxes would involve some cruelty, whether it was hunting, shooting, trapping, gassing, snaring or poisoning—some of which methods were illegal anyway—but that, of those methods of control, hunting involved less cruelty than any other method. That was confirmed by the Phelps report of 1997.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are again going very wide of the mark.

Mr. Öpik: I remind hon. Members on all sides of the debate that when we eventually discuss other groups of amendments, we can have a full debate on this subject in order and to your satisfaction, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Livsey: I want to concentrate on the point that my hon. Friend is making. References to the Scott Henderson report and speech do not address the fact that, in the part of the world that we come from, there has been widespread planting of softwoods since 1951, and in some parts, the woodland is so dense that foxes can be controlled only with gun packs.

Mr. Öpik: I thank my hon. Friend for his contribution, which provides me with a convenient way in which to return to my main arguments.

Before our little canter through hunting with hounds, I was about to describe, for the benefit of the House, what gun packs mean. The response that I have had from less rural areas suggests to me that there is a public perception that fox hunting means putting on a red coat, sitting on a horse and chasing off into the countryside with a sherry in one's hand, until some poor fox gets torn to pieces by hounds. However that may be in certain parts of the United Kingdom—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To return to a serious point—the point that I was making in relation to what my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) said—I am anxious that all wild mammals should be dispatched as humanely as possible. New clause 6 speaks of gun packs being registered with any fox control association. Will he explain how that association is likely to be constituted? I am very worried lest packs of cowboys travel around the country, wounding foxes.

Mr. Öpik: That is a useful and valid intervention, and I shall answer it briefly now, in the belief that I can return to the subject if I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when we debate another group of amendments. I agree with the hon. Member for Worcester in his desire to reform the process of hunting, and I believe that the creation of a regulatory authority will be a crucial element in such reform—[HON. MEMBERS: "Not reform—abolition."] I would attest to the House that abolition is an extreme version of reform.

For the effective implementation of my proposal in new clause 6, it would be very helpful—perhaps essential—to have a regulatory authority that had the trust of the majority of people on both sides of the debate. I do not pretend that, even with the proposal in new clause 6, we could necessarily satisfy the requirements of the extremists on either side in this debate, but I would be satisfied if the regulatory authority had the confidence and trust of the House and of the general public, many of whom are sympathetic to what the hon. Member for Worcester is trying to do.

I shall now define gun packs and what they do. In essence, a gun pack consists of a group of individuals, with a pack of hounds, who go out usually into quite inhospitable, hilly terrain, where it would not be easy to use horses or any approach other than travel on foot, to locate foxes and shoot them. The hounds come into the process because they are sent in to flush from cover the foxes, which are then shot, usually by a fairly large number of individuals bearing shotguns.

It is clear to me that, in Montgomeryshire, where I have had most experience of observing these matters, gun packs are well-organised groups. They tend not to practise other types of fox hunting, such as hunting on horseback—or, indeed, running to ground and digging out, which is yet another process that we are likely to discuss in a future debate. Gun packs tend to consist of non-professionals—usually farmers. Often there is a hunt master, who exercises a professional or semi-professional capacity during the hunt and, usually, looks after the pack.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) made a distinction between sport and control. My answer to the question, "Why do they do it? Is it a sport?", is that gun packs' primary motive is not sporting, but a genuine belief that what they do is an effective way in which to control the local fox population.

There is a secondary element, but it is not as much sporting as social. Many people who participate in gun packs live extremely remote lives. They are very isolated, and the opportunity to get together as gun packs—indeed, as foot packs running foxes to ground—forms part of their rural culture. I am pretty convinced that they do not go out with the primary desire to practise what they do as a sport. I am sure that they enjoy some aspects of it, but I have never observed blood lust, and much of the time the interest is more to count the number of foxes that they have got in a year. That is the crucial statistic for gun packs. Their main concern is to consider the number of foxes that the pack caught during the year, rather than the nature of the killing, or how the fox reacted when it was shot.

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman has made the very good point that although, for people living in remote areas, the hunt is an agreeable and convivial gathering, it is essentially for the extremely important purpose of preventing expansion of the fox population, which greatly damages the interests and prosperity of farmers, who are the sole guardians and backbone of the economic situation in the uplands. Will the hon. Gentleman reinforce that point? This is not some sort of love-in; it is an absolutely essential utilitarian operation.

Mr. Öpik: That is a completely fair economic analysis of what the gun packs—I emphasise that I am talking about gun packs—regard as their primary role. The sheep farming industry is the backbone of many of these areas, and they are densely populated by sheep. As the hon. Member for Workington said, unquestionably, foxes take lambs. They also take chickens. Anyone who lives or works in, or represents, a rural constituency knows that. We could debate the numbers, and there is an interesting debate on the percentage of animals taken by foxes, but it is beyond debate that foxes take farm animals.

Mr. Gray: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the National Farmers Union has said that between 10 per cent. and 15 per cent. of lambs in hill farms suffer because of foxes? Outdoor-reared pigs also suffer. I suspect that many of those hon. Members who are opposed to fox hunting are in favour of outdoor farrowing, but it is meals on wheels for the local fox—as the piglets appear, they are eaten.

Mr. Öpik: The hon. Gentleman is correct, although I do not think that I would have used the same terminology—perhaps the foxes in mid-Wales are not as calculating in their activities.

Gun packs are regarded by the farming unions and farmers as an effective and humane way in which to control the fox population. I believe that such arguments have persuaded the hon. Member for Worcester to include gun packs in his Bill, for which I applaud him. Between 100 and 150 gun packs operate in Wales, and there are others in Scotland, Cumbria and the west country.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman clearly knows a great deal about gun packs, and his explanation is extremely helpful to the House. Can he say how many times a gun pack kills a fox—that is, the hounds kill the fox before it has broken cover? How many times is the fox, having been flushed out of cover by the hounds and outrun the hunters, marksmen and the shooters, killed by hounds in the open?

Mr. Öpik: The overwhelming proportion of foxes that are killed after being run from cover are, in fact, shot. A small proportion escape—perhaps 5 per cent. to 10 per cent, although I stress that that is an estimate based on my soundings and could be off the mark. Unfortunately, some of those foxes are wounded before they run clear of the gun pack.

Labour Members have often said that I am being used. I emphasise that I do not appreciate the implications of that accusation, which is that my comments are designed to detain the House so that the Bill falls. Whatever hon. Members may think of my argument, I ask them to credit me with the integrity to defend the interests of the people who elected me to the House and to discuss as well as I can matters that are of great importance to them. I shall not respond further to such accusations, except to say that Labour Members grossly underestimate the sincerity of my intention in making these comments.

[Mr. Öpik]

The Bill, as drafted, presents difficulties to gun packs. Although it would permit them to operate, unless it is modified, there will be a double danger that the suffering endured by a fox will be increased. New clause 6 states:

"A person does not commit an offence under section 1(1) if as a member of a gun pack:

(a) he hunts foxes with dogs for the purpose of culling, whether or not foxes are killed by dogs in the process, or

(b) he hunts an injured fox in order to kill it with dogs where it is reasonably believed by the person in control of those dogs to be the most effective method of killing it."

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman will lose his seat for filibustering.

Mr. Öpik: I hear the hon. Gentleman say that I will lose my seat. If I lose my seat for trying to act in what I believe to be the best interests of my constituents, I am willing to do so.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Öpik: I am not going to give way yet, although I shall in a minute.

Mr. Gray: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Am I right in thinking that the hon. Gentleman is being intimidated by cries from across the Chamber? Is that in order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am quite sure that all hon. Members are well able to look after themselves.

Mr. Öpik: Nevertheless, I thank various hon. Members for their moral support. [Interruption.] My point is important, and I think that it behoves hon. Members to listen. In tabling new clause 6, I wanted to modify the Bill profoundly, which—given the way in which the Bill was amended in Committee and what I learned during those debates—I felt was appropriate.

11.15 am

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who represents a neighbouring constituency, for giving way. Last night, I talked to the master of a hill pack that operates in both our constituencies, who told me that the Bill would be absolutely devastating for the economy and wildlife in the areas in it hunts. I urge the hon. Gentleman to continue putting his case forcefully and to ignore comments from Labour Members.

Mr. Öpik: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment.

Sometimes foxes are not killed cleanly—they escape, having been wounded but not killed. If the fox cannot be pursued by hounds, it will suffer a period of agony before it dies, either from blood loss, damage to the vital organs, an inability to hunt prey or disease. I have seen the corpse of a fox that had escaped the hounds but had died of starvation because the lower part of its jaw had been shot away while it was running away. If hounds are allowed to pursue the fox when the intent is genuinely to kill it with a gun, that would, I suggest, massively reduce the suffering of a fox that had been wounded, but would otherwise escape, as happens in a minority of cases.

More importantly, given that the intention of the Bill is to reduce the pain and suffering inflicted on wild mammals, allowing the hounds to finish the job—as long as that is sensibly regulated—is an entirely reasonable desire for the gun packs to have. That is one reason why a regulatory authority must be trusted and effective, as there could be abuse—every hunting pack in the United Kingdom could suddenly register itself as a gun pack and carry on regardless. A code of practice must be well defined, so that that does not happen.

Some hon. Members may believe that my proposals would weaken or even wreck the Bill. They should consider them from a gun pack's point of view. The overwhelming majority—perhaps all—of the individuals I have met who are involved in gun packs are sincere in their belief that shooting foxes is the best way in which to proceed and to control the fox populations in the areas where they operate. They do not spend their time celebrating the death of a fox and they are not particularly interested in shifting their tactics from shooting foxes to tracking them down with hounds—that is an entirely different approach.

By including new clause 6 in the Bill, we would signal our confidence that people in the countryside act in good faith and that those who are part of gun packs are, by and large, honourable people who are trying to do what they believe is best for the protection of livestock and in the interests of agriculture. The House must debate those issues. I believe that the Bill's measures relating to gun packs are better than nothing, but they do not work in the context of the intentions of the hon. Member for Worcester. Obviously, I would rather have a completely different approach to reforming hunting from that of the hon. Member for Worcester, but we can return to that later.

I believe that my proposal would make the gun packs work. It would be easier to include it now rather than letting the matter go to the courts, which would have to settle all sorts of precedents about whether a gun pack acted intentionally or unintentionally in allowing hounds to chase a fox. More than anything, it clarifies the point that the hon. Member for Worcester is not seeking to curtail the activities of those who sincerely share his view that culling should be done in the most humane way.

Mr. Gray: I have a point that I fear the hon. Gentleman may not make. New clause 6 fits neatly with clause 3 of the Bill as amended in Committee. Would it not be sensible to ask the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) to accept it, as it is in much the same spirit as the clause that he drafted?

Mr. Öpik: I would be delighted if the hon. Member for Worcester would accept new clause 6. I have made it known to the Speaker that I would like a separate vote on new clause 6 because it is so different from the general intent of the Bill.

Gun packs are not the preserve of the idle rich nor regarded as a sport by those who use them. They involve no blood lust; it is just how we do things in some parts of the countryside. Whatever happens to the rest of the Bill, new clause 6 and the issue of gun packs are so distinct from the general thrust of the Bill that they deserve a separate vote. The House's judgment on new clause 6 may be different from its judgment on the Bill. In requesting a separate vote, I am highlighting the desperate worries of many people who have little interest in the rest of our debates, but simply ask for the right to pursue their traditional and, in their view, effective approach to controlling foxes in an area where they believe it is not simply a pastime, but an agricultural way of life.

Kate Hoey: It is with great pleasure that I follow the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). If some of my colleagues think that there has been filibustering this morning, I refer them to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who told me earlier that he spoke for three hours to block a private Member's Bill that he felt strongly about. While some hon. Members may be intending to filibuster, the number of interventions is in the nature of a private Member's Bill and reflects how this draconian legislation has been advanced. I pay tribute to the members of the Committee—I was not on it—who tried, in the emotional atmosphere of putting through draconian legislation, to have a genuine debate.

Mr. Garnier rose—

Kate Hoey: I shall take an early intervention, but not many more.

Mr. Garnier: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for taking an intervention from a member of the Standing Committee. Does she accept that one reason why so many hon. Members wish to intervene is that the Bill is a different creature from that which we debated on Second Reading? This 14-clause Bill bears almost no resemblance to the original Bill.

Mr. Hogg: Clause 1 was removed.

Mr. Garnier: As my right hon. and learned Friend says, clause 1 was removed. It is a question not of filibustering but of what the new Bill is all about.

Kate Hoey: There is a genuine problem in that the Bill has come back in a very different form from the Bill that went into Committee. There are many new clauses because many hon. Members have been thinking about how we can make unworkable, unenforceable legislation more relevant to the lives of the people who will be most affected by it.

I shall have more to say later on other new clauses, but I have a few words on this one. I agree with the desire of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who moved the new clause, for the exemption of national parks. If he can put a good case for such an exemption, it is clear that there are other areas in respect of which people can put up good cases for exemptions. His new clause shows that the whole Bill is deeply flawed.
